This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

[Weekly Reporter, Oct. 25, 1890.]

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1889-90

(THIRTY-EIGHTH YEAR),

CONTAINING

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

WITH

APPEALS TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL,

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1889, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1890.

TOGETHER ALSO WITH SOME CASES DECIDED PREVIOUSLY TO THAT PERIOD.

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

DIGESTED INDEX AND A TABLE OF THE NAMES OF ALL CASES

REPORTED DURING THAT PERIOD,

WITH

REFERENCES TO CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS AND PUBLICATIONS.

VOL. XXXVIII.

EDITED BY

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

LONDON: 27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

1890.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,
Printers,
LONSDALE BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE.

94300

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

PREFACE.

In the thirty-eighth volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains, as usual, a summary of all the cases published during the past year in the WEEKLY REPORTER and in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports, besides those given in the Irish Law Reports.

JUDGES AND LAW OFFICERS

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1889, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1890.

LORD HALSBURY, LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD WATSON,
LORD MACNAGHTEN, } LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.
LORD MORRIS,

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

SIR BARNES PEACOCK, PAID JUDGE.

LORD HOBHOUSE,
SIR RICHARD COUCH, } ADDITIONAL JUDGES ORDINARILY ATTENDING.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.—COURT OF APPEAL.

LORD ESHER, MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
SIR HENRY COTTON,
SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY,
SIR CHARLES SYNGE CHRISTOPHER BOWEN, } LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.
SIR EDWARD FRY,
SIR HENRY CHARLES LOPES,

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.—CHANCERY DIVISION.

SIR EDWARD EBENEZER KAY.
SIR JOSEPH WILLIAM CHITTY.
SIR FORD NORTH.
SIR JAMES STIRLING.
SIR ARTHUR KEKEWICH.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

LORD COLERIDGE, CHIEF JUSTICE.
HON. GEORGE DENMAN.
SIR CHARLES EDWARD POLLOCK.
SIR WILLIAM VENTRIS FIELD.
SIR JOHN WALTER HUDDLESTON
SIR HENRY MANISTY.
SIR HENRY HAWKINS.
SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN.
SIR JAMES CHARLES MATHEW.
SIR LEWIS WILLIAM CAVE.
SIR JOHN CHARLES DAY.
SIR ARCHIBALD LEVIN SMITH.
SIR ALFRED WILLS.
SIR WILLIAM GRANTHAM.
SIR ARTHUR CHARLES.
SIR ROLAND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.
SIR JOHN COMPTON LAWRANCE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

SIR JAMES HANNEN, PRESIDENT.
SIR CHARLES PARKER BUTT.

SIR RICHARD EVERARD WEBSTER, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.
SIR EDWARD CLARKE, SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

LIBRARY
LELAND STANFORD JUNIOR UNIVERSITY

EDITOR AND REPORTERS.

1889—90.

EDITOR.

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

REPORTERS.

HOUSE OF LORDS ..... CHARLES HARDMAN GRAPTON, Barrister-at-Law.

PRIVY COUNCIL ..... JOHN MONSEY COLLYER, Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF APPEAL No. I ..... WILLIAM FREDERICK BARRY, ALFRED PERCIVAL PERCEVAL KEEP, FREDERICK GEORGE BUCKER, and SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Barristers-at-Law.

COURT OF APPEAL No. II ..... MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE, RALPH HAWTREY DEANE, WALTER IVIMEY COOK, LEONARD S. BRISTOWE, HUGH MARTIN CHARTERS MACPHERSON, and WILLIAM HENRY CHARRELL, Barristers-at-Law.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Mr. Justice Kay ..... HENRY CHARLES ROPER, CHARLES HENRY FEHLER CHRISTIE, and JAMES HERBERT BAKEWELL, Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Chitty ..... ALEXANDER DAVID MACLAREN, VILLIERS DE SAUSSURE PONKE, GILBERT ROWLAND ALSTON, and WILLIAM HENRY CHARRELL, Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. Justice North ..... GEORGE ERNEST JEFFERY, JAMES TELSTRAM, and FRANCIS THEODORE DILLA, Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Stirling ..... WALTER IVIMEY COOK, LEONARD S. BRISTOWE, HUGH MARTIN CHARTERS MACPHERSON, and WILLIAM HENRY CHARRELL, Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Romer ..... JAMES WILLIAM FLEG and CHARLES HERBERT BROWN, Barristers-at-Law.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

Sir SEPTIMUS LAKE, Bart., and THOMAS REGINALD COLLINS, Barristers-at-Law.

NEIL MATHER CHAPMAN and GEORGE INGWLEY PALEY, Barristers-at-Law.

FREDERICK GEORGE BUCKER and SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Barristers-at-Law.

CASES IN BANKRUPTCY ..... CHARLES FRANCIS MORRELL, Barrister-at-Law.

PROB. DIV., and ADM. DIVISION.....

Prob. & Div. ..... JOHN GERARD LAING, barrister-at-Law.

Adm. ..... CHARLES PITT SIMPSON, barrister-at-Law.

CROWN CASES RESERVED..... ..... RUDOLPH EYRE KELSHEIMER, barrister-at-Law.

A TABLE

OF

THE NAMES OF CASES

REPORTED AND DIGESTED IN THIS VOLUME,

WITH REFERENCES TO THE CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS.

VOL. XXXVIII.

NOTE.—In the following Table the cases are arranged in the Alphabetical order of the PLAINTIFFS' names; but for convenience of reference, with respect to cases reported in this Volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER having double titles—e.g., In re Smith, Brown v. Jones—this Table gives the names of such cases under both titles.

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners v Straker	CH.D. KEK.J.	158	121	42 Ch. D. 83; 58 L. J. Ch. 717; 60 L. T. 756
Ainsley v Nicholson	Q.B.D.	—	74	24 Q. B. D. 144; 59 L. J. Q. B. 102; 61 L. T. 809
Alexander v Simpson	C.A.	161	37	43 Ch. D. 139; 59 L. J. Ch. 133; 61 L. T. 708
Alexandra Palace and Park Co., In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	36	61 L. T. 325
Alison v Burns	P.C.	—	140	15 App. Cas. 54; 59 L. J. P. C. 35; 61 L. T. 847
Allen v Oakey	CH.D. NOR.J.	—	160	62 L. T. 724
Allison v Frisby. In re Frisby	C.A.	65	115	43 Ch. D. 106; 59 L. J. Ch. 94; 61 L. T. 632
Alsop and Joy, In re	CH.D. CHI.J.	—	213	61 L. T. 213
American Braided Wire Co. v Thomson	CH.D. KEK.J.	329	145
———	C.A.	—	145	44 Ch. D. 274; 59 L. J. Ch. 425; 62 L. T. 616
American Exchange Co. v Gillig	CH.D. STI. J.	—	11	58 L. J. Ch. 706; 61 L. T. 502
American Pastoral Co., In re	CH.D. NOR.J.	—	32	62 L. T. 625
Anderson v Hamlin	Q.B.D.	—	81	25 Q. B. D. 221; 63 L. T. 168
Annaly (Lord), In re	L.J. (I.)	—	137	23 L. R. Ir. 481
——— v Trade Auxiliary Co.	C.A. (I.)	—	109	26 L. R. Ir. 394
Apollo, The	C.A.	—	191	61 L. T. 286
Apothecaries' Society, Ex parte	Q.B.D.	478	57
Arbuthnot v Bulsiloli.	CH.D. STI. J.	—	133	62 L. T. 284
Argentino, The	H.L.	—	62	14 App. Cas. 519; 61 L. T. 706
Armstrong, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	213	62 L. T. 185
Arratoon Apcar, The	P.C.	481	187	15 App. Cas. 37; 59 L. J. P. C. 49; 62 L. T. 331
Artola Hermanos, Ex parte. In re Chale.	C.A.	—	18	24 Q. B. D. 640; 59 L. J. Q. B. 254; 62 L. T. 781
Ashley, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	5	15 P. D. 120
Ashwin, Ex parte. In re Ashwin	C.A.	—	13	25 Q. B. D. 271; 59 L. J. Q. B. 417
Aston's Trusts, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	200	26 L. R. Ir. 96
Atkin v Wardle	Q.B.D.	—	34	61 L. T. 23
Atkins v Shephard. In re Shephard.	C.A.	133	158	43 Ch. D. 131; 59 L. J. Ch. 83; 62 L. T. 337
Atkinson, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	167	25 L. R. Ir. 509
——— v Atkinson	Q.B.D.	—	216	62 L. T. 735
——— v Bradford Equitable Benefit Building Society	C.A.	630, 657	114	25 Q. B. D. 377; 59 L. J. Q. B. 360; 62 L. T. 857
Attorney-General v Emerson	C.A.	102	155	24 Q. B. D. 56; 59 L. J. Q. B. 192; 62 L. T. 21

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Attorney-General v Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Mayor of)	C.A.	—	139	23 Q. B. D. 492; 58 L. J. Q. B. 558
——— v Theobald	Q.B.D.	527	196	24 Q. B. D. 557; 62 L. T. 768
——— v Vyner	C.A.	194	163
Australian Wine Co., In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	199	61 L. T. 427
Bab'n, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	6	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 46; 62 L. T. 185
Bach's Design, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	174	65	42 Ch. D. 661; 61 L. T. 763
Bacup (Corporation of) v Smith	CH.D. CHI. J.	697	119	44 Ch. D. 395; 59 L. J. Ch. 518
Badcock v Hunt	Q.B.D.	255	58	58 L. J. Q. B. 134
Badham v Badham and Gorst	P.D. & A.D.	—	70	62 L. T. 663
Badman's and Bosanquet's cases. Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	39	62 L. T. 179
Bagot v Bagot	P.D. & A.D.	—	68	62 L. T. 612
Baird, Ex parte. In re Hecquard	C.A.	148	18	24 Q. B. D. 71
Baker, In re. Nicols v Baker	C.A.	417	5	44 Ch. D. 262; 59 L. J. Ch. 661; 62 L. T. 817
Ball, Ex parte. In re French	C.A.	52	14	24 Q. B. D. 63; 62 L. T. 93
Bank of Ireland v Watkins	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	102	26 L. R. Ir. 258
Banque de France v Morrison	C.A.	635	95	24 Q. B. D. 750
Banque de Paris v Morrison	C.A.	635	95	24 Q. B. D. 750
Barker, In re. Ex parte Constable	C.A.	609	15	25 Q. B. D. 285; 59 L. J. Q. B. 331
——— v Fleetwood Improvement Commissioners	Q.B.D.	—	140	62 L. T. 831
Barlow v Ross	C.A.	372	112	24 Q. B. D. 381; 59 L. J. Q. B. 183; 62 L. T. 552
Barnett, Ex parte. In re Tamplin	Q.B.D.	351	24	59 L. J. Q. B. 194; 62 L. T. 264
Barratt, In re. Whitaker v Barratt	CH.D. NOR. J.	59	2	43 Ch. D. 70; 59 L. J. Ch. 218
Barrett v Day. Day v Foster	CH.D. NOR. J.	362	147	43 Ch. D. 435; 59 L. J. Ch. 464; 62 L. T. 597
Barry v Dublin United Tramways Co.	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	127	26 L. R. Ir. 150
Barton-upon-Humber District Water Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	8	41	42 Ch. D. 585; 58 L. J. Ch. 613; 61 L. T. 803
Barton v London and North-Western Railway Co.	C.A.	197	75	24 Q. B. D. 77; 59 L. J. Q. B. 33; 62 L. T. 164
Batavier, The	C.A.	522	51	15 P. D. 37; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 54; 62 L. T. 406
Bate v Bate	CH.D. KAY. J.	—	6	43 Ch. D. 600; 59 L. J. Ch. 277
Batten v Dartmouth Harbour Commissioners	CH.D. KEK. J.	603	53	62 L. T. 861
Bazett v Morgan	Q.B.D.	108	51	24 Q. B. D. 48; 59 L. J. Q. B. 54; 61 L. T. 434
Beck v Pierce	C.A.	29	124	23 Q. B. D. 316; 58 L. J. Q. B. 516; 61 L. T. 445
Bedford v Teal. In re Thompson	CH.D. STI. J.	249	29	59 L. J. Ch. 249; 61 L. T. 671
Bedoyere v Nugent	M.R. (I.)	—	184	25 L. R. Ir. 143
Benyon v Benyon	C.A.	—	71	15 P. D. 54; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 39; 62 L. T. 381
Berridge v Berridge	CH.D. NOR. J.	599	169	44 Ch. D. 168; 59 L. J. Ch. 533; 63 L. T. 101
——— v Turner	CH.D. STI. J.	—	212	62 L. T. 365
Binnie v Broom	H.L.	—	179	14 App. Cas. 576
Birch v Cropper. In re Bridgewater Navigation Co.	H.L.	401	44	14 App. Cas. 525; 59 L. J. Ch. 22; 61 L. T. 621
Bishop v Balkis Consolidated Co.	Q.B.D.	750	40	25 Q. B. D. 77
Bithray, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	60	163	59 L. J. Ch. 66; 61 L. T. 383
Blackburn, In re. Smiles v Blackburn	CH.D. NOR. J.	140	152	43 Ch. D. 75; 59 L. J. Ch. 208
——— and District Building Society, In re. Ex parte Graham	C.A.	178	43	42 Ch. D. 343; 59 L. J. Ch. 183; 61 L. T. 745
Blakey v Latham	C.A.	193	156	43 Ch. D. 23
Blankenstein v Robertson	Q.B.D.	—	23	24 Q. B. D. 543; 59 L. J. Q. B 315
Blore v Ashby	CH.D. KEK. J.	141	57, 159	42 Ch. D. 682; 58 L. J. Ch. 779; 61 L. T. 766
Blue Ribbon Life, &c., Industrial Assurance Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	104	96	59 L. J. Ch. 277
Blundell v Blundell	C.A.	707	53	44 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 269; 62 L. T. 620
Board of Trade. Ex parte. In re Gee	Q.B.D.	143	19	24 Q. B. D. 65; 59 L. J. Q. B. 16; 61 L. T. 645
———, Ex parte. In re Wayman	Q.B.D.	95	195	59 L. J. Q. B. 28; 61 L. T. 644
Bodega Co. v Owens	V.C. (I.)	—	198	23 L. R. Ir. 371
Bonner v Lyon	Q.B.D.	541	122
Booth v Ferrett	Q.B.D.	718	31	25 Q. B. D. 87
——— v Ratté	P.C.	737	176	15 App. Cas. 188; 59 L. J. P. C. 41; 62 L. T. 198
Borough v Collins	CT. OF ARCH.	—	—	15 P. D. 81
Borrowes v Delaney	EX.D. (I.)	—	103	24 L. R. Ir. 503
Bourke v Davis	CH.D. KAY, J.	167	76	44 Ch. D. 110; 62 L. T. 34
Boylan v Cusack	M.R. (I.)	—	168	25 L. R. Ir. 269
Bracken, In re. Doughty v Townson	C.A.	48	79	43 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 18; 61 L. T. 531
Brackley v Battersea Vestry	C.A.	28	130	23 Q. B. D. 486; 58 L. J. Q. B. 591
Bradley v Clayton	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	66	26 L. R. Ir. 405
Bradshaw v Huish. In re Huish	CH.D. KAY, J.	199	213	43 Ch. D. 260; 59 L. J. Ch. 135; 62 L. T. 52
Bridgewater Navigation Co., In re. Birch v Cropper	H.L.	401	44	14 App. Cas. 525; 59 L. J. Ch. 22; 61 L. T. 621
Brighton and Dyke Railway Co., In re	C.A.	321	174	44 Ch. D. 28; 59 L. J. Ch. 329; 62 L. T. 353
Brinkley v Attorney-General	P.D. & A.D.	—	109	15 P. D. 76; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 51; 62 L. T. 911

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Bristol Athenæum, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	396	46	43 Ch. D. 236; 59 L. J. Ch. 116; 62 L. T. 795
——, Cardiff, &c., Aerated Bread Co. v Maggs	CH.D. KAY, J.	393	47	44 Ch. D. 616; 59 L. J. Ch. 472; 62 L. T. 416
—— Joint-Stock Bank, In re	CH.D. KEK.J.	574	44	44 Ch. D. 703; 62 L. T. 745
—— Trams and Carriage Co. v Bristol (Mayor of)	C.A.	693	120	25 Q. B. D. 427; 59 L. J. Q. B. 441
Bruton Medical, General, and Life Assurance Association v Jones	Q.B.D.	—	35	61 L. T. 384
Brown, In re	LUN.	529	107	59 L. J. Ch. 530; 63 L. T. 131
—— v Collins	CH.D. STL. J.	—	180	62 L. T. 566
—— v New South Wales Railway Co.	P.C.	—	62	15 App. Cas. 241; 62 L. T. 469
Bryant and Barningham, In re	C.A.	469	208	44 Ch. D. 218; 59 L. J. Ch. 636; 63 L. T. 20
Buccleugh, Duke of, The	C.A.	—	187	15 P. D. 86; 62 L. T. 94
—— v Eden	CH.D. KAY J.	—	212	61 L. T. 360
Buckle, Ex parte. Reg. v London County Justices	Q.B.D.	269	110	24 Q. B. D. 341; 59 L. J. M. C. 71; 62 L. T. 458
—— v Fredericks	C.A.	742	60	44 Ch. D. 244; 62 L. T. 884
Buckley v Royal National Lifeboat Institution. David, In re	C.A.	162	29	43 Ch. D. 27; 59 L. J. Ch. 87; 62 L. T. 141
Budgett v Binnington	Q.B.D.	—	189	25 Q. B. D. 320
Building Societies Trust Co, In re. Ex parte Laughton	CH.D. CHI. J.	458	42	44 Ch. D. 140; 59 L. J. Ch. 638; 62 L. T. 360
Burgoyne, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	200	61 L. T. 89
Burland v Broxburn Oil Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	89	199	42 Ch. D. 89; 58 L. J. Ch. 816; 61 L. T. 618
Burnaby's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. STL. J.	—	183	42 Ch. D. 621; 58 L. J. Ch. 464; 61 L. T. 22
Burnaby v Baillie	CH.D. NOR. J.	125	78	42 Ch. D. 282; 58 L. J. Ch. 842; 61 L. T. 634
Burningham v Burrage	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	204	62 L. T. 752
Burton-on-Trent (Mayor of) v Burton-on-Trent Assessment Committee	C.A.	181	151	24 Q. B. D. 197; 59 L. J. M. C. 1; 62 L. T. 412
Butcher v Nash	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	81	61 L. T. 72
Butler v Butler. Butler v Butler and Burnham	P.D. & A.D.	272	71	14 P. D. 160; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 62 L. T. 477
—— (2)	C.A.	390	69	15 P. D. 66; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 25; 62 L. T. 344
—— v Butler	C.A.	—	52	15 P. D. 126
—— v Gilbert	M.R. (I.)	—	137	25 L. R. Ir. 230
Butterley v Carroll	C.A. (I.)	—	103	26 L. R. Ir. 93
Byram v Tull. In re Dixon	CH.D. NOR. J.	91	87	42 Ch. D. 306; 61 L. T. 718
Caistor Guardians v North Kelsey Guardians	Q.B.D.	—	151	59 L. J. M. C. 102; 62 L. T. 731
Caldwell v Mathews	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	138	62 L. T. 799
Callao Bis Co, In re	C.A.	21	45	42 Ch. D. 169; 58 L. J. Ch. 826; 61 L. T. 534
Callaway, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	528	223	15 P. D. 147
Calliope, The	C.A.	155	185	14 P. D. 138; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 76; 61 L. T. 656
Callow v Callow	CH.D. CHI. J.	104	219	42 Ch. D. 450; 58 L. J. Ch. 698
—— v Flynn	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	102	26 L. R. Ir. 179
Canada Shipping Co v Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association	C.A.	87	94	23 Q. B. D. 342; 58 L. J. Q. B. 462; 61 L. T. 312
Cannot v Oppenheim	C.A.	1	51
Cape Copper Co v Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris	C.A.	763	157
Capital and Counties Bank v The Bank of England	Q.B.D.	—	12	61 L. T. 516
Cardiff Savings Bank, In re. Davies' case	CH.D. STL. J.	571	177	59 L. J. Ch. 450; 62 L. T. 628
Carisbrooke, The	P.D. & A.D.	543	190	15 P. D. 98; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 37; 62 L. T. 843
Carlisle, In re. Clegg v Clegg	CH.D. NOR. J.	638	10	44 Ch. D. 290; 59 L. J. Ch. 520; 62 L. T. 821
Carnegie v Conner	Q.B.D.	—	185	24 Q. B. D. 45; 59 L. J. Q. B. 122; 61 L. T. 661
Carpenter v Deen	C.A.	—	22	23 Q. B. D. 566; 61 L. T. 360
Carroll v Hickey	M.R. (I.)	—	166	23 L. R. Ir. 418
Case v Case	CH.D. KAY.J.	183	182	61 L. T. 789
Cashmere, The	P.D. & A.D.	623	57	15 P. D. 121; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 57; 62 L. T. 814
Cassidy v Cassidy	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	48	24 L. R. Ir. 577
Cazenove v Cazenove	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	211	61 L. T. 115
Central Bank of London v Hawkins	Q.B.D.	—	21	62 L. T. 901
Ceto, The	H.L.	—	187	14 App. Cas. 670
Chamberlain v Stoneham	Q.B.D.	107	51	24 Q. B. D. 113; 59 L. J. Q. B. 95; 61 L. T. 660
Chapman v Auckland Guardians	C.A.	—	141	23 Q. B. D. 294; 58 L. J. Q. B. 504
Charterhouse School (Governors) v Lamarque	Q.B.D.	776	91	25 Q. B. D. 121; 59 L. J. Q. B. 495; 62 L. T. 907
Christie v Northern Counties Building Society	CH.D. NOR. J.	280	24	43 Ch. D. 62; 59 L. J. Ch. 210; 61 L. T. 796
Christ's Hospital, In re. Endowed Schools Act, 1869, In re	P.C.	758	28	15 App. Cas. 172; 59 L. J. P. C. 52; 62 L. T. 10
City of Lincoln, The	C.A.	345	186	15 P. D. 15; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 1; 62 L. T. 49

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Clanricarde v Clarke	EX.D. (I.)	—	105	26 L. R. Ir. 261
Clark, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	448	6	15 P. D. 10; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 6; 61 L. T. 697
——— v Sonnenschein	Q.B.D.	717	155	25 Q. B. D. 226; 59 L. J. Q. B. 461; 62 L. T. 880
———	C.A.	743	155	25 Q. B. D. 464
Clarke v Hall	C.A. (I.)	—	76	24 L. R. Ir. 316
Clegg v Clegg. In re Carlisle	CH.D. NOR. J.	638	10	44 Ch. D. 290; 59 L. J. Ch. 520; 62 L. T. 821
——— v Hands	C.A.	433	101	44 Ch. D. 503; 59 L. J. Ch. 477; 62 L. T. 502
Clift, In re. Ex parte Colquhoun	Q.B.D.	688	18
Climpson v Coles	Q.B.D.	110	21	23 Q. B. D. 345; 58 L. J. Q. B. 432; 61 L. T. 116
Clook, In the Goods of	C.A.	—	155	15 P. D. 132; 62 L. T. 607
Clutterbuck v James	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	214	62 L. T. 454
Cochrane, Ex parte. In re Faulconer	Q.B.D.	—	14	61 L. T. 56
——— v Entwistle	C.A.	587	20	25 Q. B. D. 116; 59 L. J. Q. B. 418; 62 L. T. 862
——— v Moore	C.A.	588	83	25 Q. B. D. 57; 59 L. J. Q. B. 377; 63 L. T. 153
Cohen v Mitchell	C.A.	551	19	25 Q. B. D. 262; 59 L. J. Q. B. 409
Cole v Accident Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	—	93	61 L. T. 227
Colley v Hart	CH.D. NOR. J.	501	146	44 Ch. D. 179; 59 L. J. Ch. 308; 62 L. T. 424
Collins, Ex parte. In re Yarrow	Q.B.D.	175	28	59 L. J. Q. B. 18; 61 L. T. 642
Colonial Bank v Cady. London Chartered Bank of Australia v Cady	H.L.	—	40	15 App. Cas. 267; 63 L. T. 27
Colquhoun, Ex parte. In re Clift	Q.B.D.	688	18
——— v Brooks	H.L.	289	89	14 App. Cas. 493; 59 L. T. 850
——— v Heddon	Q.B.D.	366	89	24 Q. B. D. 491; 59 L. J. Q. B. 142
———	C.A.	545	89	25 Q. B. D. 129; 59 L. J. Q. B. 465; 62 L. T. 853
Combined Weighing and Advertising Machine Co., In re	C.A.	67	42	43 Ch. D. 99; 59 L. J. Ch. 26; 61 L. T. 582
Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v Automatic Weighing Machine Co.	CH.D. KEK.J.	233	147	42 Ch. D. 665; 58 L. J. Ch. 709; 61 L. T. 474
Constable, Ex parte. In re Barker	C.A.	609	15	59 L. J. Q. B. 331; 25 Q. B. D. 285
———. In re Lorrimar	Q.B.D.	—	16	62 L. T. 943
Constantia, The	P.D. & A.D.	272	187	62 L. T. 236
Cook, Ex parte. In re Cook	Q.B.D.	—	16	61 L. T. 335
——— v Cook	P.D. & A.D.	656	163	15 P. D. 116; 62 L. T. 667
——— v Whellock	C.A.	534	54	24 Q. B. D. 658; 59 L. J. Q. B. 329; 62 L. T. 695
Cooke v New River Co.	H.L.	—	209	14 App. Cas. 698; 59 L. J. Ch. 333; 61 L. T. 816
——— v Smith	C.A.	641	63	45 Ch. D. 38; 59 L. J. Ch. 577
———	C.A.	—	164	44 Ch. D. 72; 62 L. T. 712
Cope, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	688	4	15 P. D. 107
Coriolanus, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	192	15 P. D. 103; 62 L. T. 844
Cornish v Accident Insurance Co.	C.A.	139	92	23 Q. B. D. 453; 58 L. J. Q. B. 591
——— v Cornish	P.D. & A.D.	—	68	15 P. D. 131; 62 L. T. 667
Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy v Christ Church, Oxford. In re Paunce-fort	CH.D. STI. J.	172	31	42 Ch. D. 624; 58 L. J. Ch. 578; 61 L. T. 109
Cotterill v Lempriere	Q.B.D.	—	97	24 Q. B. D. 634; 62 L. T. 695
Coulson v Dickson	C.A.	388	20	25 Q. B. D. 100; 59 L. J. Q. B. 189; 62 L. T 479
County of Lancaster Steamship Co. v Sharp	Q.B.D.	—	189	24 Q. B. D. 158; 59 L. J. Q. B. 22
Coupe v Collyer	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	133	62 L. T. 927
Covell, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	79	7	15 P. D 8; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 7; 61 L. T. 620
Cowper Essex v Acton Local Board	H.L.	209	106	14 App. Cas. 133; 58 L. J. Q. B. 594; 61 L. T. 1
Cox v Cox	P.D. & A.D.	—	68	61 L. T. 698
Crane v Lawrence	Q.B.D.	620	7	25 Q. B. D. 152; 59 L. J. M. C. 110
Cranfield v Cranfield	V.C. (I.)	—	22	23 L. R. Ir. 555
Crawford v Donnelly	V.C. (I.)	—	167	23 L. R. Ir. 511
——— v May. In re May	CH.D. NOR.J.	765	122
——— v Royal Infirmary. In re Mainwaring	CH.D. KEK.J.	412	217	43 Ch. D. 643; 59 L. J. Ch. 351; 62 L. T. 63
Crawshay v Crawshay	CH.D. NOR. J.	600	154	43 Ch. D 615; 59 L. J. Ch. 399; 62 L. T. 89
Creagh, In re	L.J. (I.)	—	220	25 L. R. Ir. 128
——— v Gamble	EX.D. (I.)	—	80	24 L. R. Ir. 458
Criglington v Gallagher	C.A. (I.)	—	74	26 L. R. Ir. 134
Crisp v Thomas	Q.B.D.	—	140	62 L. T. 810
Crook, Ex parte. In re Crook	C.A.	—	13	24 Q. B. D. 320
Croome v Croome	H.L.	—	221	61 L. T. 814
Crown Bank, In re	CH.D. NOR.J.	666	41	44 Ch. D. 634; 62 L. T. 823
Cumberlege v Cumberlege-Ware. In re Ware	CH.D. STI. J.	767	152	63 L. T. 52
Curwen v Milburn	C.A.	49	56	42 Ch. D. 424; 62 L. T. 278
Dale and Plant, In re	CH.D. KAY, J	409	42	43 Ch. D. 255; 59 L. J. Ch. 180; 62 L. T. 215
Daniel v Daniel	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	213	61 L. T. 365

Name of Case.	Court	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Darbishire v Darbishire	P.D. & A.D.	—	69	62 L. T. 664
David, In re. Buckley v Royal National Lifeboat Institution	C.A.	162	29	43 Ch. D. 27; 59 L. J. Ch. 87; 62 L. T. 141
Davies' case. In re Cardiff Savings Bank	CH.D. STI. J.	571	177	59 L. J. Ch. 450; 62 L. T. 628
——, In re. Isaard v Lambert	C.A.	584	3	44 Ch. D. 253; 59 L. J. Ch. 516; 62 L. T. 84
—— v André	C.A.	437	159	24 Q. B. D. 598; 59 L. T. Q. B. 233; 63 L. T. 151
—— v Chatham Permanent Building Society	Q.B.D.	—	24	61 L. T. 680
—— v Hetherington	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	—	62 L. T. 753
—— v McMahon	C.A. (I.)	—	104	24 L. R. Ir. 447
—— v Stanford	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	123	61 L. T. 234
Davis' Trusts, In re	CH.D. KAY, J	—	212	61 L. T. 430
Davis v Davis	P.D. & A.D.	—	86	14 P. D. 162; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 88
—— v Freethy	Q.B.D.	—	193	24 Q. B. D. 519
—— v Howard	Q.B.D.	492	169	24 Q. B. D. 691; 59 L. J. Q. B. 133
—— v Stephenson	Q.B.D.		110	24 Q. B. D. 529; 59 L. J. Q. B. 305; 62 L. T. 436
Davy, Ex parte. In re Eede	C.A.	683	195	25 Q. B. D. 228; 59 L. J. Q. B. 376
Daw v London County Council	Q.B.D.	—	130	59 L. J. M. C. 112; 62 L. T. 793
Day v Foster. Barrett v Day	CH.D. NOR. J.	362	147	43 Ch. D. 435; 59 L. J. Ch. 464; 62 L. T. 597
Deacon v South-Eastern Railway Co.	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	210	61 L. T. 377
Dear, In re. Helby v Dear	CH.D. KAY, J.	31	215	58 L. J. Ch. 659; 61 L. T. 432
Debenture Corporation, Ex parte. In re Pound, Son, & Hutchins	C.A.	18	34	42 Ch. D. 402; 58 L. J. Ch. 792; 62 L. T. 137
De Lossy v De Lossy	P.D. & A.D.	511	11	15 P. D. 115; 62 L. T. 704
Delmar, Ex parte. In re Herepath	Q.B.D.	752	17
Derry v Peek	H.L.	33	131	14 App. Cas. 337; 58 L. J. Ch. 864; 61 L. T. 265
Devonshire (Duke of) v O'Connor	Q.B.D.	420	50	24 Q. B. D. 468; 59 L. J. Q. B. 189; 62 L. T. 917
Dickinson v Dickinson	P.D. & A.D.	—	69	62 L. T. 330
Dicks v Hare	C.A.	—	3	44 Ch. D. 236; 59 L. J. Ch. 375; 62 L. T. 819
Dillon, In re. Duffin v Duffin	C.A.	369	84	44 Ch. D. 76; 59 L. J. Ch. 420; 62 L. T. 614
Dinizulu v Attorney-General for Zululand	P.C.	—	170	61 L. T. 740
Dixon, In re. Byram v Tull	CH.D. NOR. J.	91	87	42 Ch. D. 306; 61 L. T. 718
—— v Wells	Q.B.D.	606	99	25 Q. B. D. 249; 59 L. J. M. C. 116; 62 L. T. 812
Doherty v Dwyer	P. & D.D. (I.)	—	221	25 L. R. Ir. 297
Deré Gallery, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	491	76	62 L. T. 758
Doughty v Townson. In re Bracken	C.A.	48	79	43 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 18; 61 L. T. 531
Dreyfus v Peruvian Guano Co.	C.A.	—	63	43 Ch. D. 317; 62 L. T. 511
Druitt v Willens	M.R. (I.)	—	122	23 L. R. Ir. 436
Drummond's Patent, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	148	43 Ch. D. 80; 59 L. J. Ch. 102
Dublin (South) City Market Co., In re. Ex parte Keatley	M.R. (I.)	—	107	25 L. R. Ir. 265
Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co., In re	M.R. (I.)	—	108	25 L. R. Ir. 175
Dubont v Macpherson	Q.B.D.	62	159	23 Q. B. D. 340; 58 L. J. Q. B. 496; 61 L. T. 689
Duffin v Duffin. In re Dillon	C.A.	369	84	44 Ch. D. 76; 59 L. J. Ch. 420; 62 L. T. 614
Duffy v Chambers	C.A. (I.)	—	74	26 L. R. Ir. 100
—— v Joyce	M.R. (I.)	—	54	25 L. R. Ir. 42
Duncan v Dixon	CH.D. KEK. J.	700	89	44 Ch. D. 211; 59 L. J. Ch. 437; 62 L. T. 319
Dutton v Brookfield. In re Jones	CH.D. NOR. J.	90	217	59 L. J. Ch. 31; 61 L. T. 661
East London Railway Co., In re. Oliver's claim	C.A.	312	106	24 Q. B. D. 507; 63 L. T. 147
East and West India Dock Co., In re	C.A.	516	175	44 Ch. D. 338
Eccles, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	6	15 P. D. 1; 61 L. T. 652
Ecclesiastical Commissioners to King	CH.D. CHI. J.	473	207	62 L. T. 535
Eddowes v Argentine Loan and Mercantile Agency Co.	C.A.	629	154	59 L. J. Ch. 392; 62 L. T. 514
Eden v Ridsdale's Railway Lamp Lighting Co.	C.A.	55	35	23 Q. B. D. 368; 58 L. J. Q. B. 579; 61 L. T. 444
Edevain v Cohen	CH.D. NOR. J.	8	160	41 Ch. D. 563
——	C.A.	177	—	43 Ch. D. 187; 62 L. T. 17
Edge's Patent, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	698	164
Edgington v Edgington	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	197	61 L. T. 323
Edwards and Sykes, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	206	62 L. T. 445
—— v Salmon	C.A.	166	119	23 Q. B. D. 531; 58 L. J. Q. B. 571
Eede, In re. Ex parte Davy	C.A.	683	195	25 Q. B. D. 228; 59 L. J. Q. B. 376
Egmont's (Lord) Settled Estates, In re	C.A.	762	183
Elder v Carter	C.A.	612	67	25 Q. B. D. 194; 59 L. J. Q. B. 281; 62 L. T. 516
Ellam v Ellam	P.D. & A.D.	—	76	62 L. T. 331
Emeris v Woodward	CH.D. NOR. J.	346	96	43 Ch. D. 185; 59 L. J. Ch. 230; 61 L. T. 666
Empire Mining Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	747	44	44 Ch. D. 402; 59 L. J. Ch. 345; 62 L. T. 493
Endeavour, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	189	62 L. T. 840

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Endowed Schools Act, 1869, In re. Christ's Hospital, In re	P.C.	758	28	15 App. Cas. 172; 59 L. J. P. C. 52; 62 L. T. 10
Eno v Dunn.	H.L.	—	200	15 App. Cas. 252; 63 L. T. 6
Essex (Sheriff of), Ex parte. In re Levy	Q.B.D.	784	185
Evans v Newport Urban Sanitary Authority	Q.B.D.	400	120	24 Q. B. D. 264; 59 L. J. M. C. 8; 61 L. T. 684
Fahey v Frawley	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	170	26 L. R. Ir. 78
Fairclough v Roberts	Q.B.D.	330	111	24 Q. B. D. 350; 59 L. J. M. C. 62 L. T. 700
Fairbolme v Kennedy	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	137	24 L. R. Ir. 498
Faithfull v Woodley	CH.D. NOR.J.	326	135	43 Ch. D. 287; 59 L. J. Ch. 304; 61 L. T. 808
Falck v Axthelm	C.A.	196	160	24 Q. B. D. 174; 59 L. J. Q. B. 161
Farnum v Administrator-General of British Guiana	P.C.	—	84	14 App. Cas. 651; 59 L. J. P. C. 10; 61 L. T. 438
Farrar v Cooper	CH.D. KEK.J.	410	10	44 Ch. D. 323; 59 L. J. Ch. 506; 62 L. T. 528
Fawcett, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	5	58 L. J. P. D. & A. 87; 61 L. T. 303
Fawcett and Holmes, In re	C.A.	—	207	42 Ch. D. 150; 58 L. J. Ch. 763; 61 L. T. 105
Ferguson-Davie v Ferguson-Davie	P.D. & A.D.	—	222	15 P. D. 109; 62 L. T. 703
French, In the Goods of	P. & D.D. (I.)	—	221	23 L. R. Ir. 433
Field v Hopkins	C.A.	—	134	44 Ch. D. 524; 62 L. T. 775
Filburn v People's Palace and Aquarium Co.	C.A.	706	200	25 Q. B. D. 258; 59 L. J. Q. B. 471
Fincke v London and South-Western Railway Co.	C.A.	513	107	44 Ch. D. 330; 59 L. J. Ch. 453; 62 L. T. 831
Fisher v Shirley	CH.D. STI. J.	70	180	59 L. J. Ch. 29; 61 L. T. 668
Five Steel Barges	P.D. & A.D.	—	192	15 P. D. 142
Foley, Ex parte (sub. nom. Ex parte May). In re Spackman	Q.B.D.	368	—
———	C.A.	497	13	24 Q. B. D. 728; 59 L. J. Q. B. 306; 62 L. T. 849
Foot v Hodgson	Q.B.D.	—	129	25 Q. B. D. 160; 59 L. J. Q. B. 343
Foster v Barnett	CH.D. STI. J.	—	204	61 L. T. 676
Fox v Fox	CH.D. STI. J.	—	220	62 L. T. 762
Francesco v Barnum	CH.D. CHI. J.	187	89	43 Ch. D. 165; 59 L. J. Ch. 151; 62 L. T. 40
Francis v Bruce. In re George	CH.D. CHI. J.	617	171	44 Ch. D. 627; 63 L. T. 49
——— v Harrison	CH.D. NOR.J.	329	135	43 Ch. D. 183; 59 L. J. Ch. 248; 61 L. T. 62
Frank v Muzeen. In re Wormald	CH.D.NOR. J.	425	124	43 Ch. D. 630; 59 L. J. Ch. 404; 62 L. T. 433
Freeman, Ex parte. In re Freeman	Q.B.D.	—	16	62 L. T. 367
French, In re. Ex parte Ball	C.A.	52	14	24 Q. B. D. 63; 62 L. T. 93
Frisby, In re. Allison v Frisby	C.A.	65	115	43 Ch. D. 106; 59 L. J. Ch. 94; 61 L. T. 632
Frost v Frost. In re Frost	CH.D. KAY, J.	264	218	43 Ch. D. 246; 59 L. J. Ch. 118; 62 L. T. 25
Fry v Fry (see Routh v Fry)
Furlong & Sheehan, In re	V.C. (I.)	—	206	23 L. R. Ir. 407
Gallop v Central Queensland Meat Export Co.	Q.B.D.	621	9	25 Q. B. D. 230; 59 L. J. Q. B. 460; 62 L. T. 834
Galmoye v Cowan	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	124	58 L. J. Ch. 769
Gardner v Ingram	Q.B.D.	—	102	61 L. T. 729
Garrard v Edge	C.A.	455	53	44 Ch. D. 224; 59 L. J. Ch. 379; 62 L. T. 510
Gas Light and Coke Co. v South Metropolitan Gas Co.	H.L.	—	83	62 L. T. 126
Gatling Gun Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	317	32	43 Ch. D. 628; 59 L. J. Ch. 279; 62 L. T. 312
Gee, In re. Ex parte Board of Trade	Q.B.D.	143	19	24 Q. B. D. 65; 59 L. J. Q. B. 16; 61 L. T. 645
Geary's Trusts, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	212	25 L. R. Ir. 171
George, In re. Francis v Bruce	CH.D. CHI. J.	617	171	44 Ch. D. 627; 63 L. T. 49
Gerhard v Montague	Q.B.D.	76	157	61 L. T. 564
Gianachi, In re	CH.D. NOR. J	—	199	58 L. J. Ch. 782
Gibson v Evans	Q.B.D.	—	66	23 Q. B. D. 384; 58 L. J. Q. B. 612; 61 L. T. 388
Gifford v Chelsea Overseers	Q.B.D.	—	74	24 Q. B. D. 141; 59 L. J. Q. B. 98; 61 L. T. 810
Giles, In re. Real and Personal Advance Co. v Michell	C.A.	273	153	43 Ch. D. 391; 59 L. J. Ch. 226; 62 L. T. 375
——— v Walker	Q.B.D.	782	141	24 Q. B. D. 656; 59 L. J. Q. B. 416; 62 L. T. 933
Gillet v Gillet	P.D. & A.D.	144	86	14 P. D. 158; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 84; 61 L. T. 401
Gilmour v Mauriot	P.C.	—	28	14 App. Cas. 646; 59 L. J. P. C. 30; 61 L. T. 442
Glasier v Rolls	C.A.	113	57, 132	59 L. J. Ch. 63; 62 L. T. 305
Glasscock v Balls	C.A.	155	170	24 Q. B. D. 13; 59 L. J. Q. B. 51; 62 L. T. 163
Gooch v Gooch	CH.D. KAY, J	—	211	62 L. T. 384
Goodall's Trade-Mark, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	189	199	42 Ch. D. 566
Gossage's case. Reg. v Barnardo	C.A.	315	85	24 Q. B. D. 283; 59 L. J. Q. B. 345; 62 L. T. 44
Gould v Haynes	Q.B.D.	—	128	59 L. J. M. C. 9; 61 L. T. 732
Graham, Ex parte. In re Blackburn and District Building Society	C.A.	178	43	42 Ch. D. 343; 59 L. J. Ch. 183; 61 L. T. 745
Gray v Gray	V.C. (I.)	—	215	23 L. R. Ir. 399

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Gray v Smith	C.A.	310	143	43 Ch. D. 208; 59 L. J. Ch. 145; 62 L. T. 335
Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Cambridge Improvement Co.	Q.B.D.	—	118	61 L. T. 243
Great Northern Salt and Chemical Works, In re. Ex parte Kennedy	CH.D. STI. J.	—	33, 34	44 Ch. D. 472; 59 L. J. Ch. 288
Greenham v Child	Q.B.D.	94	21	24 Q. B. D. 29; 61 L. T. 563
Gresham Life Assurance Society v Styles	Q.B.D.	480	—	24 Q. B. D. 500; 62 L. T. 464
———	C.A.	696	88	25 Q. B. D. 351
Grieb's case. Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	462	57	59 L. J. Ch. 532; 62 L. T. 561
Griffith v Pound	CH.D. STI. J.	—	159	59 L. J. Ch. 522
Griffiths v Ystradfodwg School Board	Q.B.D.	425	57	24 Q. B. D. 307; 59 L. J. Q. B. 116; 62 L. T. 151
Groove v Johnston	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	169	26 L. R. Ir. 352
Grosvenor v White	CH.D. NOR. J.	201	162	61 L. T. 663
Groves v Musther	C.A.	—	212	43 Ch. D. 569; 59 L. J. Ch. 296
Grubb v Grubb	P.D. & A.D.	—	223	62 L. T. 644
Hagan v Duffin	V.C. (I.)	—	4	23 L. R. Ir. 516
Halifax Sugar Refining Co. v Francklyn	CH.D. STI. J.	—	37	59 L. J. Ch. 591; 62 L. T. 563
Hamilton v Baker. The Sara	H.L.	129	192	14 App. Cas. 209
——— v Lane	V.C. (I.)	—	169	25 L. R. Ir. 189
——— v Merchant Marine Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	—	164	58 L. J. Q. B. 544
Hammond and Waterton, In re	Q.B.D.	—	9	62 L. T. 808
Hanbridge v Beveridge	C.A. (I.)	—	74	26 L. R. Ir. 423
Hancock v Smith	C.A.	—	169	61 L. T. 341
Hardisty v Wells. In re Wells' Trust	CH.D. STI. J.	229	153	42 Ch. D. 646; 58 L. J. Ch. 835; 61 L. T. 588
Hargreaves, In re. Midgley v Tatley	C.A.	470	219	43 Ch. D. 401; 59 L. J. Ch. 384; 62 L. T. 473
Harken, Ex parte	EX.D. (I.)	—	96	24 L. R. Ir. 427
Harold v Daly	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	167	24 L. R. Ir. 412
Harris, Ex parte. In re Harris	C.A.	195	14
——— v Arnott	C.A. (I.)	—	62	26 L. R. Ir. 55
——— v Knight	C.A.	—	222	15 P. D. 170; 62 L. T. 507
——— v Tubb	CH.D. KEK.J.	75	206	42 Ch. D. 19; 58 L. J. Ch. 434; 60 L. T. 699
Harrison's Trade-Mark, In re	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	198	42 Ch. D. 691; 59 L. J. Ch. 22
Harrison, In re. Townson v Harrison	CH.D. NOR. J.	265	3	43 Ch. D. 55; 59 L. J. Ch. 169; 61 L. T. 762
Hart, Ex parte. In re Hart	Q.B.D.	32	15	58 L. J. Q. B. 440; 61 L. T. 256
——— v Colley	CH.D. NOR. J.	440	198	44 Ch. D. 193; 59 L. J. Ch. 355; 62 L. T. 623
Hasluck, Ex parte. In re Lehmann	Q.B.D.	—	16	62 L. T. 941
Hawke v Cole	Q.B.D.	—	169	62 L. T. 658
Hay v Tower Justices	Q.B.D.	414	110	24 Q. B. D. 557; 59 L. J. M. C. 79; 62 L. T. 290
Head's Trustees' and Macdonald's Contract, In re	C.A.	657	208	59 L. J. Ch. 604; 63 L. T. 21
Headington Guardians v Ipswich Guardians	C.A.	586	150	25 Q. B. D. 143; 59 L. J. M. C. 92; 62 L. T. 786
Heap v Hartley	C.A.	136	146	42 Ch. D. 61; 58 L. J. Ch. 796; 61 L. T. 538
Hecla Foundry Co. v Walker	H.L.	—	65	14 App. Cas. 550; 59 L. J. P. C. 46; 61 L. T. 738
Hecquard, In re. Baird, Ex parte	C.A.	148	18	24 Q. B. D. 71
Helby v Dear. In re Dear	CH.D. KAY, J.	31	215	58 L. J. Ch. 659; 61 L. T. 432
Hemingway v Braithwaite	Q.B.D.	—	125	61 L. T. 224
Hemming v Neil	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	203	62 L. T. 649
Henderson v Bank of Australasia	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	37	62 L. T. 869
Hendon Local Board v Pounce	CH.D. NOR. J.	377	117	43 Ch. D. 682; 61 L. T. 465
Hepburn, Ex parte. In re Smith	C.A.	744	19
Herepath, In re. Ex parte Delmar	Q.B.D.	752	17
Hermod, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	188	62 L. T. 670
Hickley v Greenwood	Q.B.D.	656	20	25 Q. B. D. 277; 59 L. J. Q. B. 413
Hickman v Birch	Q.B.D.	—	85	24 Q. B. D. 172
Highgate, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	188	62 L. T. 841
Highworth Guardians v Westbury-on-Severn Guardians	H.L.	295	150	14 App. Cas. 465; 59 L. J. M. C. 29; 61 L. T 733
Hind, Ex parte. In re Hind	Q.B.D.	—	17	62 L. T 327
Hirst's Mortgage Trust, In re	CH.D. NOR.J.	685	135
Hobbs v Hudson	Q.B.D.	639	—	62 L. T. 764
———	C.A.	682	66	25 Q. B. D. 232
Hoblyn v Hoblyn	CH.D. KEK.J	12	182	41 Ch D. 200; 60 L. T. 499
Hoby v Birch	Q.B.D.	—	44	59 L. J. Q. B. 247; 62 L. T. 404
Hodgson v Bell	C.A.	325	59	24 Q. B. D. 525; 59 L. J. Q. B. 231; 62 L. T. 481
Holmes v Holmes	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	216	62 L. T. 383
Holtby v Hodgson	C.A.	68	124	24 Q. B. D. 103; 59 L. J. Q. B. 46; 62 L. T. 145
Hopkins v Smethwick Local Board	C.A.	499	116	24 Q. B. D. 712; 59 L. J. Q. B. 250; 62 L. T. 783
Horne v Pountain	Q.B.D.	240	121	23 Q. B. D. 354; 58 L. J. Q. B. 413; 61 L. T. 510
Hornsey Local Board v Monarch Building Society	C.A.	85	115	24 Q. B. D. 1; 59 L. J. Q. B. 105; 61 L. T. 867
Hubbard v Goodley	Q.B.D.	639	59	25 Q. B. D. 256; 59 L. J. Q. B. 285; 62 L. T. 736

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Hudson v Ferneyhough	Q.B.D.	—	164	61 L. T 722
Hughes v Smallwood	Q.B.D.	—	100	25 Q. B. D. 306; 59 L. J. Q. B. 503
Huish, In re. Bradshaw v Huish	CH.D. KAY, J.	199	213	43 Ch. D 260; 59 L. J. Ch. 135; 62 L. T. 52
Hulton v Lister	C.A.	—	144	62 L. T. 200
Hume v Somerton	Q.B.D.	748	164	25 Q. B. D. 239; 59 L. J. Q. B. 420
Hunt, In re. Davies v Hetherington	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	220	62 L. T. 753
Hurlbatt, Ex parte (sub nom. The Trustee). In re Ridgway	Q.B.D.	432	19	62 L. T. 647
Huth v Clarke	Q.B.D.	655	117	25 Q. B. D. 391; 59 L. J. M. C. 120
Hutton v Anderson	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	181	58 L. J. Ch. 823; 61 L. T. 458
Ilchester (Earl) v Raishley	CH.D. KEK. J	104	81	61 L. T. 477
Inland Revenue Commissioners v Angus. Inland Revenue Commissioners v Lewis	C.A.	3	196	23 Q. B. D. 579; 61 L. T. 832
Irwin v Irwin and Layard	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 53; 62 L. T. 612
Isle of Cyprus, The	P.D. & A.D.	719	67	15 P. D. 134
Issard v Lambert. In re Davies	C.A.	584	3	44 Ch. D. 253; 59 L. J. Ch. 516; 62 L. T. 84
Jacobs v Schwaltz	Q.B.D.	—	193	62 L. T. 121
Jay v Robinson	C.A.	550	125	25 Q. B. D. 467; 59 L. J. Q. B. 367
Jenney v Mackintosh	C.A.	—	162	61 L. T. 108
Jobson v Richardson	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	220	44 Ch. D. 154; 59 L. J. Ch. 245; 61 L. T. 148
Jodrell, In re. Jodrell v Seale	CH.D. STI. J.	267	218
———	C.A.	721	—	44 Ch. D. 590; 59 L. J. Ch. 538; 63 L. T. 15
Johnson v Evans	C.A.	—	138	61 L. T. 18
——— v Lindsay	C.A.	119	127	23 Q. B. D. 508; 58 L. J. Q. B. 581; 61 L. T. 864
——— v Wilcock	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	—	62 L. T. 317
——— v Wild	CH.D. CHI. J.	500	100	44 Ch. D. 146; 59 L. J. Ch 322; 62 L. T. 537
Johnston v O'Neill	V.C. (I.)	—	167	23 L. R. Ir. 430
Jones, Ex parte. In re Jones	Q.B.D.	429	—
———	C.A.	609	15	59 L. J. Q. B. 331
———, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	203	202	59 L. J. Ch. 157; 61 L. T. 554
———, In re. Dutton v Brookfield	CH.D. NOR. J.	90	207	59 L. J. Ch. 31; 62 L. T. 661
——— v Bangor Mutual Shipping Insurance Society	Q.B.D.	—	95	61 L. T. 727
——— v Clancy	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	81	26 L. R. Ir. 161
——— v Julian	M.R. (I.)	—	203	25 L. R. Ir. 45
——— v Marshall	Q.B.D.	269	148	24 Q. B. D. 269; 59 L. J. Q. B. 123; 61 L. T. 721
——— v Padgett.	Q.B.D.	782	177	24 Q. B. D. 650; 59 L. J. Q. B. 261
——— v Simes	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	158	43 Ch. D. 607; 59 L. J. Ch. 351; 62 L. T. 447
——— v Tower Furnishing Co.	Q.B.D.	—	23	61 L. T. 84
——— v Watts	C.A.	725	66	43 Ch. D. 574; 62 L. T. 471
Joplin v Postlethwaite	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	10	61 L. T. 629
Jordan v Mecredy	M.R. (I.)	—	166	23 L. R. Ir. 421
Joyce v Boyle	C.A. (I.)	—	167	24 L. R. Ir. 455
Kearley v Thomson	C.A.	614	48	24 Q. B. D. 472; 59 L. J. Q. B. 288; 63 L. T. 150
Kearney, In re	L.J. (I.)	—	167	25 L. R. Ir. 89
Kearns v Oliver	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	103	24 L. R. Ir. 478
Keeling v Smith. In re Smith	CH.D. STI. J.	380	212	44 Ch. D. 654; 59 L. J. Ch. 234; 62 L. T. 181
Keeson v Luxmore	P.D. & A.D.	—	193	61 L. T. 199
Kelly v Lord Massareene	C.A. (I.)	—	102	26 L. R. Ir. 199
Kennane v Mackay	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	167	24 L. R. Ir. 495
Kennedy v Kennedy and Schurch	P.D. & A.D.	—	71	62 L. T. 705
——— v Lyell	H.L.	353	79	14 App. Cas. 437; 59 L. J. Q. B. 268; 62 L. T. 77
Kenrick v Lawrence	Q.B.D.	779	50	25 Q. B. D. 99
Ker v Dent	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	217	62 L. T 55
Kershaw, In re. Whitaker v Kershaw	C.A.	497	54	44 Ch. D. 296; 62 L. T. 776
Kinahan v Kinahan	CH.D. KEK. J.	655	197	45 Ch. D. 78; 62 L. T. 715
King, In re. Salisbury v Ridley	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	215	62 L. T 789
King v Charing Cross Bank	Q.B.D.	287	156	24 Q. B. D. 27; 59 L. J. Q. B. 26; 62 L. T. 42
——— v Whitten	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	219	62 L. T. 391
Kingsford, Ex parte	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	198	61 L. T. 426
Knight v Engle	Q.B.D.	—	161	61 L. T. 780
Knill v Towse	Q.B.D.	383	—
———	C.A.	521	73	24 Q. B. D. 697; 59 L. J. Q. B. 455; 63 L. T. 47
L., In re	BANK. (I.)	—	14	23 L. R. Ir. 528
Lambert v Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co.	C.A. (I.)	—	105	24 L. R. Ir. 164
Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v Bolton Union Assessment Committee	C.A.	—	119	23 Q. B. D. 555; 58 L. J. Q. B. 256; 61 L. T. 782
——— v Bury (Mayor of)	H.L.	—	172	14 App. Cas. 417; 59 L. J. Q. B. 85; 61 L. T. 427
Lang v Whitecross	Q.B.D.	—	145	62 L. T. 119

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Laughton, Ex parte. In re Building Societies Trust Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	458	42	44 Ch. D. 140; 59 L. J. Ch. 638; 62 L. T. 360
Law Courts and Chambers Co., In re.	CH.D. STI. J.	—	42	61 L. T. 669
Law Guarantee, &c., Society v Bank of England	Q.B.D.	493	12	24 Q. B. D. 407; 62 L. T. 496
Lawrance v Norreys	H.L.	753	113	15 App. Cas. 210; 62 L. T. 706
Lawrence v Horton	CH.D. CHI. J.	555	112	59 L. J. Ch. 440; 62 L. T. 749
Lawson v Ward.	C.A.	300	—	43 Ch. D. 353; 59 L. J. Ch. 323; 62 L. T. 158
Layton, Steel, & Co., In re.	CH.D. NOR. J.	652	56
Lea v Charrington	C.A.	—	121	23 Q. B. D. 372; 58 L. J. Q. B. 460; 61 L. T. 450
Leake v Driffield.	Q.B.D.	93	122	24 Q. B. D. 98; 59 L. J. Q. B. 89; 61 L. T. 771
Learmouth v Learmouth	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 14; 62 L. T. 603
Lee v Barne	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	53	62 L. T. 922
Leeson v General Medical Council	C.A.	303	128	43 Ch. D. 366; 59 L. J. Ch. 253; 61 L. T. 869
Lennox Publishing Co., Ex parte. In re Storey	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	33	62 L. T. 791
Leven, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	213	15 P. D. 24; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 35
Levy, In re. Ex parte Essex (Sheriff of).	Q.B.D.	784	185
Lickorish, Ex parte. In re Wallis	C.A.	482	195	25 Q. B. D. 176; 59 L. J. Q. B. 500; 62 L. T. 694
Lister v Lister	C.A.	81	70	15 P. D. 4; 62 L. T. 90
—— v Stubbs	C.A.	548	168	45 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 570; 63 L. T. 75
Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steamship Co. v Campanhia Bahiana de Navajacio	H.L.	—	186	62 L. T. 84
Liverpool Household Store Association, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	35	59 L. J. Ch. 616; 62 L. T. 873
Lloyd, Ex parte. In re Lloyd	Q.B.D.	—	16	62 L. T. 366
London Library v Carter	Q.B.D.	478	91	62 L. T. 466
London and North-Western Railway Co. v Boulton	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	207	62 L. T. 393
—— v Hughes	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	172	26 L. R. Ir. 165
London Steamship Owners' Mutual Insurance Association v Grampian Steamship Co.	Q.B.D.	190	—	24 Q. B. D. 32
——	C.A.	651	94	24 Q. B. D. 663; 62 L. T. 784
London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., In re	Q.B.D.	332	—	24 Q. B. D. 40
——	C.A.	343	106	24 Q. B. D. 326; 59 L. J. Q. B. 162; 62 L. T. 306
London and Westminster Bread Co., In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	277	44	59 L. J. Ch. 155; 62 L. T. 224
Lore, In re	C.A. (I.)	—	13	23 L. R. Ir. 365
Lowden v Blakey	Q.B.D.	64	65	23 Q. B. D. 332; 58 L. J. Q. B. 617; 61 L. T. 251
Lowe, Ex parte. In re Lowe	Q.B.D.	560	13	62 L. T. 263
Lyell v Kennedy	H.L.	353	115	14 App. Cas. 437; 59 L. J. Q. B. 268; 62 L. T. 77
Lynch v Macan (2)	EX.D. (I.)	—	56	26 L. R. Ir. 388
Macalpin v Macdonald	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	6	59 L. J. Ch. 231
Macarthur v Macarthur	P.D. & A.D.	—	87	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 61 L. T. 308
Macartney v Garbutt.	Q.B.D.	559	151	24 Q. B. D. 368; 62 L. T. 656
Macdougall v Knight	H.L.	44	109	14 App. Cas. 194; 58 L. J. Q. B. 587; 60 L. T. 762
—— (2)	C.A.	553	110	25 Q. B. D. 1; 63 L. T. 43
Macgrath v Buchanan	C.A. (I.)	—	75	26 L. R. Ir. 124
Mackenzie v Childers.	CH.D. KAY, J.	243	64	43 Ch. D. 205; 59 L. J. Ch. 188; 62 L. T. 98
Mackintosh v Romford Local Board.	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	118	61 L. T. 185
Macnee v Persian Investment Corporation	CH.D. CHI. J.	596	39	44 Ch. D. 306; 62 L. T. 894
Macrea v Buchanan	C.A. (I.)	—	74	26 L. R. Ir. 129
Magneta, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	188	15 P. D. 101; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 55; 63 L. T. 114
Mainwaring, In re. Crawford v Royal Infirmary	CH.D. KEK. J.	412	217	43 Ch. D. 643; 59 L. J. Ch. 351; 62 L. T. 63
Manchester Overseers v Ormskirk Guardians	Q.B.D.	778	150	24 Q. B. D. 678; 59 L. J. M. C. 103; 62 L. T. 661
Manchester Royal Infirmary v Attorney-General	CH.D. NOR. J.	460	28	43 Ch. D. 420; 59 L. J. Ch. 370; 62 L. T. 419
Mandeville v Mandeville	C.A. (I.)	—	79	23 L. R. Ir. 339
Manning v Commissioner of Titles for Western Australia	P.C.	—	210	15 App. Cas. 195
Mansfield v Mansfield	C.A	—	125	43 Ch. D. 12; 62 L. T. 15
Marine and General Land, Building, and Investment Co., In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	41	62 L. T. 723
Mark Lane, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	192	15 P. D. 135
Marks v Beyfus	C.A.	705	77	59 L. J. Q. B. 479
Marsh v Estcourt	Q.B.D.	495	73	24 Q. B. D. 147; 59 L. J. Q. B. 100
Mason & Barry v Comptoir D'Escompte	Q.B.D.	685	157
Mason v Mason	P.D. & A.D.	—	87	61 L. T. 304

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Massareene v Bellew	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	104	24 L. R. Ir. 420
Massy v Gahan	V.C. (I.)	—	5	23 L. R. Ir. 518
Matheson v Goodwyn	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	184	62 L. T. 216
Maule v Maule	P.D. & A.D.	—	221	62 L. T. 702
Maw v Jones	Q.B.D.	718	8	25 Q. B. D. 107
May, Ex parte. In re Spackman	Q.B.D.	368	—
———,	C.A.	497	13	24 Q. B. D. 728
———, In re. Crawford v May	CH.D. NOR. J.	765	122
Mayor v Collins	Q.B.D.	349	66	24 Q. B. D. 361; 59 L. J. Q. B. 199; 62 L. T. 326
McAuliffe v Fitzsimons	EX.D. (I.)	—	116	26 L. R. Ir. 29
McCabe v Bank of Ireland	H.L.	257	55	14 App. Cas. 413; 61 L. T. 416
McDonnell v Great Southern and Western Railway Co.	EX.D. (I.)	—	173	24 L. R. Ir. 369
——— v Morrow	V.C. (I.)	—	219	23 L. R. Ir. 591
McGrath, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	Q.B.D.	416	16	24 Q. B. D. 466; 62 L. T. 122
McGregor & Co.'s Trade Mark, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	198	61 L. T. 434
McLardy v Slateum	Q.B.D.	349	165	24 Q. B. D. 504; 59 L. J. Q. B. 154; 62 L. T. 151
McMullen v Wadsworth	P.C.	—	28	14 App. Cas 631; 59 L. J. P. C. 7; 61 L. T. 487
McNeill v Thompson	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	102	24 L. R. Ir. 444
McOnie v Whyte	H.L.	—	178	15 App. Cas. 156
McVicker's Contract, In re	V.C. (I.)	—	205, 214	25 L. R. Ir. 307
Meadows v Taylor	Q.B.D.	—	97	59 L. J. M. C. 99; 62 L. T. 658
Medway Guardians v Bedminster Guardians	H.L.	295	150	14 App. Cas. 465; 59 L. J. M. C. 29; 61 L. T. 733
Mellersh v Brown	CH.D. KAY, J.	732	134
Membery v Great Western Railway Co.	H.L.	145	127	14 App. Cas. 179; 58 L. J. H. L. 563; 61 L. T. 566
Memnon, The	H.L.	—	186	62 L. T. 84
Mennons v Burke	EX.D. (I.)	—	104	26 L. R. Ir. 193
Menzies, Ex parte. In re New Eberhardt Co.	C.A.	97	33	43 Ch. D. 118; 59 L. J. Ch. 73; 62 L. T. 301
Metcalfe v Metcalfe	CH.D. KEK. J.	397	214	43 Ch. D. 633; 59 L. J. Ch. 159; 61 L. T. 767
Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, In re. Grieb's case	CH.D. KEK. J.	462	57	59 L. J. Ch. 532; 62 L. T. 561
———, In re. Wainwright's case	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	39, 95	62 L. T. 30
Mexican Santa Barbara Mining Co., Ex parte. In re Perkins	C.A.	710	17	24 Q. B. D. 613
Meyerstein's Trade-Mark, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	440	200	43 Ch. D. 604; 59 L. J. Ch. 401; 62 L. T. 526
Midgley v Tatley. In re Hargreaves	C.A.	470	219	43 Ch. D. 401; 59 L. J. Ch. 384; 62 L. T. 473
Midland Railway v Robinson	H.L.	577	173	15 App. Cas. 19; 59 L. J. Ch. 442; 62 L. T. 194
Miles, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	7	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 59
——— v Miles	CH.D. KAY, J	—	221	61 L. T. 359
Millar, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	124	25 L. R. Ir. 167
Mills v Millward	P.D. & A.D.	—	223	15 P. D. 20; 61 L. T. 651
Milnes v Foden	P.D. & A.D.	—	222	15 P. D. 105
Minshull, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	80	7	14 P. D. 151; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 69; 61 L. T. 257
Mitchell v Simpson	C.A.	565	11	25 Q. B. D. 183; 59 L. J. Q. B. 355
Mitford Guardians v Wayland Guardians	C.A.	632	150	25 Q. B. D. 164; 59 L. J. M. C. 86
Moir v Blacker	C.A. (I.)	—	104	26 L. R. Ir. 375
Montreal Corporation v Ecclesiastiques de St. Sulpice	P.C.	—	27	14 App. Cas. 660; 59 L. J. P. C. 20; 61 L. T. 653
Moon v Dickinson	CH.D. NOR. J.	278	141
Moore v Gamgee	Q.B.D.	669	58	25 Q. B. D. 244
Morgan v Hutchins	Q.B.D.	412	127	59 L. J. Q. B. 197
Morris, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	496	4	15 P. D. 9; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 16; 61 L. T. 652
——— v Fowler	CH.D. CHI. J.	522	11	44 Ch. D. 151; 59 L. J. Ch. 407; 62 L. T. 758
——— v Latchford	M.R. (I.)	—	6	23 L. R. Ir. 333
Moxon v Berkeley Mutual Benefit Building Society	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	138	59 L. J. Ch. 524; 62 L. T. 250
——— v Sheppard	Q.B.D.	704	193	24 Q. B. D. 627; 59 L. J. Q. B. 286
Muirhead v Muirhead	H.L.	—	178	15 App. Cas. 289
Mumford v Collier	Q.B.D.	716	132	25 Q. B. D. 279
Murray v Watkins	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	114	62 L. T. 796
Murtagh v Barry	Q.B.D.	526	59	24 Q. B. D. 632; 59 L. J. Q. B. 388
Mustapha, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	6	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 61; 62 L. T. 606
Mutual Provident Land Building Society v Macmillan	P.C.	—	140	14 App. Cas. 597; 59 L. J. P. C. 22; 61 L. T. 486
Myers v Catterson	C.A.	488	112	43 Ch. D. 470; 59 L. J. Ch. 315; 62 L. T. 205
——— v Myers	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	144	61 L. T. 757
Naf (Gebruder) v Ploton	C.A.	566	161	25 Q. B. D. 13; 59 L. J. Q. B. 371
National Permanent Mutual Benefit Building Society, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	475	25	43 Ch. D. 431; 59 L. J. Ch. 403; 62 L. T. 596
Neath Building Society v Luce	CH.D. CHI. J.	122	26	43 Ch. D. 158; 59 L. J. Ch. 3; 61 L. T. 611
Neison v Walters	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	204	61 L. T. 872

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Neville v Thacker	C.A. (I.)	—	217	23 L. R. Ir. 3
New Eberhardt Co., In re. Ex parte Menzies	C.A.	97	33	43 Ch. D. 118; 59 L. J. Ch. 73; 62 L. T. 301
Newbald v Beckitt	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	211	62 L. T. 533
Newbould v Smith	H.L.	—	115	14 App. Cas. 423; 61 L. T. 814
Newman v London and South-Western Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	348	67	24 Q. B. D. 454; 59 L. J. Q. B. 341; 62 L. T. 290
New South Wales (Bank of) v O'Connor	P.C.	465	134	14 App. Cas. 273; 60 L. T. 467
Newton's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	183	61 L. T. 787
New York Fire Insurance Co. v Styles	H.L.	—	89	14 App. Cas. 381; 61 L. T. 201
Nicholl v Eberhardt Co.	C.A.	—	46	61 L. T. 489
Nichols v Baker. In re Baker	C.A.	417	5	44 Ch. D. 262; 59 L. J. Ch. 661; 62 L. T. 817
Nicholson v Yeoman	Q.B.D.	—	75	24 Q. B. D. 145; 59 L. J. Q. B. 104; 61 L. T 833
Niemann v Niemann	C.A.	258	143	43 Ch. D. 198; 59 L. J. Ch. 220; 62 L. T. 339
Nizam's Guaranteed State Railways Co. v Wyatt	Q.B.D.	—	88	24 Q. B. D. 548; 59 L. J. Q. B. 430; 62 L. T. 765
Norfolk (Duke of) v Lamarque	Q.B.D.	382	89	24 Q. B. D. 485; 59 L. J. Q. B. 119; 62 L. T. 153
Norman v Binnington	Q.B.D.	702	185	25 Q. B. D. 475; 59 L. J. Q. B. 490; 63 L. T 109
North Australian Territory Co., In re	C.A.	561	36	59 L. J. Ch. 654; 63 L. T. 77
—— v Goldsbrough & Co.	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	41	61 L. T. 716
North Shore Railway Co. v Pion	P.C.	—	176	14 App. Cas. 612; 59 L. J. P. C. 25; 61 L. T. 525
Northampton (Marquis) v Pollock	CH.D. NOR. J.	346	137	62 L. T. 313
Nouvion v Freeman	H.L.	581	76	15 App. Cas. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 337; 62 L. T. 189
Oddy, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	5	62 L. T. 643
O'Donovan v Dillon	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	166	24 L. R. Ir. 442
Official Receiver, Ex parte. In re Gordon	Q.B.D.	—	135	61 L. T. 299
——. In re McGrath	Q.B.D.	416	16	24 Q. B. D. 466; 62 L. T. 122
——. In re Sankey (sub nom. Solicitor)	C.A.	533	196	25 Q. B. D. 17
——. In re Spalding	Q.B.D.	—	91	61 L. T. 83
——. In re Watson	C.A.	567	23	25 Q. B. D. 27; 59 L. J. Q. B. 394
O'Gorman's Trusts, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	202	25 L. R. Ir. 93
Old v Robson	Q.B.D.	415	82	59 L. J. M. C. 41; 62 L. T. 282
Olive, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	459	108	44 Ch. D. 316; 59 L. J. Ch. 360; 62 L. T. 626
Oliver's claim. East London Railway Co., In re	C.A.	312	106	24 Q. B. D. 507; 63 L. T. 147
Oliver and Scott's Arbitration, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	476	9	43 Ch. D. 310; 59 L. J. Ch. 148; 61 L. T. 552
Oliver v Hunting	CH.D. KEK. J.	618	82	44 Ch. D. 205; 59 L. J. Ch. 255; 62 L. T. 108
Oslow v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	445	196	24 Q. B. D. 584; 59 L. J. Q. B. 321; 62 L. T. 461
—— (2)	C.A.	728	155	25 Q. B. D. 465
Opera Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	637	40	62 L. T. 859
Orchis, The	C.A.	472	189	15 P. D. 38; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 31; 62 L. T. 407
O'Rourke, In re	L.J. (I.)	—	135	23 L. R. Ir. 497
O'Shea v O'Shea and Parnell. Tuoby, In re	C.A.	374	154	15 P. D. 59; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 47; 62 L. T. 713
Otto v Singer	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	147	62 L. T. 220
Owens v Hanraban	C.A. (I.)	—	74	26 L. R. Ir. 418
Pain v Boughtwood	Q.B.D.	428	7	24 Q. B. D. 353; 59 L. J. M. C. 45; 62 L. T. 284
Palmer, In re	C.A.	673	195	59 L. J. Ch. 575; 62 L. T. 778
—— v McCormick	C.A. (I.)	—	105	25 L. R. Ir. 110
Parker v Duncan	P.D. & A.D.	—	222	62 L. T. 642
Parnell v Walter	Q.B.D.	270	66	24 Q. B. D. 441; 59 L. J. Q. B. 125; 62 L. T. 76
Parry, In re. Scott v Leak	CH.D. NOR. J.	226	4	42 Ch. D. 570; 61 L. T. 380
Parsons, In re. Stockley v Parsons	CH.D. KAY, J.	712	123	45 Ch. D. 51; 59 L. J. Ch. 666; 62 L. T. 929
—— v Brand	C.A.	388	20	25 Q. B. D. 100; 59 L. J. Q. B. 189; 62 L. T. 479
Partridge v General Council of Medical Education and Registration	C.A.	729	64	25 Q. B. D. 90; 59 L. J. Q. B. 475
Patrick v Simpson	Q.B.D.	—	113	24 Q. B. D. 128; 59 L. J. Q. B. 7; 61 L. T. 686
Patton, In the Goods of	P. & D.D. (I.)	—	79	23 L. R. Ir. 435
Paul, In re	Q.B.D.	—	99	24 Q. B. D. 247; 59 L. J. Q. B. 30; 61 L. T. 835
Pennefather, In re. Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy v Christ Church, Oxford	CH.D. STI. J.	172	31	42 Ch. D. 624; 58 L. J. Ch. 578; 61 L. T. 109
Pelsall Coal and Iron Co. v London and North-Western Railway Co.	R.C.C.	—	173	61 L. T. 257
Perry v Thornton	V.C. (I.)	—	81	23 L. R. Ir. 402
Perkins, In re. Ex parte Mexican Santa Barbara Mining Co.	C.A.	710	17	24 Q. B. D. 613; 59 L. J. Q. B. 226
Pharmaceutical Society v Wheeldon	Q.B.D.	—	148	24 Q. B. D. 683; 59 L. J. Q. B. 400; 62 L. T. 727
Philips v Cayley	C.A.	241	152	43 Ch. D. 222; 59 L. J. Ch. 177; 62 L. T. 86
—— v Homfray	CH.D. STI. J.	—	95	44 Ch. D. 694; 59 L. J. Ch. 547; 62 L. T. 897
—— v Ivel Cycle Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	52	62 L. T. 392
—— v Martin	P.C.	—	164	15 App. Cas. 193

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Phillips v Rees	C.A.	53	100	24 Q. B. D. 17; 59 L. J. Q. B. 1; 61 L. T. 713
——— v Thomas	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	142	62 L. T. 793
Pilson v Allen	L.J. (I.)	—	103	25 L. R. Ir. 5
Poe v Shortt	M.R. (I.)	—	80	23 L. R. Ir. 328
Pool v Pool	P.D. & A.D.	—	55	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 67; 61 L. T. 401
Poppleton, Ex parte. In re Locke	Q.B.D.	—	59	62 L. T. 942
Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, In re. Badman's and Bosanquet's cases	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	39	62 L. T. 179
———. Steele's case	C.A.	—	38	42 Ch. D. 160; 62 L. T. 88
Postlethwaite v Port Philip Gold Mining Co.	CH.D. STI. J.	246	45	43 Ch. D. 462; 59 L. J. Ch. 201; 62 L. T. 60
Pound, Son, & Hutchins, In re. Ex parte Debenture Corporation	C.A.	18	34	42 Ch. D. 402; 58 L. J. Ch. 792; 62 L. T. 137
Powell v Powell	P.D. & A.D.	—	98	14 P. D. 177; 61 L. T. 436
Praed v Graham	C.A.	103	109	24 Q. B. D. 53; 59 L. J. Q. B. 230
Pratt v Inman	CH. D. CHI. J.	200	163	43 Ch. D. 175; 59 L. J. Ch. 274; 61 L. T. 760
Preece v Harding	Q.B.D.	350	73	24 Q. B. D. 110; 59 L. J. Q. B. 382; 61 L. T. 837
Pridham, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	5	61 L. T. 302
Priest v Uppleby. In re Salmon	C.A.	150	156, 203	42 Ch. D. 351; 61 L. T. 146
Proctor v Bayley	C.A.	100	146	42 Ch. D. 390; 59 L. J. Ch. 12; 61 L. T. 733
Proudfoot v Hart.	C.A.	730	101	25 Q. B. D. 42; 59 L. J. Q. B. 389
Prout v Gregory	Q.B D.	204	11	24 Q. B. D. 281; 59 L. J. Q. B. 118
Provincial Bank of Ireland v O'Reilly	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	12	26 L. R. Ir. 313
Prytherch v Williams	CH. D. NOR. J.	61	137	42 Ch. D. 590; 59 L. J. Ch. 79; 61 L. T. 799
Pure Spirit Co. v Fowler	Q.B.D.	686	54	25 Q. B. D. 235
Pyle Works, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	282	—
———	C.A.	674	32	44 Ch. D. 534; 59 L. J. Ch. 489; 62 L. T. 887
Pyman v Dreyfus	Q.B.D.	447	191	24 Q. B. D. 152; 59 L. J. Q. B. 13; 61 L. T. 724
Rae v Meek	H.L.	—	179	14 App. Cas. 558
Raggett v Browne	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	212	61 L. T. 463
Raikes v Raikes. In re Tunno	CH.D. CHI. J.	636	211	45 Ch. D. 66; 59 L. J. Ch. 579; 63 L. T. 23
Rankin, In re. Ex parte McMurty	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	104	24 L. R. Ir. 290
Ravensthorpe Local Board v Hincheliffe	Q.B.D.	—	116	24 Q. B. D. 168; 59 L. J. M. C. 19; 61 L. T. 780
Rawlings v King. Rawlings v Oliver. Rawlings v Wilkinson. In re Sunderland 32nd and 36th Building Societies	Q.B.D.	509	27	24 Q. B. D. 394; 59 L. J. Q. B. 217; 62 L. T. 293
Read's Design, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	88	65	42 Ch. D. 260; 58 L. J. Ch. 624; 61 L. T. 450
Read v Joannon	Q.B.D.	734	22	25 Q. B. D. 300
——— v Lincoln (Bishop of)	C. OF A. OF C.	—	72	14 P. D. 88; 61 L. T. 403
——— (2)	C. OF A. OF C.	—	72	14 P. D. 148
Real and Personal Advance Co. v Michell. In re Giles	C.A.	273	158	43 Ch. D. 391; 59 L. J. Ch. 226; 62 L. T. 375
Recepta, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	186	14 P. D. 131; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 61 L. T. 698
Red Rock Gold Mining Co., In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	41	61 L. T. 785
Reed v Nutt	Q.B.D.	621	98	24 Q. B. D. 669; 59 L. J. Q. B. 311; 62 L. T 635
Rees v Richmond	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	159	62 L. T. 427
———, In re. Williams v Davies	CH.D. STI. J.	523	218	44 Ch. D. 484; 59 L. J. Ch. 305
Reeves v Penrose	EX.D. (I.)	—	63	26 L. R. Ir. 141
Reg. v Barker	C.C.R.	—	85	25 Q. B. D. 213; 59 L. J. M. C. 105; 62 L. T. 578
——— v Barnardo. Gossage's case	C.A.	315	85	24 Q. B. D. 283; 59 L. J. Q. B. 345; 62 L. T. 44
——— v Beck	C.C.R.	—	61	61 L. T. 596
——— v Birwistle	Q.B.D.	—	86	58 L. J. M. C. 158
——— v Bloomsbury County Court Judge	Q.B.D.	320	58	24 Q. B. D. 309; 62 L. T. 286
——— v Bridge	Q.B.D.	464	99	24 Q. B. D. 609; 59 L. J. M. C. 49; 62 L. T. 297
——— v Bromley Justices	Q.B.D.	253	99	24 Q. B. D. 181; 59 L. J. M. C. 51; 62 L. T. 117
——— v Brown	C.C.R.	95	61	24 Q. B. D. 357; 59 L. J. M. C. 47 61 L. T. 596
——— v Carlow Justices	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	105	24 L. R. Ir. 492
——— v City of London Court Judge	Q.B.D.	638	58	25 Q. B. D. 339; 59 L. J. Q. B. 427
——— v Coll	M.R. (I.)	—	77	24 L. R. Ir. 522
——— v Cowper	Q.B.D.	207	—	24 Q. B. D. 60
———	C.A.	408	59	24 Q. B. D. 533; 59 L. J. Q. B. 275; 62 L. T. 583
——— v Cross	C.C.R.	336	61	24 Q. B. D. 420; 59 L. J. M. C. 77; 62 L. T. 124
——— v Evans	Q.B.D.	—	96	62 L. T. 570
——— v Foley	C.C.R. (I.)	—	62	26 L. R. Ir. 299
——— v Garner	C.C.R.	—	77	61 L. T. 699
——— v Glamorganshire Justices	Q.B.D.	640	97	24 Q. B. D. 675; 62 L. T. 730
——— v Goldcross Justices	Q.B.D.	—	111	62 L. T. 112
——— v Halliday	C.C.R.	256	62	61 L. T. 701

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Reg. v Hereford County Council	Q.B.D.	775	121
—— v Holt	Q.B.D.	236	119	24 Q. B. D. 178; 59 L. J. Q. B. 113; 62 L. T. 117
—— v James	C.C.R.	—	62	24 Q. B. D. 439; 59 L. J. M. C. 96
—— v Kent Justices. See Reg. v Bromley Justices
—— v London (Bishop of)	C.A.	214	72	24 Q. B. D. 213; 59 L. J. Q. B. 169; 62 L. T. 167
—— v London Justices. Ex parte Buckle	Q.B.D.	269	110	24 Q. B. D. 341; 59 L. J. M. C. 71; 62 L. T. 458
—— v Miles	C.C.R.	334, 337	61	24 Q. B. D. 423; 59 L. J. M. C. 56; 62 L. T. 572
—— v Paul	C.C.R.	704	77	25 Q. B. D. 202; 62 L. T. 845
—— v St. Pancras Vestry	Q.B.D.	238	—
——	C.A.	311	130	24 Q. B. D. 371; 59 L. J. Q. B. 244; 62 L. T. 440
—— v Vaile	Q.B.D.	—	139	23 Q. B. D. 483; 58 L. J. M. C. 165; 61 L. T. 253
—— v Williamson	Q.B.D.	769	83	59 L. J. Q. B. 493
Reichel v Magrath	H.L.	—	161	14 App. Cas. 665
Reigate Guardians v Croydon Guardians	H.L.	295	149	14 App. Cas. 465; 59 L. J. M. C. 29; 61 L. T. 733
Reilly v Booth	C.A.	484	210	44 Ch. D. 12; 62 L. T. 378
Reinhardt v Mentasti	CH.D. KEK.J	10	142	42 Ch. D. 685; 58 L. J. Ch. 787; 61 L. T. 328
Rendall v Blair	C.A.	689	30	59 L. J. Ch. 641
Restitution Steamship Co. v Pirie	Q.B.D.	—	189	61 L. T. 330
Rhodes v Rhodes	C.A.	385	48	44 Ch. D. 94; 59 L. J. Ch. 298; 62 L. T. 342
Rhymney Railway Co. v Rhymney Iron Co.	C.A.	764	95, 174	25 Q. B. D. 146; 59 L. J. Q. B. 414
Richard v Talbot	Q.B.D.	478	155
Richards v Butcher	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	197	62 L. T. 867
Rickett v Sharp	CH.D. STI. J.	—	204	62 L. T. 364
——	C.A.	—	216	62 L. T. 677
Ridgway, In re. Ex parte The Trustee (Hurlbatt)	Q.B.D.	432	19	62 L. T. 647
River Derwent, The	C.A.	—	187	62 L. T. 45
Roberts, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	225	195	43 Ch. D. 52; 59 L. J. Ch. 25
—— v Woodward	Q.B.D.	770	210	25 Q. B. D. 412
Robertson, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	170	56	42 Ch. D. 553; 58 L. J. Ch. 833; 62 L. T. 38
—— v Hartopp	C.A.	—	87	43 Ch. D. 484; 59 L. J. Ch. 553; 62 L. T. 585
Robinson v Jenkins	C.A.	360	95	24 Q. B. D. 275; 59 L. J. Q. B. 147; 62 L. T. 439
—— v Nevill	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	139	59 L. J. Ch. 511; 62 L. T. 864
Robson, In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	556	195	45 Ch. D. 71; 59 L. J. Ch. 627
Roche, In re	C.A. (I.)	—	136	25 L. R. Ir. 284
Rocke v McKerrow	C.A.	342	155	24 Q. B. D. 463; 59 L. J. Q. B. 146; 62 L. T. 556
Rogers v Lambert	Q.B.D.	542	75	24 Q. B. D. 573; 59 L. J. Q. B. 250; 62 L. T. 694
—— v Quinn	EX.D. (I.)	—	113	26 L. R. Ir. 137
Ronaldson v Latouche	C.A. (I.)	—	104	24 L. R. Ir. 344
Ross v Buxton	CH.D. STI. J.	71	194	42 Ch. D. 190; 58 L. J. Ch. 442; 60 L. T. 638
Rothschild v Morrison	C.A.	635	95	24 Q. B. D. 750; 63 L. T. 47
Routh (otherwise Fry) v Fry	C.A.	615	70	15 P. D. 50; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 43; 62 L. T. 501
Rowley v Southwell	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	194	61 L. T. 805
Royle v Hayes	C.A.	17	156	47 Ch. D. 18; 59 L. J. Ch. 1; 61 L. T. 452
Ruby, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	188	15 P. D. 139
Russell, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	223	15 P. D. 111; 62 L. T. 644
—— v Russell and Maclaren	P.D. & A.D.	—	71	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 13
Ryan v Ring	P. & D.D. (I.)	—	77	25 L. R. Ir. 184
Ryley v Brown	Q.B.D.	—	9	62 L. T. 458
St. John's Corporation v Central Vermont Railway Co.	P.C.	—	27	14 App. Cas. 590; 59 L. J. P. C. 15; 61 L. T. 441
St. Martin's Vestry v Gordon	Q.B.D.	—	130	62 L. T. 835
Salford (Mayor of) v County Council of Lancashire	C.A.	661	117	25 Q. B. D. 384
—— v Lever	Q.B.D.	—	66	24 Q. B. D. 695; 59 L. J. Q. B. 248; 62 L. T. 434
—— (2)	Q.B.D.	771	168	25 Q. B. D. 363; 59 L. J. Q. B. 483
Salisbury v Ridley	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	215	62 L. T. 789
Salmon, In re. Priest v Uppleby	C.A.	150	156, 203	42 Ch. D. 351; 61 L. T. 146
Sammons v Bailey	Q.B.D.	605	67	24 Q. B. D. 727; 59 L. J. Q. B. 342
Sankey, In re (sub. nom. In re A Solicitor). Ex parte Official Receiver	C.A.	533	196	25 Q. B. D. 17
Sara, The. Hamilton v Baker	H.L.	129	192	14 App. Cas. 209
School Board of London, Ex parte	CH.D. NOR. J.	61	50	58 L. J. Ch 752
Schwan, The	P.D. & A.D.	—	186	61 L. T. 308
Schwartz v Locket	Q.B.D.	142	102	61 L. T. 719
Scott & Mitchell, In re. Ex parte Scott	Q.B.D.	—	51	62 L. T. 840
Scott v Leak. In re Parry.	CH.D. NOR. J.	226	4	43 Ch. D. 570; 61 L. T. 386
Scottish Economic Life Assurance Co., Ex parte	CH.D. KAY, J.	684	93	62 L. T. 926
Script Phonography Co. v Gregg	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	160	59 L. J. Ch. 406
Searle v Cooke	C.A.	—	49	43 Ch. D. 519; 59 L. J. Ch 259; 62 L. T 209
Seaton v Clarke	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	167	26 L. R. Ir. 297

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Senecal v Pauze	P.C.	—	27	14 App. Cas. 637
Serle v Fardell	CH.D. KAY, J.	733	155	44 Ch. D. 299; 62 L. T. 359
Shackleton, Ex parte. In re Shackleton	Q.B.D.	288	15
Sharp, In re. Rickett v Sharp	C.A.	—	216	62 L. T. 677
Shaw v Shaw	V.C. (I.)	—	220	25 L. R. Ir. 30
——— v Timaru Harbour Board	P.C.	—	191	62 L. T. 913
Sheffield and South Yorkshire Permanent Building Society v Aizlewood	CH.D. STI. J.	—	25	44 Ch. D. 412; 59 L. J. Ch. 34; 61 L. T. 678
Shephard, In re. Atkins v Shephard	C.A.	133	158	43 Ch. D. 131; 59 L. J. Ch. 83; 62 L. T. 337
Shepherd v Hirsch, Pritchard, & Co.	CH.D. CHI. J.	745	165
Shipwright v Clements	CH.D. NOR. J.	746	154	63 L. T. 160
Shoolbred v St. Pancras Justices	Q.B.D.	399	111	24 Q. B. D. 346; 59 L. J. M. C. 63; 62 L. T. 287
Short v Parratt	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	4	61 L. T. 429
Sibun v Pearce	C.A.	658	26	44 Ch. D. 354; 63 L. T. 123
Simes v Newbery	CH.D. KEK. J.	570	11	44 Ch. D. 570
Simmons v London Joint-Stock Bank	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	12	62 L. T. 427
Singleton, Ex parte. In re Tritton	Q.B.D.	—	19	61 L. T. 301
Skeats v Evans	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	202	42 Ch. D. 522; 61 L. T. 500
Skittrell v Showell	Q.B.D.	—	209	59 L. J. M. C. 26; 61 L. T. 874
Slade v Walpole	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	211	61 L. T. 497
Smart v Tranter	C.A.	530	80	43 Ch. D. 587; 59 L. J. Ch. 363; 62 L. T. 356
Smiles v Blackburn. In re Blackburn	CH.D. NOR. J.	140	152	43 Ch. D. 75; 59 L. J. Ch. 208
Smith, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	—	216	58 L. J. Ch. 661
———. Ex parte Hepburn	C.A.	744	19
———, Ex parte. In re Smith & Sons	Q.B.D.	719	14
———, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	384	222	15 P. D. 2; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 5; 62 L. T. 183
———, In re. Keeling v Smith	CH.D. STI. J.	380	212	44 Ch. D. 654; 59 L. J. Ch. 284; 62 L. T. 181
——— v New Forest Union Assessment Committee	C.A.	—	151	61 L. T. 870
Smith, Pinsent, & Co, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	685	195	44 Ch. D. 303; 59 L. J. Ch. 567
Smith v Smith	P.D. & A.D.	—	10	59 L. J. P. D. & A. 15; 61 L. T. 697
———	C.A.	276	87	15 P. D. 47; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 19; 62 L. T. 237
——— v Thomasson	Q.B.D.	—	126	62 L. T. 68
——— v Wood	C.A.	138	210	24 Q. B. D. 23; 59 L. J. Q. B. 5; 61 L. T. 870
Smithett v Hesketh	CH.D. NOR. J.	698	138	44 Ch. D. 161; 59 L. J. Ch. 567; 62 L. T. 802
Smithwick v Hayden	V.C. (I.)	—	4	23 L. R. Ir. 475
Snowden v Baynes	Q.B.D.	558	—	24 Q. B. D. 568; 59 L. J. Q. B. 325
———	C.A.	744	126	25 Q. B. D. 193
Solway Steamship Co., In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	32	61 L. T. 659
Somersetshire County Council, Ex parte	Q.B.D.	—	117	58 L. J. Q. B. 513
Soper v Arnold	H.L.	449	205	14 App. Cas. 429; 59 L. J. Ch. 214; 61 L. T. 702
South Metropolitan Gas Co. v Noakes	Q.B.D.	—	83	61 L. T. 556
Southern v Southern	P.D. & A.D.	—	69	62 L. T. 668
Sovereign Life Assurance Co., In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	58	41	58 L. J. Ch. 811; 61 L. T. 455
Spackman, In re. Ex parte May	Q.B.D.	368	—
———	C.A.	497	13	24 Q. B. D. 728; 62 L. T. 849
Stamford (Earl of) Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	317	183	43 Ch. D. 84; 58 L. J. Ch. 780; 61 L. T. 504
Standard Portland Cement Co., In re	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	42	59 L. J. Ch. 408; 62 L. T. 822.
Stanley's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D NOR. J.	32	182	61 L. T. 169
Starbuck v Starbuck and Oliver	P.D. & A.D.	—	70	61 L. T. 876
Starey v Chilworth Gunpowder Co.	Q.B.D.	204	129	24 Q. B. D. 90; 59 L. J. M. C. 13; 62 L. T. 73
Starr-Bowkett Building Society, In re	C.A.	1	205	42 Ch. D. 375; 58 L. J. Ch. 651; 61 L. T. 346
Steel v Scott	P.C.	452	191	14 App. Cas. 601; 59 L. J. P. C. 1; 61 L. T. 597
Steele v Tiernan	V.C. (I.)	—	105	23 L. R. Ir. 583
Stettin, The	P.D. & A.D.	96	185	14 P. D. 142; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 81; 61 L. T. 200
Stevens v Hounslow Burial Board	Q.B.D.	236	47, 59	61 L. T. 839
Stewart v Kennedy	H.L.	—	179	15 App. Cas. 108
Stockley v Parsons. In re Parsons	CH.D. KAY, J.	712	123	45 Ch. D. 51; 59 L. J. Ch. 666; 62 L. T. 929
Stokell v Niven	C.A.	—	82	61 L. T. 18
Stokes v Ducroz	CH.D. NOR. J.	535	108	62 L. T. 176
Storer v Johnson	H.L.	756	56	15 App. Cas. 263; 62 L. T. 710
Stoy v Rees	C.A.	683	164	24 Q. B. D. 748; 59 L. J. Q. B. 310; 63 L. T. 49
Stretton v Fitzgerald	C.A. (I.)	—	215	23 L. R. Ir. 466
Strong v Stringer	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	196	61 L. T. 470
Strousberg v Sanders	C.A.	117	56
Strutt v Tippett	C.A.	—	93	62 L. T. 475
Stuart v Diplock	C.A.	223	60	43 Ch. D. 343; 59 L. J. Ch. 142; 62 L. T. 333
Stubbs v Dale	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	50	62 L. T. 28
——— v Director of Public Prosecutions	Q.B.D.	607	61	24 Q. B. D. 577; 59 L. J. Q. B. 201; 62 L. T. 399
Studdert v Von Steiglitz	V.C. (I.)	—	213	23 L. R. Ir. 564
Sturges v Ryan	Q.B.D (I.)	—	103	24 L. R. Ir. 305
Styles v Styles and Jackson	P.D. & A.D.	—	68	62 L. T. 613
Sunderland 32nd and 36th Building Societies, In re. Rawlings v King. Rawlings v Oliver. Rawlings v Wilkinson.	Q.B.D.	509	27	24 Q. B. D. 394; 59 L. J. Q. B. 217; 62 L. T. 293
Sutton v Ciceri	H.L.	—	28	15 App. Cas. 144; 62 L. T. 742

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889-90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Swaine v Wilson	C.A.	261	82	24 Q. B. D. 252; 59 L. J. Q. B. 76; 62 L. T. 309
Sweeny's Estate, In re	L.J. (I.)	—	206	25 L. R. Ir. 252
Swift v Kelly	C.A. (I.)	—	181	24 L. R. Ir. 478
——— v Swift	P.D. & A.D.	—	86	15 P. D. 118; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 61; 62 L. T. 669
Symonds v Kurtz	Q.B.D.	—	61	61 L. T. 559
Tamplin, In re. Ex parte Barnett	Q.B.D.	351	24	59 L. J. Q. B. 194; 62 L. T. 264
Tancred v Delagoa Bay Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	15	31	23 Q. B. D. 239; 58 L. J. Q. B. 459; 61 L. T. 229
——— v Steel Co. of Scotland	H.L.	—	177	15 App Cas. 125; 62 L. T. 738
Tarrant's Trusts, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	152	58 L. J. Ch. 780
Tasmania, The	H.L.	—	188	15 App. Cas. 223; 63 L. T. 1
Tatham v Haslar	Q.B.D.	109	20	23 Q. B. D. 345; 58 L. J. Q. B. 432
Taylor, In re. Turpin v Pain	CH.D. CHI. J.	422	158	44 Ch. D. 128; 62 L. T. 734
——— v Russell	CH.D. KAY, J.	663	136	62 L. T. 922
——— v Soper	CH.D. NOR. J.	—	135	62 L. T. 828
Tendring Guardians v Dowton	CH.D. STI. J.	653	119	59 L. J. Ch. 528; 62 L. T. 805
Thars's Sulphur and Copper Co. v Societe Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux	Q.B.D.	78	166	60 L. T. 924
Theobald v Theobald	P.D. & A.D.	—	86	15 P. D. 26; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 21; 62 L. T 187
Thompson, In re. Bedford v Teal	CH.D. STI. J.	949	29	59 L. J. Ch. 249; 61 L. T. 671
Thompson and Holt, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	524	206	44 Ch. D. 492; 59 L. J. Ch. 651
Thompson v Adams	Q.B.D.	—	92	23 Q. B. D. 361
Thomson v Moore	V.C. (I.)	—	148	23 L. R. Ir. 599
Thornton v Clegg	Q.B.D.	160	111	24 Q. B. D. 132; 58 L. J. M. C. 6
Thurso New Gas Co., In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	156	43	42 Ch. D. 486; 61 L. T. 351
Thwaites v Mooney	V.C. (I.)	—	166	25 L. R. Ir. 48
Thynne v Shove	CH.D. STI. J.	667	205	59 L. J. Ch. 509; 62 L. T. 803
Tilbury v Silva	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	168	62 L. T. 254
Tomlin v Luce	C.A.	323	138	43 Ch. D. 191; 59 L. J. Ch. 164; 62 L. T. 18
Tomlinson v Consolidated Credit and Mortgage Corporation	C.A.	118	100	24 Q. B. D. 135; 62 L. T. 162
Toogood, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	133	61 L. T. 19
Townend v Sheriff of Yorkshire	Q.B.D.	381	184	24 Q. B. D. 621; 59 L. J. Q. B. 156; 62 L. T 402
Townson v Harrison. In re Harrison	CH.D. NOR. J.	265	3	43 Ch. D. 55; 59 L. J. Ch. 169; 61 L. T. 762
Trubner v Trubner	P.D. & A.D.	464	68	15 P. D. 24; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 56; 62 L. T. 186
Trustee, The (sub nom. Hurlbatt), Ex parte. In re Ridgway	Q.B.D.	432	19	62 L. T. 647
Tucker v New Brunswick Trading Co. of London	C.A.	741	92	44 Ch. D. 249; 59 L. J. Ch. 551; 63 L. T. 69
Tunno, In re. Raikes v Raikes	CH.D. CHI. J.	636	211	45 Ch. D. 66; 59 L. J. Ch. 579; 63 L. T. 23
Tuohy, In re. O'Shea v O'Shea and Parnell	C.A.	374	154	15 P. D. 59; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 47; 62 L. T 713
Tupper v Tupper and Terrell	P.D. & A.D.	—	71	62 L. T. 665
Turlock v Sartoris	C.A.	340	9	43 Ch. D. 150; 62 L. T. 209
Turpin v Pain. In re Taylor	CH.D. CHI. J.	422	158	44 Ch. D. 128; 62 L. T. 754
Turton v Turton	C.A.	22	201	42 Ch. D. 128; 58 L. J. Ch. 677; 61 L. T. 571
Tussaud v Tussaud	CH.D. STI. J.	503	201	44 Ch. D. 678; 59 L. J. Ch. 631; 62 L. T. 633
United Telephone Co. v Mitchell. United Telephone Co. v Smith	CH.D. NOR. J.	70	160	61 L. T. 617
Urquhart, Ex parte. In re Urquhart	C.A.	612	16	24 Q. B. D. 723; 59 L. J. Q. B. 364
Usher v Loxmore	Q.B.D.	254	98	62 L. T. 110
——— v Martin	Q.B.D.	—	20	24 Q. B. D. 272; 59 L. J. Q. B. 11; 61 L. T. 778
Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Co., In re	C.A.	644	172	43 Ch. D. 536; 59 L. J. Ch. 409; 62 L. T. 347
Vadala v Lawes	C.A.	594	76	25 Q. B. D. 310; 63 L. T. 128
Valentini v Canali	Q.B.D.	331	89	24 Q. B. D. 165; 59 L. J. Q. B. 75; 61 L. T. 731
Van Gelder v Sowerby Bridge United Flour District Co.	C.A.	625	145	44 Ch. D. 374; 59 L. J. Ch. 583; 63 L. T 132
Vaughan's Executors, Ex parte. In re Dodds	Q.B.D.	—	17	62 L. T. 837
Verner v Cochrane	V.C. (I.)	—	166	23 L. R. Ir. 422
Vibart v Coles	C.A.	359	80	24 Q. B. D. 364; 59 L. J. Q. B. 152; 62 L T 557
Vignier, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	198	61 L. T. 495
Vindemore, The	C.A.	69	187	14 P. D. 172; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 8; 61 L. T. 655
Wainwright's case. In re Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	39, 95	62 L. T. 30
Walker v Hobbs	Q.B.D.	63	100	23 Q. B. D. 458; 59 L. J. Q. B. 93; 61 L. T. 638
——— v Walker	CH.D. STI. J.	766	12
———	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	203	59 L. J. Ch. 386; 62 L. T. 449
Wallis' Trusts, In re	M.R. (I.)	—	216	23 L. R. Ir. 460
Wallis, In re. Ex parte Lickorish	C.A.	482	195	25 Q. B. D. 176; 59 L. J. Q. B. 500; 62 L. T. 694

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1889–90.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Wallsend Local Board v Murphy	Q.B.D.	—	120	61 L. T. 777
Walsh v Browne	CH.D. STI. J.	—	216	62 L. T. 899
Wancke v Wingren	Q.B.D.	—	165	58 L. J. Q. B. 519
Warburton v Stephens	CH.D. KAY, J.	—	116	43 Ch. D. 39; 59 L. J. 109; 61 L. T. 609
Ward v Folkestone Waterworks Co.	Q.B.D.	426	209	24 Q. B. D. 334; 59 L. J. M. C. 65; 62 L. T. 327
——— v Lawson	C.A.	300	194	43 Ch. D. 353; 59 L. J. Ch. 323; 62 L. T. 158
——— v McRoberts	L.J. (I.)	—	103	25 L. R. Ir. 224
Ware, In re. Cumberlege v Cumberlege-Ware	CH.D. STI. J.	767	152, 219	63 L. T. 52
Warminster Local Board v Wilts County Council	Q.B.D.	670	118	25 Q. B. D. 450; 59 L. J. Q. B. 434; 62 L. T. 902
Warrand v Mackintosh	H.L.	—	178	15 App. Cas. 52
Warter v Warter	P.D. & A.D.	—	109	15 P. D. 35; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 45; 62 L. T. 328
Waters v Boxer. Waters, In re	CH.D. KAY, J.	57	220	42 Ch. D. 517; 58 L. J. Ch. 750
Watson, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	C.A.	567	23	25 Q. B. D. 27; 59 L. J. Q. B. 394
Watts v Smith	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	126	62 L. T. 453
Wayman, In re. Ex parte Board of Trade	Q.B.D.	95	195	59 L. J. Q. B. 28; 61 L. T. 644
Weatherley v Calder	Q.B.D.	—	58	61 L. T. 508
Webber, Ex parte. In re Webber	C.A.	195	14	24 Q. B. D. 313
Webster v Appleton	P.D. & A.D.	—	163	62 L. T. 704
Wells v Wells	CH.D. NOR. J.	327	90	43 Ch. D. 283; 59 L. J. Ch. 113; 61 L. T. 806
Wells' Trust, In re. Hardisty v Wells	CH.D. STI. J.	229	153	42 Ch. D. 646; 58 L. J. Ch. 835; 61 L. T. 538
Wemyss, Earl, The	C.A.	—	186	61 L. T. 289
Westbourne, The	C.A.	56	192	14 P. D. 132; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 79; 61 L. T. 156
West Derby Guardians v Atcham Guardians	C.A.	361	149	24 Q. B. D. 117; 59 L. J. M. C. 17
West Ham Guardians v Pearson	Q.B.D.	—	49	62 L. T. 638
——— v St. Giles-in-the-Fields Guardians	Q.B.D.	736	150	25 Q. B. D. 272
West Riding Permanent Building Society, In re	CH.D. CHI. J.	376	26	43 Ch. D. 407; 59 L. J. Ch. 197; 62 L. T. 486
Weston v New Guston Co.	C.A.	—	45	62 L. T. 275
Westrup v Great Yarmouth Steam Carrying Co.	CH.D. KAY, J.	505	193	43 Ch. D. 541; 59 L. J. Ch. 111
Whatley v Holloway	Q.B.D.	—	126	62 L. T. 639
Wheeler v Wheeler and Rhodes	P.D. & A.D.	—	71	14 P. D. 154; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 65; 61 L. T. 306
Whelan v Fisher	Q.B.D. (I.)	—	78	26 L. R. Ir. 340
Whitaker v Barratt. In re Barratt	CH.D. NOR. J.	59	2	43 Ch. D. 70; 59 L. J. Ch. 213
——— v Kershaw. In re Kershaw	C.A.	497	54	44 Ch. D. 296; 62 L. T. 776
Whitby v Mitchell	CH.D. KAY, J.	5	181	42 Ch. D. 494
———	C.A.	337	—	44 Ch. D. 85; 59 L. J. Ch. 485; 62 L. T. 771
White v City of London Brewery Co.	C.A.	32	132	42 Ch. D. 237; 58 L. J. Ch. 855; 61 L. T. 741
——— v White and Jerome	P.D. & A.D.	—	70	62 L. T. 663
Whitehurst v Fincher	Q.B.D.	—	82	62 L. T. 433
Whitney v Moignard	Q.B.D.	—	109	24 Q. B. D. 630; 59 L. J. Q. B. 324
Whitwell v Yeoman	Q.B.D.	—	74	59 L. J. Q. B. 96; 61 L. T. 811
Wilcock v Johnson	CH.D. NOR. J.	180	—	62 L. T. 317
Wilkinson v Thornhill	CH.D. CHI. J.	—	—	61 L. T. 362
Williams v Davies	CH.D. STI. J.	523	218	44 Ch. D. 484; 59 L. J. Ch. 305
Willis v Willis	CH.D. CHI. J.	7	143	61 L. T. 610
Windhill Local Board of Health v Vint	C.A.	738	48	59 L. J. Ch. 608
Winsford Local Board v Cheshire Lines Committee	R.C.C.	511	172	24 Q. B. D. 456; 59 L. J. Q. B. 372; 62 L. T. 268
Wolmershausen v Wolmershausen	CH.D. STI. J.	537	113	62 L. T. 541
Wood v Burgess	Q.B.D.	331	129	24 Q. B. D. 46; 59 L. J. M. C. 11; 61 L. T. 398
——— v Gregory	CH.D. NOR. J.	226	142	43 Ch. D. 82; 59 L. J. Ch. 232; 62 L. T. 179
——— v Hooper	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	125	61 L. T. 197
——— v Jones	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	116	61 L. T. 551
——— v Wood and White	P.D. & A.D.	208	87	14 P. D. 157; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 68
Wood's Ships Woodite Protection Co., In re	CH.D. STI. J.	—	36	62 L. T. 760
Woolcott v Peggie	P.C.	465	204	15 App. Cas. 42; 59 L. J. P. C. 44; 61 L. T. 845
Wormald, In re. Frank v Muzeen	CH.D. NOR. J.	425	124	43 Ch. D. 630; 59 L. J. Ch. 404; 62 L. T. 433
Worman v Worman	CH.D. KEK. J.	442	202	43 Ch. D. 296; 61 L. T. 637
Wright v Mills	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	68	62 L. T. 558
Yarrow, In re. Ex parte Collins	Q.B.D.	175	23	59 L. J. Q. B. 18; 61 L. T. 642
Zuccani v Nacupai Gold Mining Co.	C.A.	—	46	61 L. T. 176
Zuccato v Young	CH.D. NOR. J.	474	165

350
136

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1889-90.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Oct. 29.

CANNOT v. OPPENHEIM (a).

Practice—Appeal—Papers required for the use of the judges of the Court of Appeal—Costs—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 8.

It is the duty of an appellant on the hearing of an appeal involving the construction of documents to supply the Court of Appeal with three copies of each material document, and it is the practice to allow the costs of such copies on taxation.

Where an appellant in such case failed to supply three copies of such documents, the appeal was ordered to stand over, and the costs of the adjournment were directed to be borne by the appellant.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff in this action claimed to be entitled to some interest in certain mining property, and, inter alia, sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the same.

At the trial of the action Kekewich, J., made a declaration in favour of the plaintiff.

One of the defendants appealed.

Bramwell Davis, for the appellant.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Cannot, for the respondent.

On the appeal being opened it appeared that the case turned on the construction of a large number of documents, the originals of which only were supplied.

FRY, L.J.—How is it we have not been supplied with copies of these material documents?

Bramwell Davis.—Owing to a change of solicitors my clients have only recently had the management of the case, and the documents in question are numerous.

FRY, L.J.—The fact of the change of solicitors does not help us, and if the material documents are numerous that is all the more reason why we should be supplied with copies of them.

COTTON, L.J.—This appeal must stand over in order that three copies of all material documents may be supplied to the court. It has on more than one occasion been stated by me that on the hearing of an appeal turning on the construction of documents, the appellant must procure for the use of the court three copies of all the material documents. It was argued on a former occasion* that the costs of procuring such copies would not be allowed on taxation, but I then caused inquiries to be made, and was informed by the taxing masters that such was not the case. It must in future be understood to be the rule—and the sooner solicitors acting for appellants become aware of it, the better—that on the hearing of an appeal which turns on the construction of documents, three copies of all the material documents must be supplied for the use of this court.

The appellant must pay the costs occasioned by the adjournment of the appeal.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stretton & Hilliard.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. D. B. Lewis.

(a) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From Chan. Div. July 30, 1889.

In re 163RD STARR-BOWKETT BUILDING SOCIETY'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Condition of sale—Purchaser making any requisition—Inability or unwillingness of vendor to comply—Vendor's right of rescission.

A condition in a contract of sale, that the vendor "be at liberty, by giving notice in writing, to rescind the contract in case the purchaser make any requisition which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with," gives the vendor the right—arising immediately upon any requisition being made which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with—to rescind the contract: the right to rescind arising under such a condition may be validly exercised by the vendor, without specifying in his notice of rescission the requisitions which he is unable or unwilling to comply with, and without communicating to the purchaser any reason for the inability or unwillingness, or allowing the purchaser any opportunity to withdraw his requisitions; the only qualification to which the vendor's right of rescission arising under such a condition is subject, is the implied qualification that the right must not be exercised by the vendor capriciously or unreasonably.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The question raised by this appeal was as to the effect of a condition in a contract of sale, that in case the purchaser should make any requisition which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to comply with, the vendor might annul the contract.

* See 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 621.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The trustees of the 163rd Starr-Bowkett Building Society had contracted to sell certain leasehold houses to Charles Sibun.

The 7th condition of sale, so far as material, was as follows:—"And in case the purchaser shall, within the time aforesaid, make any objection to or requisition on the title which the vendors shall be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendors shall be at liberty at any time thereafter, notwithstanding any attempt to remove or comply with such objection or requisition, by notice in writing to be given to the purchaser or his solicitor, to annul the contract and to return the purchaser his deposit money without interest, costs, or other compensation."

The contract also contained a condition that the production by the vendors of the last receipts of rent was to be sufficient evidence that all the rents of the houses had been paid by the vendors.

The vendors duly delivered an abstract of title, and the purchaser sent in various requisitions thereon on August 14, 1888. Many of the requisitions only asked for general information—viz., as to the names of the offices in which the houses had been insured, the amount of the premiums payable, and whether notice to repair the houses had or had not been received. A copy of the rules of the society was also required; the 7th requisition required that the execution of a certain deed should be duly attested, and the 8th requisition required evidence of the registration of the deed in Middlesex; another requisition required the production by the vendors of their last receipts for rent.

The requisitions came before the vendors at a meeting of the trustees of the society held on August 20, when a resolution was passed that "as some of the requisitions could not be complied with, and as great trouble and expense would be incurred in complying with others, notice to rescind the contract should be given under the 7th condition of sale."

On August 23 the vendors' solicitors wrote to the solicitors of the purchaser, giving a formal notice in writing that the vendors were "unwilling to remove or comply with the objections or requisitions on title or any of them, and thereby gave notice of their intention to annul the contract." The solicitors for the purchaser, in reply, wrote that the purchaser was entitled to have an opportunity of waiving his objections, and that the vendors had no right to rescind the contract capriciously or unreasonably; the vendors' solicitors replied that the vendors, in annulling the contract, avoided further expense and delay, as they were unable to comply with many of the requisitions, and that they had acted in a bonâ fide manner.

The purchaser took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act asking for a declaration that the notice delivered by the vendors was not effectual to annul the contract, and that the vendors were not entitled to annul the same.

Chitty, J., held that the vendors had a right to annul the contract, and that they had only acted in pursuance of that right.

It appeared from the evidence of two of the trustees of the society that the resolution of August 20 was passed bonâ fide, and with the sole object of avoiding further expense, the society being in an insolvent state. This evidence was uncontradicted.

The purchaser appealed from the decision of Chitty, J.

Byrne, Q.C., and G. T. Millar, for the appellant.—The vendors were bound, at all events, to point out which of the requisitions they were able, and which of them they were unable, to answer, so as to give the purchaser an opportunity of waiving them: In re Dames and Wood, 33 W. R. 685, 29 Ch. D. 626. [FAY, L.J., referred to Duddell v. Simpson, 15 W. R. 115, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 102.] The right to rescind must be reasonably exercised, and it lies on the vendors to prove that it was reasonably exercised: In re Glenton and Saunders to Haden, 53 L. T. N. S. 434, 34 W. R. Dig. 209. In a contract such as this for the sale of real estate an investigation of the abstract of title and the making of requisitions thereon by the purchaser is necessarily implied, and therefore, having regard to the whole nature of the contract, the expression "make any requisition," in condition 7, must be construed as equivalent to "insist on any requisition."

They also referred to Greaves v. Wilson, 25 Beav. 290, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 45.

Romer, Q.C., and Geo. Henderson, contrà, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., by which he held that a contract for sale had been duly annulled by the vendors. The sale was by public auction, subject to certain conditions of sale, one of which, the 7th, after providing for the time within which requisitions and objections to title were to be sent in, continued:—"And in case the purchaser shall, within the time aforesaid, make any objection or requisition on the title which the vendors shall be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendors shall be at liberty at any time thereafter, notwithstanding any attempt to remove or comply with such objection or requisition, by notice in writing to be given to the purchaser or his solicitor, to annul the contract and to return the purchaser his deposit." The purchaser had signed the contract and paid the deposit, and within the time fixed by the contract had delivered certain requisitions, some of them relating to the payment of rent and premiums for insurance, some of them to the attestation and registration of particular deeds, and others to land tax, easements, and rights of way. The vendors then sent notice in writing to the purchaser annulling the contract, and the question we have to determine is whether the act of the vendors was a good exercise of their power to rescind.

Now it has been said that the time to exercise the power of rescinding had not arisen, and that the word "make" in the condition must be taken to mean "insist," and that the "making of a requisition" referred to in the condition was equivalent to "insisting on a requisition," and that no requisition had been insisted on. But I am not one to twist the words used so as to make them fit in with what might be considered to be the proper construction. The word "make" means something different from "insist on," and that this is so is evident by the words used in the clause after the word "make."

Then it was said that the purchaser was entitled to a locus penitentiæ; that he was entitled to have a time to consider whether he should withdraw his requisition before the power to rescind the contract was exercised. That was disposed of by the case of Duddell v. Simpson, where it was decided that the notice need not give the purchaser time to withdraw his objections, and that to give the purchaser such a right would be to make a different contract between the parties and to add to the contract what was not to be found in the words of it. In that case Turner, L.J., said: "Another ground relied upon was that the notice ought to have given time to the purchaser to determine whether he would or would not waive the objection which he had taken, and that the contract could not well be determined by a notice without such time being allowed. But I do not find any such stipulation in the conditions of sale. To lay down a rule that the vendor must give notice before he determined the contract would be, in effect, to introduce into the condition a new term that the vendor may annul the contract by a notice in writing allowing so many days to the purchaser to determine whether he will waive the requisition." So to say that the purchaser must have a locus penitentiæ, would be to add something to the contract which is not in it, and, construing the contract as it stands, it cannot be said that there is any necessity for the vendor to give the purchaser an opportunity of withdrawing the requisition or requisitions after he knows that the vendor intends to exercise the power of rescinding.

Again, it has been said that the vendors could have answered a great number of the requisitions, and that there was only one requisition that would put them to any expense; and it was also said that the vendors do not intimate what requisitions they are unable or unwilling to answer, and that the onus of proving that the unwillingness is reasonable lies on the vendors and not on the purchaser, and that some reasonable ground of unwillingness must be shown. It has been laid down that the vendor is not bound, in a case like this, to state his reasons for rescinding, though there must be some reasonable ground for his doing so. When the matter comes before the court, it is a question of fact whether the vendor has acted capriciously or arbitrarily in determining the contract. It is even a straining of the terms of the contract to say that the power to rescind cannot be exercised capriciously or unreasonably, but the ground on which the court interferes in such a case is that the contract ought not to be made a nullity by the vendor acting capriciously and arbitrarily. The question we have to determine, then, is whether the vendors here have acted capriciously or arbitrarily, or whether they were reasonably unwilling to remove or comply with the requisitions. We have before us the notice given by the vendors, and the correspondence, and an affidavit by two of the vendors stating that the matter was considered before the resolution was passed, and that, as some of the requisitions could not be complied with, and as great trouble and expense would be incurred in complying with others, notice should be given to rescind the contract, and that the resolution was bonâ fide passed with the sole object of avoiding further expense owing to the society being insolvent. If we had only the notice to rescind before us, we should have some little difficulty in determining the question; but there is the affidavit, which has not been answered, and the deponents have not been cross-examined, and we cannot hold that the vendors have acted capriciously or arbitrarily. It is said that, as to some of the requisitions, the vendors only have to answer Yes or No, and that, as to the other requisitions, the expense would have to be borne by the purchaser by the terms of the contract; but two of the requisitions do not come within the provision throwing the expense on the purchaser—viz., the requisitions requiring the attestation and registration of the deeds therein mentioned.

In my opinion, without deciding on whom the burden of proving that the unwillingness of the vendors is reasonable lies, upon the evidence before us, there is nothing to satisfy us that the vendors capriciously or arbitrarily came to the conclusion to determine the contract, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

FEY, L.J.—In this case the relevant condition provides:—[His lordship read condition 7, and continued:—] No doubt this condition is a very stringent condition, and one against which I can well understand that a struggle may be made, and a struggle has been made in this case, to construe the condition in a different way from that which the words import. Counsel have, as I understand the arguments, sought to import three terms—first, that the purchaser was entitled to be told which requisition the vendors were unwilling or unable to answer; secondly, that the vendors must allege a reasonable ground for annulling the contract, if they do annul it; and, in the third place, that the purchaser is entitled to a reasonable time in which to withdraw his requisition, and that it is not till after a reasonable time that this power to annul the contract is to be exercised by the vendors. I am not going to say that those three things were not reasonable things to be inserted in such a contract. But not one of them is to be found in the contract that has been made; therefore I reject all those three glosses. I do not think that the notice need state the particular requisition the vendors were unwilling or unable to answer, or a reasonable ground for withdrawing from the contract, or give the purchaser a time to withdraw the requisition. Then it has been pressed upon us that the word "make" with respect to a requisition meant to "insist upon" a requisition. That is a remarkable construction of the word. Every solicitor, every barrister, everyone else conversant with the sale of real property, knows perfectly well what it is to "make" a requisition, and that "insisting" on it is a totally different thing; and I cannot alter the words of the contract to make it more susceptible of the gloss it has been sought to put upon it. The courts, it is true, have qualified the construction of such contracts by introducing the question of unreasonableness—namely, that the power to rescind must be exercised reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily; and even if I desire so to do, which I do not, I could not, when there has been such a mass of dicta and authority on that point, depart from that construction. The only question is whether the vendors had acted reasonably. The affidavit says that expense would be incurred by the insolvent company in answering the requisitions, and that the expense of answering some of them would not have been paid by the purchaser. The deponents to that affidavit have not been cross-examined; and on whoever the burder of proof lies it has been amply proved that the vendors acted reasonably, and I consider the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The question we have to consider is, What is the true meaning of the 7th condition? In my opinion it gives the vendors the right to rescind the contract, provided they do not act capriciously or arbitrarily. The unwillingness or inability must be reasonable. The reason, however, need not be communicated to the purchaser. The right to rescind arises immediately the requisition is made. It is said that "make any requisition" must mean "insist on any requisition." That is a bold contention, to which I cannot accede. The meaning of the words "make any requisition" is well understood. There is no evidence here that the vendors have acted capriciously or arbitrarily. The affidavit gives the reasons for their conduct. The deponents have not been cross-examined, and the evidence is therefore uncontradicted.

In my opinion the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Birt & Follett.

Solicitors for the respondents, Burgoyne, Watts, & Co.

From Q. B. Div. July 25, 26, 29, 1889.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE v. ANGUS & CO.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE v. LEWIS & SONS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Agreement for sale of goodwill—Instrument of transfer—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 70—"Conveyance or transfer on sale"—Ad valorem duty.

An agreement to sell a business and the goodwill

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*thereof, on certain conditions precedent being fulfilled, is not chargeable, under section 70 of the Stamp Act, 1870, as a "conveyance or transfer on sale," with an ad valorem duty for the goodwill.

Appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue from the judgment of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, J.) on cases stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 19.

The questions stated by the commissioners were—

(1) Whether the instrument in question was chargeable with stamp duty according to the assessment of the commissioners—namely, at 5*s.* for every £50 as "a conveyance or transfer on sale"?

(2) If not, what amount of stamp duty was chargeable?

The cases as stated are fully set out in the report in the Divisional Court (37 W. R. 510), together with the cases cited.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the appellants.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the respondents, Lewis & Sons.

Meadows White, Q.C., and Warrington, for the respondents, Angus & Co.

The respondents were not called upon to argue.

July 29.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Commissioners of Inland Revenue decided that an ad valorem stamp should be attached to the instrument in question. On appeal to the Divisional Court their decision was overruled, and the appeal now before us is on behalf of the commissioners.

I may say at once that when the Legislature assumes to impose a tax on the subject it must do so in clear terms, and if there is any doubt implied the subject is entitled to judgment. Subject to that proposition the question for us is whether the instrument before us is an instrument within the construction of section 70 of the Stamp Act, 1870?

Now by section 70 "the term 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument, &c., whereby any property upon the sale thereof is legally or equitably transferred to or vested in the purchaser." "A conveyance" is one subject of taxation and "an agreement" generally is another subject of taxation under the statute. Now the thing to be stamped is "an instrument." If a contract of sale, or a conveyance by way of purchase and sale, is effected without an instrument, such a transaction is not within the section. A transaction is not struck at at all, but only an instrument by which a purchase and sale is effectuated. If a purchase and sale can be effected without an instrument the Legislature has not reached such a transaction.

Next it must be noted that not every instrument is affected by the statute which may be dealt with in the course of purchase and sale, but only "instruments whereby property is legally or equitably transferred." Now I take the meaning of legal and equitable to be this: Legal means that which is known to and can be dealt with by the common law, and equitable that which is known to and can be dealt with according to equity. Can there be a common law conveyance of an equitable interest? No. The common law knows nothing about such a transaction. There cannot be a common law conveyance of an equitable interest. If "legally" only had been inserted in the section it might have been argued that an instrument by which any equitable interest had been transferred was omitted from the section. For that reason "equitably" is added. The real meaning of the section is that where property known to the common law is the subject of any conveyance by any instrument, and where any equitable interest is the subject of any conveyance by any instrument, such instrument is to be the subject of taxation. It does not mean an equitable conveyance of common law property or vice versâ, but a common law or equitable conveyance of property known to the common law or equity by which such respective property or interest may be legally or equitably conveyed. With such a meaning applied to the section the difficulty of construction is mainly got rid of. Here the property in question is legal property. Goodwill is legal property well known to the common law. It is clearly within the section as legal property.

The only question, then, is, Was this instrument before us one whereby—i.e., by the instrument itself—legal or equitable property is conveyed? For the purpose of founding their argument that this is a conveyance, the appellants are obliged to take out one subject-matter only of the matters dealt with by the instrument—namely, the goodwill, which they allege to be actually conveyed by the instrument, although the premises dealt with in the instrument are not so actually conveyed. But the instrument does not apply to the goodwill alone—it refers to "the premises and the goodwill of those premises." It is admitted by the appellants that, at any rate in terms, the instrument is not a conveyance. Everything undertaken is by way of agreement, but it is urged that the agreement is such as equity would, in case of non-fulfilment, decree specific performance; and it is said that when the agreement is of such a nature that a court of equity would, without more ado, grant specific performance, that is an equitable conveyance within the statute. If so, this would amount to an equitable conveyance of legal property. But if the instrument is in itself a conveyance of such property, where is the need for specific performance to be granted? The very fact of saying that the instrument is one upon which a court of equity would decree specific performance fixes it at once as an agreement and not as a conveyance. To call such an instrument a conveyance would be a contradiction in terms. If the property had been conveyed by the instrument, but had not been handed over, an action for trover or ejectment would probably lie. However, it is clear that the instrument here is an agreement such as a court of equity would decree specific performance for, and that being so it is not a conveyance on sale, but only an agreement. But if it is an agreement it is not within section 70 of the Stamp Act. More than that, this is only an agreement that something shall pass after something else shall have been done. The appellants have attempted skilfully to dislocate the subject-matter of the instrument and to separate "the goodwill" of the business from the other matters, but even as to that it is only said that "the old company shall sell and the new company shall purchase." But the matters actually dealt with are "the goods, chattels, &c., and the undertaking, business, and goodwill thereof, and all the real and personal property." Clearly the real subject-matter of the instrument is the tannery business with its premises. The buildings where such a business is carried on are an important part of the undertaking—specially fitted for carrying it on. The actual place where the business is carried on is the first thing agreed to be sold, and, secondly, the goodwill of the business at that particular place. Can it be said that the premises of the business have been actually conveyed when the words of the instrument are that the

* After the decision of the Divisional Court had been given in this case, the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), was passed, and section 18 of that Act now provides that "Every instrument containing a contract, whether executed or executory, for the sale or purchase of any property save such as passes by delivery, or must be conveyed by deed, shall, so far as relates to stamp duty thereon, be deemed to be a conveyance on sale of such property. . . ."

one party "shall sell" and the other "shall purchase"? Is the new company to accept the property without any investigation of title? Does the instrument anticipate, further, any conveyance without any investigation of title? I hope, indeed, some day to see the transfer of land made possible without any such investigation of title as is now common owing to such title being secured by some form of registration, but if any agreement upon which specific performance may be decreed is to be taken as a sufficient conveyance of property an easy form of transfer would seem to have been already devised. That can hardly be maintained.

But it is said that goodwill can be conveyed without any instrument. If so there would be a means of transfer not subject to the stamp duty. If people can by any means convey any property or interest without an instrument, then such means of transfer are not within the section, and are therefore not subject to any duty under it. The subject can escape such taxation if he can transfer property without any instrument, and it is absurd to say that there would be any fraud in evading the duty by such means if the Legislature has not chosen to include other means of sale than by an instrument. If that is to be called fraud, every sensible man will commit a fraud. I say, then, that if this instrument in question is an agreement upon which specific performance would immediately be granted, yet it is only an agreement, and my statement in itself implies that, and prevents it being an actual instrument of conveyance. Secondly, I doubt if this is an agreement upon which specific performance would be decreed as regards the goodwill. For the goodwill will only pass when the property to which the goodwill is attached is conveyed contemporaneously with the conveyance of the subject-matter of the agreement. Thirdly, if the parties choose to rest on the agreement, and though the possession of the premises and the business and the goodwill be not conveyed for thirty years, that will make no difference, because it is only when the parties choose to execute a conveyance properly so called that they make themselves liable to the duty under the statute. I think the Divisional Court was right, that this appeal must be dismissed, and that a clear meaning may be attached to the terms "legally or equitably transferred," such as I have already referred to.

Lindley, L.J.—I agree. The appellants have attempted to do that against which we have frequently protested, namely, to destroy the distinction between a contract and a conveyance. They have urged that the instrument here is a conveyance within section 70 of the Stamp Act, 1870. If so, then every agreement for the conveyance of any property whatever is within the section. The real question before us is—what is this instrument? I do not think the question is whether the construction of the effect of this document need be similar to that held in the case of the document in Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Mackinnon, per Lord Fitzgerald, 11 App. Cas. 392, 34 W. R. Dig. 158, but whether the particular instrument ought to be stamped with the ad valorem stamp as if it were a conveyance on sale and purchase. It is impossible not to see that the words "conveyance on sale" in the statute will not cover any instrument which is not a conveyance at all, but merely an agreement. Lord Coleridge long ago laid down that it is a popular fallacy to suppose that an agreement is equal to a conveyance, and the rule that an agreement is only an agreement and distinct from a conveyance is a well-known one to the profession. The most familiar example is the case of an estate subject to a mortgage. Is there no difference between an agreement for purchase and the ultimate conveyance? There is as much difference as between an agreement for marriage and marriage itself. As to the passing of the goodwill, that does not pass differently to any other form of property. Of course goodwill is partly a matter of real property and partly of personal property. Its value mainly depends on the vendor. It may be next to nothing if the vendor continues to carry on a similar business, but his omission to do so cannot be said to be property exactly. We have not to go against the decision of Potter v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 W. R. 561, L. R. 10 Ex. 147. There it was held that if people chose to convey property in the premises by one means and goodwill by another, the assignment of the goodwill separately would be subject to an ad valorem duty, but such cases do not by any means destroy the distinction between a contract and a conveyance. An agreement does not transfer property. That is obvious if specific performance is considered necessary, because the action on such agreement is one in personam and is in order to compel a transfer. It is quite impossible for us to reverse the decisions which have long established the distinction between agreement and conveyance. The instrument before us is, according to the statute, to be stamped for what it is—i.e., as an agreement. As to the goodwill being conveyed by such an instrument, I have nothing to add to what the Master of the Rolls has said.

Lord Esher, M.R., stated that the Lord Chancellor concurred in the judgments given.

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Solicitor to Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the respondents, Crossman & Prichard; Sharpe, Parkers, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — July 11, 15, 1889.

Whitby v. Mitchell. (a.)

Perpetuity—Remoteness—Limitation to unborn person for life, with remainder to her children—Restraint on anticipation — Testamentary power of appointment given to unborn person.

By a marriage settlement lands were limited to the use of the husband and wife successively for life, with remainder to the use of a child, grandchild, or more remote issue of the husband and wife (such child, grandchild, or more remote issue being born before any such appointment, as thereinafter mentioned, should be made to him, her, or them) in such manner as the husband and wife should jointly appoint.

The husband and wife, in exercise of the power, appointed one moiety of the lands to the use of a married daughter for her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, with remainder to the use of such persons as she should by will appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the use of her children living at the date of the deed of appointment.

Held, that the only part of the appointment which was good was the limitation to the daughter for her life for her separate use. The ulterior limitations were void according to the rule stated in Williams on Real Property, 13th ed., p. 276, and the restraint on anticipation annexed to the real estate must be rejected according to Fry v. Capper, 2 W. R. 136, Kay, 163.

Trial of action.

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Christie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a post-nuptial settlement dated the 7th of May, 1840, certain lands were settled to the use of Charles Dennis, the husband, for life, then of M. E. Dennis, the wife, for life, and after the decease of the survivor "to the use of a child, grandchild, or more remote issue, or all and every or any one or more of the children, grandchildren, or more remote issue of the" husband "by the said" wife, "such child, grandchildren, or more remote issue being born before any such appointment as hereinafter is mentioned shall be made to him, her, or them respectively," in such shares and in such manner as the husband and wife "at any time or times during their joint lives, and as to the" wife "notwithstanding her coverture," should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the child or children equally as tenants in common.

Mr. and Mrs. Dennis had two children only, of whom Mrs. Burlton was one.

By an indenture dated the 15th of March, 1865, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis appointed one moiety of the lands comprised in the settlement, or the proceeds of sale thereof, after their own life interests, to Mrs. Burlton for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to the use of such persons as she should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of her children living at the date of that indenture as tenants in common.

Part of the proceeds of sale of the property contained in the settlement was lent by the trustees to one of themselves, the defendant Mitchell.

In an action for an account of what was due on the loan, it became necessary to consider the validity of the deed of 1865.

Robinson, Q.C., and Alexander Young, for the plaintiff.

Farwell, for Mrs. Burlton.—The appointment of 1865 was invalid except so far as it gave to Mrs. Burlton a life estate for her separate use, according to the rule of law that an estate cannot be given to an unborn person for life, followed by any estate to any child of such unborn person. She is therefore absolutely entitled to the proceeds of sale of the appointed property.

Marten, Q.C., and W. Baker, for children of Mrs. Burlton.—That rule is only an application of the rule against perpetuities, or is, at all events, confined strictly to legal limitations, and does not extend to limitations by way of use, nor to a case like the present, where the limitation to the children of the unborn person is confined to children in esse at the date of the deed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the defendant Mitchell.—The power of appointment given to Mrs. Burlton by the deed of 1865 was void for remoteness, so the limitation in default of appointment is also void.

They cited Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq. 165; Lewis on Perpetuities, p. 408 et seq.; Hockley v. Mawbey, 1 Ves. jun., at p. 150; Mogg v. Mogg, 1 Mer. 654, at p. 664; Cattlin v. Brown, 1 W. R. 533, 11 Ha. 372; Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Cl. & Fin. 372.

Farwell replied.

July 15.—KAY, J., stated the facts and the appointment of 1865, and continued:—The question is whether those limitations were good or whether that appointment was entirely bad, except so far as it gave an estate for life to Mrs. Burlton. This property is really land, and the law as to land has always been that one could not limit to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the issue of that unborn person. Stated broadly, none would dispute that proposition for a single moment, but it is said if you do so limit, with a proviso that the unborn child of the unborn child who is to take shall be a person who comes into existence within the limits of perpetuity, that is good. But no decision to that effect has been cited. I do not know of any; and I do not know any authority whatever for that construction of the law. You may limit for life to an unborn person, but you cannot limit for life to an unborn person so as to tie it up till the death of that unborn person; that is to say, any remainder limited after that life estate must be to a person in esse at the time it is made. A marriage settlement made on the marriage of A. with B., limiting the estate to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to the first child of A. by B., remainder to the children of that first child would, primâ facie, be utterly bad as far as the limit is concerned. Can you make that good by saying, "Provided that such child shall be born within a life now in being or twenty-one years after"? No. If you could, it is obvious that the following limitation would be good:—To A. for life, remainder to the unborn children of A. for life, remainder to the unborn children of that unborn child for life, and so on through a dozen, or any number, successively to the unborn children of the unborn child. If you can make the limitation which is here attempted good, then you might make a series of successive limitations of that kind good by merely inserting a proviso that these persons shall come into existence within a life or lives in being, or twenty-one years after a life or lives in being. That is at present a mode of dealing with real estate which is not sanctioned by the law of real property in this country; and I do not at all agree with the attempt that has been made to make out that it is only an application of the law against perpetuities. It is not only an application of the law against perpetuities, it is something more. It is the law of real property in this country which prevents elaborate limitations over of that kind, and whether they offend against the law of perpetuity or not, or whether that is so ingeniously framed as not to offend against the law of perpetuity, still I hold it to be the law of this country that you cannot limit real estate to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the children of that unborn person.

I do not need any higher authority than that of the late Mr. Joshua Williams. He, in his book on Real Property, in the 13th edition, discusses the whole subject at pages 274—276. He refers to the foundation of the rule being the objection which the law had to a possibility upon a possibility, and criticizes that. Then he sums up the law after that criticism on page 276 thus:—[His lordship read the passage.] That is Mr. Williams' opinion—that, if you might make successive limitations of this kind within the rule against perpetuities, you might, of course, tie it up for a generation longer than is now possible. He says that that is not the foundation of the rule; but it is an absolute rule independent of the rule against perpetuities. With that I entirely agree. I have always understood that to be the case, and I do not believe that any authority to the contrary could be found. Therefore, I hold that this attempt to limit to the unborn children of Mrs. Burlton is void, and so is the attempt to restrain her from anticipating her share. That was decided in Fry v. Capper by Lord Hatherley, who declined to tie up the life interest of an unborn person in that way by an attempt to restrain that unborn person, if a married woman, from anticipation. Accordingly, the only part of this appointment that is good is the appointment to Mrs. Burlton for life for her separate use.

Judgment for plaintiff.

The order, so far as material to this report, was as follows:—Declare that the appointment was invalid so far as it affected to give a power of appointment by will to Emily Hyde Burlton, and to appoint property in default for the children of Emily Hyde Burlton then living, and also so far as it restrains anticipation.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sanderson, Holland, & Adkin.

Solicitors for the various defendants, W. Montgomery White; Cowdell & Son.

Wood v Gregory 43 Ch D. 83

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. July 27, 1889.

WILLIS v. WILLIS. (a.)

Practice—Partition—Sale in lieu of partition—Title—No inquiry—Sale out of court—Infants—Form of order—Evidence—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 51, r. 1a—Rules of December, 1888, r. 9.

Upon motion for judgment in an action for sale in lieu of partition, where all persons interested (some being infants) asked that an inquiry as to title might be dispensed with and for an immediate sale by auction and out of court, an order was made for an immediate sale and out of court, subject to directions for fixing a reserve price and the auctioneer's remuneration in chambers, and for the conditions of sale to require the purchaser to pay into court his purchase-moneys.

Having regard to the fact that infants were interested, and to rule 9 of the Rules of December, 1888, which modifies ord. 51, r. 1a, the court required the allegations in the claim to be verified by affidavit, notwithstanding that such allegations were admitted by the defendant in his pleading.

This was an action for the sale (in lieu of partition) of real estate, to part of which infants were interested, and is a case in which the court dispensed with the usual inquiry and allowed the sale to take place out of court.

By his will John Willis devised the real estate whereof he died seised in fee simple as follows:—As to one undivided fourth to his son, the plaintiff Edward Willis; as to one other undivided fourth to his son, the defendant Frederick Willis; as to one other undivided fourth to his daughter, the plaintiff Julia Ann Stanton, a widow; and as to the remaining fourth to such of the children of the testator's son, William Willis (who died in testator's lifetime), as should attain the age of twenty-one years or die under that age leaving issue, and, if more than one, as tenants in common. And after certain pecuniary bequests he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate upon certain trusts, which included payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the said legacies. William Willis had seven children, who were living at the death of the testator, in May, 1888.

In July, 1889, this action was commenced, and at that date all the children of William Willis were alive but were infants, the eldest having been born in 1874. Edward Willis was the testator's heir-at-law, and on the happening of the contingency mentioned in the testator's will as to the share of the children of William Willis, Edward Willis would be entitled to their share. The children of William Willis, Edward Willis, and Julia Ann Stanton were the plaintiffs in the action, and Frederick Willis was the defendant. A statement of claim was delivered alleging the facts as to the title of the property and that a sale and division of the proceeds would be more beneficial than the division of the property. All these allegations were admitted by the defendant in his statement of defence. The property consisted of numerous small pieces of land let to various persons on various terms, and the aggregate rentals amounted to rather more than £120 per annum. The action came on upon motion for judgment, and was set down to be heard as a short cause.

H. Greenwood, for the plaintiffs, asked for an order for an immediate sale by auction and out of court, and submitted that, the title being admitted, no affidavit verifying the title was necessary: Burnell v. Burnell, 27 W. R. 749, 11 Ch. D. 213.

E. W. Hansell, for the defendant, also asked for an immediate sale and out of court.

CHITTY, J.—In view of the fact that infants are interested, and that by the new rule adding to ord. 51, r. 1a, the order must be prefaced by a declaration that the judge is satisfied that all persons interested are before the court, or bound by the order, and a statement of the evidence upon which such declaration is made, I think there should be an affidavit (which may be produced to the registrar) verifying the statement of claim. The order will be for an immediate sale by auction, subject to a reserve price and the auctioneer's remuneration being fixed in chambers, and to a direction that the purchase-money must be paid into court.

The minutes of the order as settled were as follows:—

And it appearing that the said James Willis died seised of the freehold hereditaments specified, &c., and that by virtue of his said will the plaintiff Edward Willis, the plaintiff Julia Ann Stanton, and the defendant Frederick Willis are absolutely entitled to three equal fourth parts thereof, and that subject to the interests of the testator's heir-at-law in the event of all the seven infant plaintiffs dying under the age of twenty-one years without leaving issue, the seven infant plaintiffs are entitled to the remaining one equal fourth part of the same hereditaments as tenants in common in fee simple. And it appearing that the plaintiff Edward Willis is the testator's heir-at-law, and the court being satisfied that the plaintiffs and defendant are the only persons being interested in the said hereditaments, and the infant plaintiffs by their next friend and their counsel and the plaintiffs Edward Willis and Julia Ann Stanton and the defendant by their counsel requesting a sale thereof and a distribution of the proceeds thereof instead of a partition of the said hereditaments among the persons interested.

And this court being of opinion that, by reason of the nature of the property and the number of persons interested, such a sale and distribution will be more beneficial for such persons than a division of the said hereditaments among them.

Let the said freehold hereditaments be sold by the plaintiffs Edward Willis and Julia Ann Stanton and the defendant Frederick Willis by public auction, subject to such reserve biddings as shall be fixed in chambers, and subject, as to the hereditaments comprised therein respectively, to the two leases for ninety-nine and twenty-one years respectively in the claim mentioned, and let the remuneration of the auctioneer be fixed in chambers, and let the said auctioneer receive the deposits on such sale and pay the same into court to the credit of this action, and let the said real estate be sold under conditions that the several purchasers shall pay the residue of the purchase-money into court to the credit of this action, subject to further order.

Declaration that infant plaintiffs were trustees for the purchaser within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1850, and appointment of persons to convey the estates of the infant plaintiffs.

Solicitors, Howard & Shelton.

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. North, J. } July 20, 1889.

In re BARTON-UPON-HUMBER AND DISTRICT WATER CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Jurisdiction—Undertaking for public benefit—Sale of undertaking.

The court has jurisdiction to wind up a company whose undertaking is constituted for the public benefit, and will make a winding-up order in such a case on the petition of a shareholder who makes out a case for such an order, although it may possibly be necessary to obtain an Act of Parliament to authorize a sale of the company's undertaking.

Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co., 37 W. R. 601, 41 Ch. D. 399, discussed.

Petition.

This was a shareholder's petition for the winding up of the above company.

The company was incorporated by registration under the Companies Acts on the 27th of May, 1885. The objects of the company, as stated in the memorandum of association, were "to construct and maintain waterworks with all necessary machinery and appliances, and to supply water to the parish of Barton-upon-Humber, and other parishes adjoining."

On the 16th of July, 1885, an Act was passed to confirm a provisional order previously made by the Board of Trade, under the powers conferred by the Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870, conferring certain powers on the company, who were described as the "undertakers." Out of 25,000 £10 shares, of which the nominal capital of the company consisted, only 919 had been issued in the ordinary way, and on those shares only £1,536 had been paid. Some other shares had been issued as fully paid up to the contractors. The company had power to borrow £6,250 by means of debentures. Debentures had been issued to this amount, and the petitioner alleged that the directors had also issued other duplicate debentures in excess of the authorized amount, and had applied the proceeds improperly. The petitioner also alleged that the works of the company had, to a great extent, been constructed, but that they had been suspended for want of funds, that the directors had committed certain acts of misfeasance, and that if some transfers of shares which had been improperly made to one of the directors were set aside there would be funds sufficient for the completion of the works.

This was the hearing of the petition. The company did not appear.

Emden, for the petitioner, asked for a winding-up order, and referred to In re Bradford Navigation Co., 18 W. R. 592, L. R. 10 Eq. 331, as showing that the court had jurisdiction to make an order, although the court might not be able to direct the undertaking to be sold.

He also referred to Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co., 37 W. R. 601, 41 Ch. D. 399.

NORTH, J.—I see no difficulty in making a winding-up order in the present case. A suggestion has very properly been made by the petitioner's counsel that there might be a difficulty in making an order, because, as the company's undertaking could not be sold, no profitable result would accrue if a winding-up order were made, and he referred to Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co. In that case Kay, J., held that he could not, at the instance of a debenture-holder of a company, which stood in a similar position to that of the present company, order the undertaking of the company to be sold or appoint a manager of the undertaking. Kay, J., apparently acted on the authority of Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. 201. He did not, however, dismiss the action, but he made a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on the undertaking, and directed accounts and inquiries. In the present case I think a winding-up order ought certainly to be made, unless the fact that this is a company for working a public undertaking is a reason for not making the order. In my opinion that is not a valid reason. If a winding-up order were not made nothing could be done, and the persons who were alleged to have acted improperly could not be made accountable. I am not going to make an order for sale of the undertaking now. If a sale ultimately becomes necessary an Act of Parliament may possibly have to be obtained to authorize a sale. The winding-up order which I am now asked to make will be exactly equivalent to the judgment Kay, J., pronounced in Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co. By appointing an official liquidator I shall not be taking the management of the affairs of the company out of its hands. The liquidator will be appointed as an officer of the court to carry on the business for the company, and in the interest of the shareholders. I therefore see no difficulty in making a winding-up order. Such an order was made in In re Bradford Navigation Co. and In re Isle of Wight Ferry Co., 2 H. & M. 597, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 44, and in several other cases.

I do not forget that in In re The Company of Free Fishermen of Faversham, 36 Ch. D. 329, 35 W. R. Dig. 107, the Court of Appeal refused to make a winding-up order. But in that case the company was very peculiar, there was an individual right of fishery in the members of the company. The ground of the decision was that the court thought no good would result from a winding-up order. I do not forget the observations then made by Fry, L., when he said (at page 347): "I should pause long before I was a party to the destruction, by winding up, of an undertaking which the Legislature had" (by a recital in an Act relating to the company) "declared to be of great benefit to the public as well as to the company itself." In the present case, assuming that the paramount intention of the provisional order is for the public benefit, the public cannot derive any benefit as matters now stand. It will be most for the public benefit that the company be wound up with a view to carrying on its undertaking in the future either by itself or by means of some other company. In making a winding-up order I do not think I am going contrary to the view of Kay, J., and he was following other similar cases in which such an order had been made.

Solicitors, Hughes, Hooker, & Co.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. North, J. } May, 7, 8, 9, 13, 14, 1889.

EDEVAIN v. COHEN. (a.)

Practice—Pleadings—Amendment at trial—Rules of Court, ord. 28, r. 1.

An action was brought, for a tort committed by several persons, against some of the tort-feasors, and judgment had been recovered against them. The same plaintiffs afterwards brought another action for the same tort against the remaining tortfeasors, M. and C., who had not been defendants in the first action. M. and C. put in their defences with knowledge of the former action and judgment, but did not plead merger of the cause of action in the judgment. The action against M. and C. came on for trial, at which evidence was given which proved acts done by the defendants since the writ in the former action was issued which gave rise to a fresh cause of action. After the evidence for the plaintiffs and for the defendant M. had been given, the defendants M. and C. asked for leave to amend their pleadings and plead merger of the cause of action in the judgment in the former action.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendants M. and C. could not be allowed to amend their pleadings and plead merger of the cause of action in the judgment in the former action, because it would then be necessary to allow the plaintiffs to amend their pleadings and new assign, and to give further evidence in support of the new assignment; and the plaintiffs could not be put in as good a position as if the trial had not proceeded so far.

Action.

This was an action by Eaton Edevain and Margaret Edevain for the delivery up of certain furniture wrongfully taken away by the defendants, Morris Cohen and F. W. Cook, and for damages and costs.

The defendant Morris Cohen, in his statement of defence, pleaded that he had nothing to do with the acts complained of.

The defendant F. W. Cook, in his statement of defence, pleaded that he had acted bonâ fide as an agent, and without notice of any claim by the plaintiffs.

It appeared from the evidence given at the trial on behalf of the plaintiffs and on behalf of the defendant Morris Cohen, that the plaintiffs had already brought an action (Edevain v. Watmore) and recovered judgment against certain other persons who had been engaged with the defendants in the removal of the furniture in respect of the matters sued upon in the present action; but it also appeared that since the former action certain acts had been done by the defendants which might give rise to a fresh cause of action.

After this evidence had been given the counsel for the defendants applied for leave to amend their statements of defence by pleading that the cause of the present action had been merged in the judgment obtained in the action of Edevain v. Watmore.

The solicitor of the defendant Morris Cohen had acted as solicitor for the defendants in the action of Edevain v. Watmore; and he had also acted as solicitor for the defendant F. W. Cook in the present action up to a certain point.

Oswald, for the defendant F. W. Cook.—The rule is that any party will be permitted to amend his pleadings at any stage of the proceedings, so as to be in the position he would have been if he had pleaded rightly at first: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 28, r. 1. [NORTH, J., referred to Collette v. Goode, 7 Ch. D. 842, 26 W. R. Dig. 177.] That case is no longer binding, as a narrower view of the construction of the Rules of Court was taken in the earlier cases than is now adopted: Tildesley v. Harper, 27 W. R. 249, 10 Ch. D. 393; Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 34 W. R. 316, 16 Q. B. D. 556; Riding v. Hawkins, 37 W. R. 575, 14 P. D. 56.

Everitt, Q.C., and Harper, for the defendant Morris Cohen.—If the defendant F. W. Cook obtains leave to amend his pleadings, the defendant Cohen ought to be permitted to amend his also.

Coxon-Hardy, Q.C., A. Cock, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the plaintiffs.—The court will not assist defendants to set up a technical defence without merits similar to that of the Statute of Frauds or the Statute of Limitations, either of which defences must be pleaded, by allowing the defendants to amend their pleadings for the purpose of setting up a technical defence without merits. The defendant Cook admittedly knew of the former action and judgment when he pleaded; and there is no doubt that the defendant Cohen was aware of them also. If the amendment were allowed the plaintiffs would be prejudiced. They would have to new assign by pleading a cause of action arising out of the acts of the defendants since the writ in the former action, and to produce further evidence. The plaintiffs would not now be put in the same position as if this case had not been heard.

Everitt, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—In this case I do not propose to allow the amendment in question. The facts are, very shortly, these:—A tort was committed—I assume for the purpose of dealing with this question that a tort was committed by several persons, of whom the defendants are two. A tort was committed, an action was brought by the plaintiffs against some of those persons, the present defendants not being either of them, and judgment was recovered against some of those other defendants. These defendants afterwards put in their defences with knowledge of the existence of the other action, because it is clear that Morris Cohen's solicitor, at any rate, knew all about it, which was his knowledge in the matter; and I am not going to believe for a moment that Cook did not know all about it. Therefore, these defendants, with knowledge of the existence of the other action, and what had been done in it, put in their defences at a subsequent date without raising this defence. The defence is not suggested by the counsel for Morris Cohen until he has shortly stated his points, has gone into all his evidence, and has only not addressed me because I suggested that it would be convenient that the other defendant's evidence should be given before I heard the counsel for the first defendant. Then the counsel for the second defendant mentioned this point, and said he would ask for leave to amend, and then, for the first time, the counsel for Morris Cohen said he should like to be in the same position as regards amendment; and the question is whether now, at this stage, the amendment should be allowed.

Now the case of Collette v. Goode, I think, is a very doubtful precedent; there is at all events this difference, that in that case the defendant did not know what I hold that the defendants in this case did know—of the existence of the matter as to which they wished to amend; and I confess that in Collette v. Goode I thought it was very hard upon my client that leave to amend was refused; and very possibly if that case had not been settled before it was concluded the opinion of the Court of Appeal might have been taken upon it. But in refusing leave I am not acting upon that case. I think that the course of decisions since has been such that if a case exactly similar to that came before the court again the learned judge who decided the case would now decide differently, and I should not have adopted the same line at the present day in a case exactly in point. I think the tendency of the later cases, some of which have been referred to, is to show that amendments must be made for the purpose of doing justice. For instance, adopting the language of Bowen, L.J., in the earlier case cited in Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., Lord Esher, M.R., says:—"The same principle was expressed, I think, perhaps somewhat more clearly, by Bowen, L.J., who says that an amendment is to be allowed whenever you can put the parties in the same position for the purposes of justice that they were in at the time when the slip was made."

Under the circumstances I should have thought in the present case that it would not be right to preclude the defendants from setting up now the judgment recovered in another action, by virtue of which the present defendants were all released from damages which otherwise they would have been liable to pay. But it is clear from the authority that has been referred to, that I ought not to allow the amendment now if the other side would be prejudiced by it, and prejudiced by it I mean in other ways than in matters of costs, which I could deal with now. If, for instance, I thought that allowing this amendment would merely cause certain costs to be thrown away, I should feel bound to allow the amendment, taking care that the plaintiffs were not prejudiced, but were in as good a position as regards costs, as if the amendment had not been allowed. But my reason for not allowing it is this: It is quite clear that if I allowed it to be made now I should have to allow the plaintiffs to amend their pleadings, and to new assign. It is quite clear to me that to some extent they could new assign effectively; therefore, I cannot simply allow it now without either putting the plaintiffs in a position in which I ought not to allow them to be put by such amendment being made at the last moment, or I should have to direct the matter to stand over in order that they may amend their pleadings and go into further evidence which would have to be taken before the court for the purpose of giving definite information on definite points to which, although all the evidence has been taken with the knowledge that this amendment would be asked, the attention of the parties and the counsel on the other side has not been drawn; and without going into which evidence it would be impossible to do justice to the plaintiffs, because, at any rate, if the defence were held and allowed to be good, I could not, without such evidence, give them the benefit of the new assignment, upon which I see clearly they must, to some extent, succeed. Under these circumstances I could not, in fairness to the parties, allow the amendment proposed at the present time, and although I could have granted it, if I thought it should be allowed, even at the last moment, putting the parties right as to costs, I find that I cannot, by any order I might make as to costs, put the plaintiffs right, and therefore I refuse the defendants leave to amend.

Solicitors, Morris & Rickards; Maurice Nordon; Frederick Bradley.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } July 22—24; Aug. 2, 1889.

Reinhardt v. Mentasti. (a.)

Nuisance — Trespass — Injunction—Reasonable use of property—Sic utere tuo ut alieno non lædas.

It is not a sufficient defence to an action for an injunction to restrain a nuisance to prove that the nuisance is caused by a perfectly reasonable use of defendant's property.

The defendant, who was a hotel proprietor, placed in his kitchen and used in the course of his business a large cooking range, with a shaft for hot air, which interfered with the comfort of the plaintiff's house by overheating his wine cellar.

Held, that, although the use by the defendant of the range and shaft was perfectly reasonable, the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the nuisance caused thereby to him.

Bamford v. Turnley, 10 W. R. 803, 3 B. & S. 62, and Gaunt v. Fynney, 21 W. R. 129, L. R. 8 Ch. 8, distinguished.

Broder v. Saillard, 24 W. R. 1011, 2 Ch. D. 692, followed.

(a.) Reported by T. R. Colquhoun Dill, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff in this case was the lessee and occupier of a house in Coventry-street, and the defendant the owner of an hotel which was immediately adjacent to the plaintiff's house. The facts which gave rise to this action were for the most part admitted. The defendant had recently enlarged his hotel, and had placed in a kitchen on the basement a large "close range" with a shaft for carrying off the hot air. In consequence of the heat caused by the large fires which were kept up in this range for culinary purposes, and of the hot air shaft, the plaintiff's house became heated to an uncomfortable degree, and in particular his wine cellar had become unfit for use.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction and damages.

The arguments and cases relied upon appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Neville, Q.C., and Wurtzburg, for the plaintiff.

Warmington, Q.C., and Farwell, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2.—Kekewich, J.—For obvious reasons, the result of this case may affect many localities and many persons. I, therefore, thought fit to reserve my judgment, and, although the conclusion which I am about to express is the same as that which I entertained at the close of the trial, I confess to some fluctuation of opinion since that time, as well as during the argument. I thought it possible, and indeed probable, that by studying some of the cases on this branch of law I should find a line of demarcation between those nuisances which may be said to partake of the character of trespass and those of which this cannot be averred, and a disposition on the part of the court to grant injunctions more readily against the former than the latter. My examination of the authorities has not justified this anticipation. There are, no doubt, expressions in some judgments which point to stronger protection being given where rights of property are invaded than where they are not; but, on the other hand, there are many cases in which a private nuisance, not affecting rights of property, except so far as to prevent a man from personally using his own with reasonable comfort, may be so regarded as having been equally condemned. The principle applied in either class of cases is that a man must not use his own so as to injure his neighbour, and, in substance, the only question discussed in any given case is, whether that principle is applicable to the particular circumstances there occurring. Here there is really no dispute about the material facts. The defendant in adding to his hotel has recently converted what, it seems, was formerly an unused chamber into a supplemental kitchen, and has there placed a stove which is used for supplying hot water and cooking pastry. Not only is the stove one of an ordinary character and well constructed, but the defendant has taken divers precautions to prevent its being obnoxious, and the only thing to be said against him in this respect is that the stove does not occupy the site of the fireplace, which must be taken to have existed since the house was first built, and that thus far he has departed from the original plan of the building. And this use of his own house, alleged to be in all respects—and, subject to the one remark just made, apparently—reasonable, has nevertheless proved exceedingly inconvenient to his neighbour, the plaintiff, whose cellar was situate right against the stove on the other side of the wall. It was reasonable for the plaintiff to have a cellar, and it cannot be said that it was otherwise than of a reasonable character, or was in an inconvenient place. The heat occasioned by the stove passing through the wall has injured the cellar. It has so injured the cellar that, according to the evidence, the plaintiff is unable any longer to store his wine there, and although he might keep there what is required for daily use, one ordinary and reasonable purpose of a cellar in a private dwelling-house has gone. The plaintiff says that such interference with his reasonable use of his own property ought not to be allowed, and in answer it is said that the defendant, who on his part has only used his own property reasonably, is not to blame.

The question which I have to decide is, Which of them is right? The injury to the plaintiff being clear, and clearly arising from the stove, it lay on the defendant to establish that he was not culpable. In support of this position reference was made to several judgments, and more particularly to those of Lord Bramwell in Bamford v. Turnley, 10 W. R. 806, 3 B. & S. 82, and Lord Selborne in Gaunt v. Fynney, 21 W. R. 129, L. R. 8 Ch. 8, which, with many others to be found in the books, contain passages insisting on the right of every man to act reasonably in the enjoyment and use of his own property, the regard which must be had in every case to the special circumstances attending it, including the distinction between dwellings in crowded cities and those in the open country, and the unwillingness of the court to interfere at the instance of a plaintiff who, from ill health or other cause engendering fastidiousness, complains of that to which his neighbours, however reluctantly, find themselves compelled to submit. Such passages must, of course, be read in connection with the circumstances of the particular case under consideration, and, what is even more important, they must be read as not intentionally departing from, or rather, in the absence of proof to the contrary, as intentionally adhering to, those principles and rules of law which a judge must be credited with bearing in mind, although he does not think it worth while to repeat or even expressly to refer to them. Thus read the judgment of Lord Bramwell, who concurred with the majority of the court in reversing the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, and also in overruling Hole v. Barlow, 6 W. R. 619, 4 C. B. N. S. 334, loses much of the weight which, in reliance on certain selected passages, was sought to be attributed to it by the defendant, and it is to be observed that in a recent case in the House of Lords Fleming v. Hislop, 11 App. Cas., at p. 697, the present Lord Chancellor epitomized Lord Bramwell's judgment with approval, as saying, "that what makes life less comfortable, and causes sensible discomfort and annoyance, is a proper subject of injunction." What fell from Lord Selborne in Gaunt v. Fynney may be explained in like manner, and must rather be understood as illustrating the convenience of what Lord Bramwell calls "the rule of give and take; live and let live" than as having established —which I am sure he did not intend to do—any new guide to the decision of cases where a legal nuisance has been proved to exist.

I may pass by without further remark to the cases of Ball v. Ray, 21 W. R. 282, L. R. 8 Ch. 467, Sturges v. Bridgman, 28 W. R. 200, 11 Ch. D. 852, and Attorney-General v. The Sheffield Gas Consumers' Co., 1 W. R. 185, 3 De G. M. & G. 304, the judgments in all of which, and especially those in the last case, are instructive on this branch of law and on the points which were argued before me. But it is right to say a word on Broder v. Saillard, 24 W. R. 1011, 2 Ch. D. 692, because that was eminently a case in which the defendant had behaved reasonably, and yet was enjoined from continuing a nuisance by a judge, who thought the injunction such a hardship that he allowed it to influence the costs. After an argument, in which both Ball v. Ray and Gaunt v. Fynney were cited, Sir George Jessel states the general law in terms equivalent to those used by Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315, which has long been treated as giving the rule of distinction between those nuisances of a personal character which do, and those which do not, merit an injunction. He says:—"I take it the law is this, that a man is entitled to the comfortable enjoyment of his dwelling-house. If his neighbour makes such a noise as to interfere with the ordinary use and enjoyment of his dwelling-house, so as to cause serious annoyance and disturbance, the occupier of the dwelling-house is entitled to be protected from it." He proceeds to explain why it is no answer to say that the defendant is only making a reasonable use of his property, stating that that cannot be the test, and lower down, on page 702, he says what the test, as applied to the case which he had under consideration, is—namely, "Whether the stables are unluckily so situate as that the noise from the horses, not being uncommon horses, in any way materially disturbs the comfort of the plaintiff's dwelling-house, and prevents the people sleeping at nights." If for "horses" you read "stove," and for "sleep" "use of cellar," which, though of course is less necessary, and in that sense less entitled to protection, is yet, in my judgment, a reasonable requirement on the part of the plaintiff, you have a test exactly applicable to the case in hand. Agreeable to this is the opinion of Lord Blackburn, worthy of selection from numerous authorities, as expressed in Scott v. Firth, 4 F. & F. 349. That was a case of nuisance by vibration caused by steel hammers used in defendant's workshops, which, besides interfering with the comfort of the plaintiff, had, it was alleged, cracked the walls of his adjoining cottages. The learned judge, in summing up the case to the jury, stated the question to be whether it was one of nuisance—that is, of actionable wrong; and after calling attention to the evidence of injury, added this:—"A further point has been raised by the plea that the grievances complained of were caused by the defendant in the reasonable and proper exercise of his trade in a reasonable and proper place. My opinion is that in law that is no answer to the action. I think that that cannot be a reasonable and proper exercise of a trade which has caused such injury to the plaintiff as she complains of."

It seems to me, therefore, that, notwithstanding some passages in some judgments to the contrary, the application of the principle governing the jurisdiction of the court in cases of nuisance does not depend on the question whether the defendant is using his own reasonably or otherwise. The real question is, Does he injure his neighbour? I recognize some hardships in an injunction to restrain the defendant from doing that which I am obliged to regard as a reasonable use of his property—the better adapting to the purposes of an hotel a house situate in a neighbourhood where hotels are conveniently built; but the hardship is not so great as that in Broder v. Saillard, nor do the facts allow me to regard the defendant as so entirely passive as the Master of the Rolls considered the defendant to be. Therefore, while granting the relief asked by the plaintiff, I am bound to do so with the usual consequences. I may, however, properly give the defendant some time to consider and do what is best under the circumstances, and I shall therefore make an injunction not enforceable for three months.

His lordship gave the plaintiff the costs of the action, but ordered him to pay the defendant the costs of certain minor issues on which he had failed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, N. Sutton.

Solicitors for the defendant, Fladgates.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Jan. 14—16; Feb. 8, 1889.

Hoblyn v. Hoblyn. (a.)

A son being tenant in tail in remainder expectant on the decease of his father to an estate of some 3,000 acres, the income of which was about £1,450, executed, shortly after he came of age, a deed of resettlement of the property, including an adjoining farm of about 116 acres, and by the resettlement, after certain trusts in his favour, £200 per annum was settled on his mother, and subject thereto a trust was created for raising any sum not exceeding £2,000 as the father should appoint, with the usual remainders. The father in exercise of this power raised sums of £500 and £400, the former of which, was admittedly applied for the benefit of the son, and the latter for the benefit of the father himself.

The son having brought an action to set aside the settlement, on the ground of undue influence, and that it was executed without independent advice; and the father having offered to release his right to charge the estate further, and to indemnify the estate against the £400 already raised, and the mother having offered to release her right to the £200 a year,

Held, that the action must be dismissed;

Held, also, that the court, in questions regarding the upsetting of resettlements, has regard to various considerations not admissible in other cases, and the court will not minutely inquire whether the father exerted his influence more or less, or insist that the son have independent advice. If, however, the father obtains a benefit, the suspicion of the court is aroused, and where it is unfair, the settlement, if otherwise unobjectionable, may be reformed in this particular, the rest being allowed to stand good.

Trial of action.

This was an action for rescission of a deed of settlement, brought by the tenant in tail in remainder, William Ernest Page Hoblyn, against the tenant for life, William Paget Hoblyn, and Jane Hoblyn, his wife, and the other beneficiaries under the deed in question, the trustees and two mortgagees.

The estate consisted of 3,000 acres in Cornwall, and was settled upon W. P. Hoblyn for life, with remainder to W. E. P. Hoblyn in tail; W. P. Hoblyn came into possession in 1846, at which time the income from the property was about £800. W. P. Hoblyn purchased an adjoining property of 116 acres for £4,500, leaving £4,000 on mortgage, and spent a considerable sum on the settled estate, the income from which was now about £1,400.

The plaintiff came of age on the 3rd of March, 1879, and on the 25th of June, 1879, a disentailing deed of the property was duly executed by him and his father; and on the 20th of October, 1879, an indenture of resettlement was made, whereby the settled estate and the subsequently purchased property were granted unto and to the use of R. H. Paget and T. H. Britton for the term of ninety-nine years upon certain trusts therein set out, and subject thereto to the use of W. P. Hoblyn for life, and thereafter upon trust to secure £200 to Jane Hoblyn for life, with remainder to the use of the defendants, Joseph Thurston and George Colman, for a term of 1,000 years upon the trusts therein declared, with remainder to the plaintiff for life, remainder to the issue of the plaintiff as he should appoint, in default to his first and other sons in tail male respectively, with remainders over to the first and other daughters of the plaintiff successively in tail male, with remainder to the four sisters of the plaintiff and their issue, with remainder to the plaintiff. It was also agreed that the trustees should, during the life of W. P. Hoblyn, raise and pay an annual allowance of £100 to the plaintiff for the first two years, and £200 for the next four years, and thereafter the annual sum of £50; and also four annual sums of £75, and pay one of such annual sums of £75 to the four sisters of the plaintiff during their respective lives, and it was also agreed that the hereditaments comprised in the term of 1,000 years should be charged with the payment after the decease of W. P. Hoblyn of such sum not exceeding £2,000 to such person or persons as he should by deed or will appoint; and also with the payment after the decease of W. P. Hoblyn of £500 to each of the four sisters of the plaintiff as and for their respective portions to vest in them at twenty-one. There were also subsidiary provisions which it is not necessary to set out.

By two indentures, dated respectively the 2nd of May, 1883, and the 2nd of May, 1884, to which the plaintiff and his father were parties, W. P. Hoblyn (the father), in exercise of the power given him by the settlement, appointed the sum of £2,000 to one E. A. Thomas, by way of mortgage, to secure two sums of £500 and £400 with interest. The former sum was applied for the benefit of the plaintiff, the latter for that of W. P. Hoblyn. The plaintiff further charged his interest in the estates by deeds of the 25th of March, 1885, the 14th of September, 1885, and the 25th of March, 1886, with repayment of the sums of £400, £300, and £500. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that he had had no independent advice with regard to the preparation or execution of the settlement of the 20th of October, 1879, and did not understand it; that it was an unfair and improper one, and induced by the undue influence of W. P. Hoblyn. He claimed that the settlement should be cancelled and set aside, without prejudice to the rights and interests of the mortgagees, and that W. P. Hoblyn ought to be decreed to indemnify the plaintiff and his estate against any claims under the indenture of the 2nd of May, 1884.

W. P. Hoblyn, by his defence, offered to release his right to charge the estate further than with the £500 and the £400 raised for himself, and indemnified the estate against the £400, and his wife offered to release her right to the £200 a year. Such releases were executed before judgment was delivered.

The other facts appear from the judgment.

Barber, Q.C., and T. T. Methold, for the plaintiff.—The resettlement is unusual and unreasonable, and as the father obtained a direct pecuniary benefit thereunder he must show that his son executed it without any undue influence on his part, and thoroughly understood it: Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278; Savery v. King, 4 W. R. 571, 5 H. L. Cas. 627; Bellamy v. Sabine, 2 Ph. 425.

Stock, for W. P. Hoblyn, Mrs. Hoblyn, and daughters, referred to Jarratt v. Aldam, 18 W. R. 511, L. R. 9 Eq. 463.

Warmington, Q.C., and Clydesdale, for children of the only married sister.—The father gave consideration, and in any case such transactions are not viewed by the court as if they took place between strangers. It is not necessary that the plaintiff should understand minutely all the provisions of the deed. The substantial ground of complaint is that the father ought not to have power to raise £2,000; as a matter of fact, he only raised £400, and has released the rest of his power and indemnified the estate.

Ingle Joyce, for the mortgagees.

Whitaker, for other parties.

Barber, Q.C., in reply.—The plaintiff was, of course, not wholly ignorant of what he was doing, but he was not sufficiently informed, and, if he had been, he would never have executed such a deed.

(a.) Reported by J. W. Geree, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kekewich, J.—Is the plaintiff entitled to set aside the settlement of the 20th of October, 1879? That is the question before me. The solution depends on—(1) the character of the settlement; (2) the contents; (3) the circumstances under which it was prepared and executed. Let me treat these matters separately, and in connection with each of them consider the legal principles affecting it.

1. The character of the settlement.

It is not a simple disposition by the plaintiff of his own property without the intervention of any other contracting party; in other words, it is not a voluntary settlement. It may still be important to inquire how far the plaintiff knew what he was doing, but that cannot be the sole test of his right to relief. The rule of Dutton v. Thompson, 31 W. R. 596, 23 Ch. D. 278, is inapplicable. This settlement belongs to that class of settlements usually styled family arrangements, which might properly be said to be made for value, and yet are not generally so described, because they more often than not want the distinctive features of purchase and sale; and beyond the give and take which invariably enters into them there is something else which of itself prevents their being voluntary.

In regarding settlements of this character, claims to upset them, and the rights of parties thereunder, the court gives weight to considerations which on other occasions would scarcely be allowed in the scale. The duty to preserve in the family, property held by it, is recognized, so is also the duty of providing for those members of the family who are intended to succeed to the property, and the harmony which may thus be expected to be established is respected. There are frequently other considerations, such as the preservation of the honour of the family, but they more often concern arrangements different from that now under investigation, which is what is called a resettlement—that is, a renewal on a fitting occasion, as the majority of the eldest son, of the ties which the father and son or other successive owners are by law enabled to dissolve. It is not uncommon on such an occasion to take out of settlement some property convenient to be sold or to be diverted to other uses—it is at least as common for one of the parties to bring in some property convenient to be included which he has acquired as his own. Such circumstances must not be forgotten in considering when it is necessary, as here, to consider a claim to set the settlement aside, and strictly they may be said to destroy the renewable character of the settlement; but none the less I think that this would properly be described as a resettlement, and for the purpose of ascertaining rights connected therewith would be regarded from that point of view. Again, in such documents one generally finds provision for the wives and younger children of the successive owners or some of them, an immediate provision for the next owner, powers to raise money for defined purposes connected with the property, and other powers of a cognate character, the extent of which, as regards the amounts charged and otherwise, necessarily depends on a variety of circumstances which never can affect two families or two properties in the same manner. Therefore the court would not regard the presence or absence of any such power as an indication of impropriety in the preparation of the settlement, nor the largeness or smallness of an amount charged, or liable to be charged, as an indication of unfair dealing between the parties, unless, indeed, there were such extravagance as to justify the suggestion that it could not have obtained the consent of a reasonable man.

On what does this presumption in favour of the propriety and reasonableness of a resettlement rest? Take the frequent case, illustrated here, of such a settlement made by father tenant for life in possession, and son tenant in tail in remainder, shortly after the latter attains his majority. Does the court presume that the son has had independent advice, or insist that he ought to have had it? I think not. Where proper precautions are taken the position of the son as tenant in tail is fully explained to him, as are also the proposed limitations of, and burthens on, property which would otherwise, in the ordinary course of nature, become absolutely his own. And if this duty is often, and in simple cases sufficiently, discharged by the father's solicitor, it is sometimes with advantage handed over to another solicitor called in for the particular purpose, or, according to a commendable practice familiar to me through an eminent conveyancer, referred to counsel instructed to advise the young man independently. To omit all these precautions is to incur risk. I shall have hereafter to refer to the circumstances under which the settlement in question was prepared and executed, but I may at once say that though I acquit Mr. Whitefield of impropriety of conduct, and, indeed, I am sure that he intended to act for the best according to his view of the situation and of his duty to the parties, yet it is obvious that his conduct provoked the attack on the settlement. If like conduct were the practice of the profession no settlement would be safe from litigation.

A resettlement is generally the father's work. He more often than not proposes it, and, though perhaps largely assisted by his solicitor or man of business, his is almost always and necessarily the guiding hand throughout. This necessity flows not merely from the parental influence which is probably its main source. In the ordinary case, such as occurs here, the intelligence and information of the son, whether great or small, are overshadowed by the experience of the father, who, in addition to general knowledge of the world, is well acquainted with the capacities and wants of the estate, the needs of different branches or members of the family, and the obligations which the family history has imposed on those in possession of its honours and property. The court has always recognized this necessity, and, conceiving it to be for the benefit of families that such influence should be exerted to effect a proper resettlement on a fitting occasion, has declined to inquire whether, in any particular instance, it was exerted with more or less force. This is the result of many authorities, to some of which reference is made in Hoghton v. Hoghton. Lord Romilly himself adopts it there and elsewhere, and it is neatly stated by Hall, V.C., in Fane v. Fane, L. R. 20 Eq. 698, 24 W. R. Dig. 266, where he says, "The parental influence in reference to such resettlements, where there is no other consideration or element in the case, is, I conceive, to be disregarded." The parental influence here intended, is that which the experience of mankind has proved to be both natural and good, the influence begot by affection rather than fear: see Lord Hatherley's remarks, Turner v. Collins, 20 W. R. 305, 7 Ch. 329. When it can be traced to less worthy causes, and especially if, being so traced, it seems to have had an excessive operation, it is styled undue, and is differently treated: see Wycherley v. Wycherley, 2 Eden, 175.

The rule thus stated is applicable in its integrity only to cases of an ordinary character where there has been no large departure from the practice usually followed in the settlement of family estates. One circumstance which justifies an exception from, or at least a modification of, the rule is a benefit acquired by the father to the detriment of the son. The character of the resettlement is then somewhat changed. It imports a bargain between the contracting parties, and the jealousy of the court is aroused to inquire whether one of them unduly influenced the other in effecting it. But note two things — first, such a bargain is not presumably unfair; secondly, if unfair, or unfairly effected, it is not necessarily fatal to the entire arrangement. On the first point it is sufficient to say that many circumstances of common occurrence would justify a father in demanding a benefit direct or indirect for himself; and as regards the second I need only refer to Hoghton v. Hoghton, where the court was satisfied that there was a benefit to the father obtained without due protection to the son, and yet took pains to explain that in addition there were unreasonable provisions in the deed which assisted the court to interfere. This is stated in a passage on p. 314, and is also, I think, a fair conclusion from the rest of the judgment, though it is sometimes difficult to determine whether the particular language should be more properly referred to the subject of resettlements generally or exclusively to those in which the father gains a benefit. Lord Campbell read the judgment as I do: see Jenner v. Jenner, 9 W. R. 109, 2 De G. F. & J. 359. Hoghton v. Hoghton was relied on in Turner v. Collins as an authority that a transaction between father and son must be set aside wholly if at all, and could not be rectified by striking out an improper provision. That was not a case of resettlement, but the Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley) accepted the analogy, and held that rectification was possible as against a party admitting it to be proper, notwithstanding that the transaction stood as a whole. I cannot myself discover any satisfactory reasons for destruction where the settlement is generally good, the intention of the parties ascertainable, and reform possible, that is, when one can preserve what is substantially right by expunging what is substantially wrong. In Jenner v. Jenner the plaintiff asked for reform only, and no objection was taken to his suit on that ground.

2. Contents of the settlement.

The general scope of the deed is plain enough, and open to no objection. The father adds to the property an estate (in mortgage) contiguous and intermixed therewith, the father and son have successive life estates, and the remainders are in favour of the son's issue, his sisters and their issue, the ultimate remainder being properly limited to him. A pittance is secured to him during his father's life. There are jointures and portions charged or empowered, there is a power to charge for permanent improvements, and there are divers other provisions, which, speaking generally, are commonly found in such instruments. I do not specify any, because I must refer again to those worthy of mention, and for the moment I omit all notice of one special provision which has created the real difficulty in this case. Omitting that, what, then, is there unreasonable in such a settlement? "Reasonable and usual" are not, nor are "unreasonable and unusual," convertible terms. An unreasonable provision in a resettlement is one which it is inconceivable that prudent men well advised would, having regard to all the circumstances, have inserted.

And in order that a party complaining of the settlement may take advantage of this, it must also be prejudicial to his interest, or to that of some person—e.g., child for whom he presumably intends to provide. Extraordinary or unusual provisions falling short of this may be evidence of want of care, as may also omissions of what is usual, and these may provoke inquiry or be otherwise suggestive, but they are not unreasonable so as on that account to support an allegation that the son was not adequately protected in the terms of the bargain.

There are many unusual provisions in the settlement before me, but I cannot, however, treat any of these provisions as unreasonable in the sense above mentioned. It is not necessary to say another word about bad drafting. There was certainly nothing improper in providing for expenditure on future improvements, and though the sum of £10,000 seems to have been carelessly fixed, and the clause is inconsistent with the recital, yet there are safeguards which, if difficult to construe, must operate to the protection of the inheritance. I cannot suppose that reservation of a nominal rent will be largely adopted by a tenant in possession, young or old, and the investments in leaseholds is fettered by the trustees' discretion. On the whole, therefore, I think that this strange settlement cannot be upset on the ground that these provisions, or some others which I have not thought it worth while to specify, are unreasonable.

There is one provision remaining to be considered. I pointed out in the course of the argument that clause 4 is not strictly a power to the father to charge the property with £2,000, but is a power given to him to appoint a sum of £2,000 charged by the settlement itself through the term of 1,000 years. The distinction might be important from at least one point of view, but the clause may be conveniently considered to confer, as in substance it does, a power to charge. It is a direct benefit to the father, and imposes on him the burden of proving that the bargain with his son was fair and fairly made. No presumption in favour of the propriety or honesty of the paternal influence has ever been allowed, or ought to be allowed, to relieve him of that obligation. I am far from saying that such a power to charge a moderate amount may not reasonably be inserted in a resettlement, and where the father is bringing new property into settlement, and has expended large sums in improvements, it is neither unusual nor objectionable, but it can only be done with the consent of the son, duly informed and protected. It is for this reason, and not because the amount charged is excessive, that the particular clause has occasioned and justified the litigation.

There must here be noticed the jointure of £200 given to Mrs. Hoblyn, the plaintiff's mother. There is some authority for holding that a charge of this kind ought not to be regarded as a benefit to the father within the rule just mentioned, and I should so hold if necessary in the present case, but it must not, in my judgment, be considered that under no circumstances a charge of that character would be such a benefit.

3. The circumstances under which the settlement was prepared and executed.

The settlement bears date the 20th of October, 1879, and may be taken to have been executed on that date, but it was prepared and finally settled much earlier in the year, and the inquiry need not extend beyond the 26th of July, when it appears to have been engrossed.

The earliest date of which one need think is not accurately ascertained, but it was before, and not much before, the 3rd of March, the plaintiff's birthday, and may be taken to be in the last few days of February or the first day or two of March. The plaintiff was living at home with his father, mother, and sisters, and it seems on affectionate terms with all of them. I do not gather that his education or habits gave him special facilities for understanding such a matter as the resettlement of the family property, but, on the other hand, I must give him credit for average intelligence. While living at home he had been accustomed to go about the estate, including the property which his father had purchased. He had seen the buildings erected and other improvements, and knew that this had been done at his father's cost. He was on friendly terms with Mr. Hancock, the estate agent, with whom he seems to have had occasional conversations. He says that his mother first introduced the subject of a resettlement, but she does not appear to have said much beyond expressing the father's anxious desire. This was before he attained twenty-one. The father also mentioned it to him before that date. He likewise said little. I cannot make out why he thought it better to say a little, but he did, and preferred that the matter should be mentioned to his son by Mr. Hancock. For that purpose Mr. Hancock made a note in two parts, one containing briefly what was proposed, the other stating the rental of the estate, with deductions for interest on the mortgage and the amount required to pay off charges to be made in favour of the sisters. Of the first part of this note he communicated the substance to the plaintiff, but of the second he gave him a copy. Mr. Hancock has been called, and has explained that, this not being a matter of his ordinary business, he has not recorded what took place, nor can he remember with accuracy what passed between him and the plaintiff. I think that either he or the father must have told the plaintiff more than either of them thinks was now told him. But, at any rate, the plaintiff had the advantage of conversations with a gentleman of intelligence who, if not profoundly versed in legal matters, was at least well acquainted with the estate, its capacities and needs, and was able to give him sound practical advice.

I see no reason to doubt that he sufficiently understood the general outline of what was proposed. Of course, he did not understand the mysteries of entail, and probably even now would be puzzled to define his position as tenant in remainder under Robert Hoblyn's will, but he did know that if he survived his father he would become master of the family estate, which if he did not (omitting the uncontemplated event of marriage and issue) would then go to a collateral branch of the family. And he further knew that the property purchased by his father was not included in the family settlement, and might with advantage be included therein. He was also aware that his sisters were unprovided for, and thought it reasonable (as it was) that they should be provided for out of the settled property. Probably he also knew that his mother had no jointure, and was willing she should have one. The general terms of the resettlement were discussed at this interview. They were afterwards varied in many particulars, but with one exception these variations were made on the instructions of the father only, and no communication, direct or indirect, with the son is proved. I can hardly believe that there was not some communication between the father and son respecting them as there certainly was about the excepted variation, but I repeat there is no evidence of it. The excepted variation is important. It had been arranged on the 4th that a lump sum (£8,000) should be charged for the sisters. It was afterwards suggested by the father or the son, it is impossible to say which, but probably the father, that for this should be substituted a charge of annuities and a less sum of £2,000, and this was communicated to Mr. Whitefield by the son on the 10th of March. Mr. Whitefield enters it as the son's proposal, but says that he regarded him as the father's messenger. I think that neither view can be accepted as correct, and that really the instructions must be taken to have been those of the father and son jointly. Ultimately the deed was settled on the basis of the original instructions thus varied, and it is the resettlement whose contents I have already sufficiently summarized. There had crept into it (no one knows how) the charge of £2,000 in favour of the father, which I will deal with presently.

The necessary disentailing deed was executed long before the resettlement. There apparently was no explanation to the son why two deeds were required, nor was it explained to him what the effect of the disentailing deed standing alone would have been. He regarded the two as being what in truth they were, parts of one transaction, and I am not disposed to attribute weight to any other view of them. It is a matter of regret that greater care was not taken throughout the business, and that what took place was not more accurately recorded. But though I regard the case as one of extreme difficulty, and lying on the border-line which divides settlements supportable, notwithstanding the exercise of parental influence, and those which the court set aside because the son has not been sufficiently protected; yet on the whole, after the best consideration I can give to the facts, including, of course, many details which I have not thought it worth while to specify here, and the authorities on this branch of law, including, of course, many not separately cited, I have come to the conclusion that, except as regards the charge for the father's benefit, the resettlement of the 20th of October, 1879, is a reasonable embodiment of what was in substance intended by the son, as well as by the father, and, therefore, cannot be set aside.

But this charge—how came it to be there? There it is, and there it ought not to have been. It stands so completely alone, and might, if not exercised, be so easily removed without affecting the rest of the deed that, arguments to the contrary notwithstanding, I think it might properly be expunged, and the settlement as a whole preserved. But the father has saved me all trouble on this score. He has executed a deed releasing his power and indemnifying the inheritance against the charge of £400 raised for his own occasions. That indemnity is not equivalent to a release, the inheritance still remaining charged, and no security being given; but I think it would be adherence rather to the letter than the spirit of authorities to say that anything remains obnoxious to the rule which precludes a father from taking a benefit without due protection to the son. The £500 which was raised for the son's benefit continues a charge. He cannot complain of that. Mrs. Hoblyn offered at the trial to release her jointure, and this has been done. I have, therefore, been relieved from considering this part of the settlement as carefully as others, and I need say no more about it. The result is, the plaintiff's claim to set aside the settlement fails. He and the estate will be exonerated from the charge in favour of the father, except so far as it has been utilized for the plaintiff's own benefit, and also from the jointure to the mother. There will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants. The father, of course, can have no costs. He must be held responsible for the charge in his favour, and he has admitted the responsibility by releasing it. Indeed, I take it that he would not in any case have asked for costs. This last remark applies to the mother also, who has released her jointure. The plaintiff must pay the costs of all the other parties.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Emmet, Son, & Stubbs, for H. F. Whitefield, St Columb.

Solicitors for the defendant, Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton, for Coode & Shilson, St. Austell; Whitakers & Woolbert, for G. M. Mackay, Shepton Mallet.

Q. B. Div. (Denman and Charles, JJ.) } June 18, 19, 1889.

TANCRED v. DELAGOA BAY AND EAST AFRICA RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Mortgage — "Absolute assignment" — Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6.

A mortgage of debts due to the mortgagor, and containing the usual proviso for redemption and reconveyance, is an absolute assignment (not purporting to be by way of charge only) within the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 6, and the mortgagee is entitled to sue in his own name for the debts.

Burlinson v. Hall, 32 W. R. 492, 12 Q. B. D. 347, followed.

National Provincial Bank v. Harle, 29 W. R. 564, 6 Q. B. D. 626, disapproved.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from an order of a master, and referred to the court by Denman, J., at chambers.

It was an action brought by Sir Thomas Tancred, Goslings & Sharpe, and C. W. Kingdon to recover a sum due from defendants to Tancred under an award.

The plaintiff Tancred had assigned the debt in question by a deed of mortgage to Goslings & Sharpe to secure an advance. He had likewise assigned the same debt, subject to the mortgage to Goslings & Sharpe, to the plaintiff Kingdon. Both these mortgages contained a proviso for redemption and reassignment, and express notice of these mortgages had been given to the defendants.

In their defence the defendants pleaded, amongst other things, that they did not admit that Goslings & Sharpe and Kingdon were respectively assignees of the debt. The master at chambers struck out the defence as being frivolous and vexatious, and upon the appeal Denman, J., referred the matter to the court.

At the hearing it was agreed that the court should decide whether Goslings & Sharpe were assignees within the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 6, and as such entitled to sue in their own names.

R. O. B. Lane, for the defendants.—This defence is neither frivolous nor vexatious. This case is governed by National Provincial Bank v. Harle, 29 W. R. 564, 6 Q. B. D. 626. A mortgage in equity is merely a charge upon the mortgaged property, and therefore an assignment by way of mortgage necessarily purports "to be by way of charge only." This assignment is, therefore, not an absolute assignment within the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 6.

Bigham, Q.C. (H. Tindal Atkinson with him), for the plaintiffs Goslings & Sharpe.—This is an absolute assignment within the Act. The case of Burlinson v. Hall, 32 W. R. 492, 12 Q. B. D. 347, governs this case. The case of National Provincial Bank v. Harle is inconsistent with Burlinson v. Hall, for in that case it was argued that there was an implied condition for reconveyance. A charge—which is an undertaking to pay out of a particular fund—is very different from a complete assignment by way of mortgage.

Lane, in reply.—Burlinson v. Hall was the case of an absolute assignment to a trustee, and there was no right of foreclosure or redemption, as there is in a mortgage.

DENMAN, J.—In this case a master at chambers made an order striking out the whole of the defence, and the defendants appealed against that order so far as it related to the paragraph of the defence which denied the assignment to the plaintiffs Messrs. Goslings & Sharpe and C. W. Kingdon. The appeal came before me at chambers, and I referred the matter to the court.

The parties have now agreed that we shall decide the question whether the assignment to Messrs. Goslings & Sharpe is one upon which they are entitled to sue in their own names. That depends upon whether this assignment comes within the provisions of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, which enacts that "any absolute assignment in writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of any debt or other legal chose in action of which express notice in writing should have been given to the debtor . . . shall be and be deemed to have been effectual in law . . . to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal and other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same, without the concurrence of the assignor." The assignment in the present case clearly includes the whole of the amount due under the award for which the present action is brought. The difficulty in the case is raised by the contention of the defendants that, according to the decision in National Provincial Bank v. Harle, this assignment is not an absolute assignment (not purporting to be by way of charge only) within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. There is no doubt very great difficulty in attempting to reconcile that case, which was decided by Pollock, B., on demurrer, with the case of Burlinson v. Hall, which was subsequently decided by Day and A. L. Smith, JJ., sitting as a divisional court.

Now the document in this case does not appear to us to purport to be "by way of charge only," either expressly, or by necessary inference from its provisions, within the meaning of the section; it is an absolute assignment of the debt; a document given "by way of charge" is not one which absolutely transfers the property with a condition for reconveyance, but is a document which only gives a right to payment out of a particular fund or particular property, without transferring that fund or property. If it is necessary for us to decide whether the cases of National Provincial Bank v. Harle and Burlinson v. Hall are in conflict—and I cannot see any valid distinction between them—I think that the latter case is right, and that we must follow that case. The very point raised in this case was raised, argued, and decided in Burlinson v. Hall. It is true that Day, J., does, in his judgment in the latter case, point out what he thinks might have been the turning point in National Provincial Bank v. Harle, but I do not think that that makes any distinction in principle. When the decision of a single judge, whether hearing demurrers or sitting at Nisi Prius without a jury, conflicts with the decision of a divisional court, as in these two cases, I think that we, sitting as a divisional court, ought to follow the decision of another divisional court in preference to that of a single judge. We therefore decide that this assignment is an absolute assignment within sub-section 6, and does not purport "to be by way of charge only," and that the proviso for reconveyance does not prevent it from being absolute, or make it purport to be by way of charge only. Messrs. Goslings & Sharpe, therefore, being assignees of the whole fund within the terms of sub-section 6 of section 25, are entitled to sue in their own names, and to have judgment for the whole amount.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and do not desire to add anything to the reasons given by my brother Denman, in which I entirely concur. I will only make this observation, that I feel the same difficulty in endeavouring to distinguish between the cases of National Provincial Bank v. Harle and Burlinson v. Hall, and that I think those cases are not reconcilable. I have no hesitation in following the latter case, for the same reasons as given by my brother Denman.

Judgment for the plaintiffs Goslings & Sharpe.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs Goslings & Sharpe, Woodroffe & Burgess.

Solicitors for the defendants, Slaughter & May.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 1.

In re ROYLE.
ROYLE v. HAYES. (a.)

Practice — Originating summons — Jurisdiction — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, r. 3 (g).

The court has no jurisdiction, on an originating summons under ord. 55, r. 3, to determine any question or matter which could not have been determined in an action for administration of the estate or trust.

An originating summons was issued by an executor as plaintiff, to have it determined whether or no a particular sum of money formed part of the testator's estate at the time of his death. The summons was served on the testator's widow as defendant, she taking under the will a life interest in the testator's estate.

The defendant filed an affidavit, in which she claimed the sum in question, not under the will, but as a gift made to her by the testator in his lifetime, and she appeared on the hearing of the summons, but then took the objection that the court had no jurisdiction, in such proceedings, to determine her claim. The judge who heard the summons considered he had jurisdiction, and, after hearing the evidence adduced by the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, he held that there had been no gift of the sum in question made to the defendant by the testator in his lifetime.

Held, on appeal, that the court had no jurisdiction on originating summons to determine the question raised by the claim of the defendant.

In re Davies, Davies v. Davies, 36 W. R. 587, 38 Ch. D. 210, approved.

In re Turcan, 37 W. R. 70, distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The chief point dealt with on this appeal was whether the court, on an originating summons taken out by an executor under ord. 55, r. 3, had jurisdiction to determine the validity of a claim raised adversely to the will, by a person who also occupied the position of a beneficiary under the will.

The testator, Wm. Royle, who was a farmer, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his executors, Alfred Royle and Geo. Hayes, on trust, to permit the testator's widow to carry on the testator's farming business, and for that purpose to use and employ such part of the testator's personal estate as might be necessary therefor.

An originating summons was issued by one of the executors, Alfred Royle, as plaintiff, the defendants being Geo. Hayes, the other executor, and the testator's widow, Sarah Royle, as a person "entitled under the will of the testator to the income of his real and personal estate." The summons asked that the court might determine, under ord. 55, r. 3 (a) (c) (g), "the following questions or matters arising in the administration of the estate of Wm. Royle:—(1) Whether or no the sum of £171 15s. received by the testator in part payment of the purchase-money of a plot of freehold land from the purchaser thereof, or any part of the said sum, belonged to the testator, and formed part of his estate at the time of his death; (2) whether, if the said sum of £171 15s., or any part thereof, belonged to the testator at his death, the use of the same was, or is, necessary for carrying on his farming business; (3) whether the defendant Sarah Royle ought to render any, and if so what, accounts to the executors and trustees of the testator in respect of the farming business of the testator; (4) consequential relief."

(a) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant Sarah Royle, on being served with this summons, made an affidavit, in which she claimed that the said sum of £171 15s. had been given to her as a gift by the testator in his lifetime. The affidavit, however, raised no objection on the point of jurisdiction.

The defendant Sarah Royle appeared on the hearing of the summons, and counsel on her behalf then took the objection that the court had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter on originating summons. Kekewich, J., however, considered he had jurisdiction, and, after hearing the evidence filed by the plaintiff and the defendants respectively, he decided that there had been no gift of the £171 15s. in question, by the testator in his lifetime, to the defendant Sarah Royle.

The defendant Sarah Royle appealed.

Levett, for the appellant.—The court had no jurisdiction on an originating summons to try and determine a claim such as that of the defendant's—viz., a claim hostile and adverse to the will of the testator—such a claim could not be determined in an action for administration of the testator's estate, and, therefore, cannot be determined on an originating summons: In re Davies, Davies v. Davies, 36 W. R. 587, 38 Ch. D. 210. [He was stopped by the court.]

Ford, contrà.—The question raised by the summons is really a question of account, and the defendant Sarah Royle, the widow, is a beneficiary under the will. [COTTON, L.J.—But the widow claims this sum as having been given to her by the testator in his lifetime, and not as forming part of his estate at the time of his death.] The point as to the jurisdiction was not taken until the summons came on for hearing before the judge below, and the submission of the defendant was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction: In re Turcan, 37 W. R. 70, Annual Practice, 1888-9, p. 728. The case of In re Davies was a question arising between two beneficiaries, and not a question raised between an executor and a beneficiary, as this is.

COTTON, L.J.—On the question of jurisdiction Kekewich, J., considered he had jurisdiction to deal with the question raised, on an originating summons under ord. 55, r. 3, but in my opinion that view is erroneous. Under ord. 55, r. 3, questions between executors and legatees, as legatees, may be determined on an originating summons, but the claim dealt with on this summons is not a claim by the widow as legatee, but is a claim raised by her in respect of a sum of money alleged by her to have been given to her by her husband in his lifetime. It is therefore a question arising between executors and a person who says she is entitled to the sum of money in question, not as a legacy, but as a gift inter vivos. That is not a question which could be properly decided in an administration action. In an administration action it would have been proper to direct an inquiry as to what sums of money formed part of the testator's estate, but on such inquiry there could not have been any decision against the claim of the widow, who does not claim this money as part of the testator's estate. I therefore think that Mr. Levett's objection must prevail.

BOWEN, L.J.—With regard to the point as to jurisdiction, I agree that the question arising for determination on this originating summons is one which cannot, adversely to the wish and without the consent of the defendant, be decided or dealt with by the court, and that it does not come within ord. 55, r. 3 (g). It was contended that the defendant had submitted to the jurisdiction by filing evidence and appearing on the hearing of the summons, and the case of In re Turcan was relied on as an authority for that contention. But that case only decided that if a person who claimed adversely to the trusts declared by an instrument, appeared on the hearing of proceedings taken for the administration of the trusts, and took no objection to the jurisdiction in the court below, it was not open to him on appeal to raise the question of jurisdiction. That is an entirely different case from the present one. In my opinion in the present case the court had no jurisdiction to deal, as it did deal, with this matter on an originating summons.

FRY, L.J.—I am of entirely the same opinion. I think that ord. 55, r. 3 (g), is not intended to give jurisdiction except in matters which might have been determined in an administration action. The words "determination of any question arising in the administration of the estate or trust" are emphatic. I entirely concur with the views expressed by North, J., in the case of In re Davies, on this point.

Subsequently counsel for the respondent, the defendant Sarah Royle, agreed to waive the objection as to jurisdiction, and submitted the claim raised by her for the determination of the court in the present proceedings, and the court, after hearing the evidence, decided that there had been a gift of the £171 15s. made by the testator in his lifetime to the defendant Sarah Royle.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Yielding, Barlow, & Piper, for Cobbett, Wheeler, & Cobbett, Manchester.

Solicitors for the respondent, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for W. H. Vaughan, Cheadle.

From Chan. Div. Aug. 5, 1889.

In re POUND, SON, & HUTCHINS.

Ex parte DEBENTURE CORPORATION. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Debenture—Mortgage—Receiver—Right of debenture-holders to take possession of mortgaged property after winding-up order—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 87, 163—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 19, 24.

Where a limited company, which has mortgaged property to debenture-holders, is being wound up, a receiver appointed by the debenture-holders under their deed, has a right to possession of the mortgaged property, though it is necessary, in order to avoid committing a contempt of court, to apply for the permission of the court for him to take possession.

A limited company charged all its present and future property and undertaking with payment of debentures, which provided that, at any time after a winding-up petition against the company had been presented, the debenture-holders might appoint a receiver of all the property charged, as if they were mortgagees within the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and that such receiver should have power to take possession of the property, carry on the business of the company, sell or let the property, and call up capital. After a petition had been presented, and an order made to wind up the company, the debenture-holders appointed a receiver, and applied to the court for leave for him, notwithstanding the appointment of an official liquidator, to take possession of the assets.

Held, that leave to the receiver to take possession ought to be given, the applicants consenting that it should be without prejudice to any question as to the receiver's powers other than the powers to take possession of and sell the property.

Judgment of Kay, J., 37 W. R. 726, reversed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

This was an appeal by the Debenture Corporation (Limited), from an order of Kay, J., appointing the liquidator of Henry Pound, Son, & Hutchins (Limited) to be receiver of the assets comprised in the security given to the debenture-holders, with liberty to the Debenture Corporation, who were the holders of all the debentures, to attend the proceedings till they were paid off.

The company (Henry Pound, Son, & Hutchins (Limited)) had in 1888 issued first mortgage debentures to the amount of £20,000, which were all taken by the Debenture Corporation, and all the present and future capital, property, and undertaking of the company were, by the debentures, charged with payment of the amounts owing on them. An express power was also given for the corporation, at any time after a petition for winding up the company should have been presented (and in certain other events), to appoint a receiver of all the property charged, as if the corporation were mortgagees within the meaning of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and had become entitled under that Act to exercise the power of sale thereby conferred, and such receiver was to have power to take possession of the property charged, carry on the business of the company, sell or let the property, call up uncalled capital of the company, and do other specified acts.

In 1889 a winding-up order was made on a creditor's petition, and an official liquidator was appointed. A few days after the winding-up order, the Debenture Corporation, under the powers given by the debentures, appointed a receiver of the company's property, and served notice of the appointment on the official liquidator. The liquidator considered the assets were worth considerably more than the amount due on the debentures, so as to leave something for the unsecured creditors.

The corporation then took out a summons that, notwithstanding the appointment of an official liquidator, the receiver appointed by the corporation might be at liberty forthwith to take possession of all the undertaking and property, both real and personal, of the company.

The case is reported below at 37 W. R. 726, where the facts, and the provisions of the debentures, are more fully stated.

Kay, J., held that the court had power to impose terms on debenture-holders who apply in a winding up for leave to take possession of all the assets of the company under the powers of their debentures, and that, under the circumstances, leave to take possession should not be given in the present case, but that the official liquidator should be appointed receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders, with liberty to them to attend the proceedings until their claims were satisfied.

The corporation appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and H. S. Theobald, for the appellants.—We come to the court to ask for directions merely because it would be a contempt to disregard the winding-up order and take possession without the leave of the court. It is a matter of course to give first mortgagees leave to take possession. That is so even when a puisne incumbrancer has obtained the appointment of a receiver: Langton v. Langton, 3 W. R. 222, 7 De G. M. & G. 30. When an action is brought by debenture holders it has been laid down frequently that, though the court has jurisdiction to stop the action, it will not do so. But where the action is for a receiver, then the receiver is appointed by the court, which accordingly appoints the official liquidator as receiver. The court, being asked for a receiver, grants it ex debito justitiæ, but finding one, in the shape of the official liquidator, already in possession for another party, appoints him, if a fit and proper person, as a matter of course. But for section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, we could take possession of our own motion and give effect to our rights. If the liquidator, as he swears in his affidavit, can make more of the property than the amount owing to us, let him redeem us. It is said we ought to have applied before the liquidator was appointed. There is no authority for that, and, moreover, if we had done so, we should have been told we must wait till he was appointed. There has been, in fact, no delay. The property is our own, and we only come here out of respect for the court. We rely on In re David Lloyd & Co., 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 339. [They were stopped.]

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Marten, Q.C., and John Chester, for the official liquidator.—As soon as the winding up begins the rights of the creditors intervene, and it becomes the duty of the court to conduct the winding up. Section 87 says no proceedings are to be commenced against the company without the leave of the court. Under these debentures, the holder may take immediate possession of the property of the company, sell, let, make calls, carry on the business, and do everything that can be done by the official liquidator. The cases show that, if it is a mere question of protecting the mortgagees' rights, the liquidator is the proper person. As soon as the winding up has begun, the only person who can be appointed is the liquidator. Under the terms of the debentures, the holders can make calls on the shareholders and act inconsistently with the winding up so as to interfere with it. Such powers can only apply where the company is a going concern. [FAY, L.J.—Is there any case in which the court has appointed a receiver for a man who has not asked for one?] Perry v. Oriental Hotels Co., 18 W. R. 779, L. R. 5 Ch. 420; Campbell v. Compagnie Générale de Bellegarde, 24 W. R. 573, 2 Ch. D. 181. In In re Brown, Bayley, & Dixon, Ex parte Roberts, 30 W. R. 5, 18 Ch. D. 649, which was a debenture-holders' case, liberty to distrain under their contract was refused to trustees for debenture-holders. Here there is only a floating security—there is no assignment or definite charge on any specific property. Tottenham v. Swansea Zinc Ore Co., 32 W. R. 716, is another case. It would be totally inconsistent with the Acts to allow all these powers to be exercised. A mortgagee cannot appoint a receiver under the Conveyancing Act after commencement of winding up proceedings. It would be inconsistent with the Companies Acts to allow an agent of the company nominated after the winding-up order to call up fresh capital and exhaust the remaining means of the company and involve it in fresh liabilities. Then if the receiver cannot be appointed to act according to the terms of the deed, there must be a discretion in the court whether to appoint him or not. [COTTON, L.J.—Assuming we are against you on the main point, we think at present that we ought to limit the powers of this receiver to taking possession, receiving the rents and profits, and perhaps selling.] The order of Kay, J., ought to be maintained in its entirety. If not, it can only be discharged. The judgment is twofold. [COTTON, L.J.—Taking possession under a mortgage is not a "proceeding" within section 87.] The fact that an officer of the court is in possession is sufficient ground to give the court a discretion. If the court has not a discretion it cannot interfere to limit the powers given by the contract. They also referred to Bartlett v. Northumberland-avenue Hotel Co., 53 L. T. N. S. 611, 34 W. R. Dig. 36; Willmott v. London Celluloid Co., 52 L. T. N. S. 642, 33 W. R. Dig. 45. [COTTON, L.J.—Mr. Rigby, we think there are a good many powers which this proviso purports to give to the receiver which cannot be exercised by him, or, at any rate, it is questionable whether they can be; but what we propose (and if you are satisfied with it we need not hear you in reply) is this—to give the receiver liberty to take immediate possession of all the undertaking and property, real and personal, of the company, without prejudice to any question to be raised by the company as to the powers of the receiver other than the power to take possession of the property and to sell all or any part of it. Rigby, Q.C.—We cannot object to that. The court has a certain amount of control over this property. We submit to what your lordship proposes.]

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Kay, J., and it is one of a somewhat extraordinary nature. The debenture-holders, under their debentures, had, by contract with the company, a right to appoint a receiver, who represented them for the purpose of taking possession of the property and selling it, if it should be deemed advisable to sell it. It also gave him various other powers. I think that the winding up does prevent the exercise of many of those powers, but I do not see that that can interfere with the mortgagees' receiver's right to take possession. There is no dispute that the whole property of the company was subject to this mortgage—which was a charge (not exactly a legal mortgage)—and as a part of this security a receiver was to be appointed with power to take possession and to sell. It is said that if this receiver is only to have the powers of a receiver appointed by the court, he must, for the purposes of this application, be treated as if he were a receiver so appointed. That argument seems to me entirely to miss the point. If the court is applied to by a mortgagee to appoint a receiver, the mortgagee not having, without the assistance of the court, power to appoint a receiver, then the court exercises its discretion as to who shall be appointed receiver, and appoints the person whom it thinks best to appoint for the interest of the mortgagee and of the mortgagor; and when a company is being wound up, whether there is a winding up at the time the receiver is appointed or afterwards, then the court says it is quite useless to incur the expense of having two receivers, the liquidator, who is in fact in some senses a receiver, and another receiver appointed in this action. There the court exercises its discretion as to whom it shall appoint. But those cases do not at all apply, in my opinion, where a receiver who is asking to be let into possession has not been appointed by the court, but is appointed by the mortgagees under and in exercise of the power given them by the mortgage deed. In such a case it is not left to the court to determine who shall be the receiver best for the interest of all parties, but the mortgagee comes and says, "My deed enables me to appoint A. B., and I have appointed him: let him into possession." Then it is said, If that is so why do the debenture-holders apply to the court in respect of their receiver at all? That is an admission that the court has a discretion. No, it is not that—it is this: a person having security on a property which is in the possession of an officer of the court, cannot, if he would otherwise take possession, take possession without the leave of the court, so as to dispossess the officer of the court who is in possession.

It has been argued by Mr. Chester (and he wished to thrust that argument on the other side) that this was an application under section 87, which says "No suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the court." Certainly nothing has been said here, either by Mr. Rigby or by Mr. Renshaw, to lead to the suggestion that they were applying with reference to that section; but it is this—that they would be guilty of contempt of court if the receiver appointed under this deed, after the appointment of the liquidator, and after the liquidator was in possession, had taken possession of that which the liquidator, the officer of the court, held. This is why they apply to ask the court to enable them, notwithstanding the possession of the officer of the court, to exercise the rights which they have under their own deed. But it is said that this will entirely put an end to the winding up, and that it will entirely withdraw the winding up from the control of the court. To some extent no doubt it would, where the company which is being wound up has entirely parted with all its property, and where it has given a simple mortgage of all its property. That would paralyze the winding up, and would paralyze the action of the liquidator, and would certainly take away any provision for the costs of the liquidation, or anything with which the liquidator could deal, if the property mortgaged were the entire property of the company. But I do not think at all that here the receiver appointed under this deed, who is under some necessity to be called a receiver, which raises the presumption that he is like a receiver appointed by the court, can do all the things which are mentioned in this provision contained in the debentures. For he certainly cannot carry on the business of the company after the winding up; he cannot make calls; he cannot use the name of the company in any proceedings. There are a vast variety of things which we do not interfere with by any exercise of discretion by the court as to allowing the receiver to take possession, for this reason, that, so far as my present information goes, the altered position of the company is such as to prevent various things, which this debenture authorizes the receiver to do, being done. Therefore, I think it is the right of the mortgagees or the debenture-holders (I treat them as mortgagees) to take possession of the mortgaged property, the winding up not in any way interfering with that, or with the selling of the property, nor enabling the liquidator to employ and use in carrying on the business of this company (as he may do for the purpose of the winding up) that which is not the property of the company, but which is the property of the debenture-holders—that is to say, the mortgagees.

I cannot understand, I must say with great respect, how Kay, J., could appoint the liquidator receiver, because there was no action in which any receiver could be appointed by the court, and if he did not give to the receiver appointed under this deed what I think it was the right of the debenture-holders to take possession of, I cannot see how he could appoint the liquidator to be a receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders. What I think we ought to do, will be to discharge the order, and to make an order for liberty for the receiver to take possession, adding that saving clause which Fry, L.J., has sketched out, and which I have already read.

FRY, L.J.—Substantially this is an application by a mortgagee for leave to take possession of property which is in the custody of the officer of the court. There is a difference, which I will refer to presently, between such an application and the present one, but in substance it seems to me to be of the same nature.

Where the property is in the possession of an officer of the court and there are legal or equitable rights in that property not vested in the parties to the action or the persons who are before the court, and such legal or equitable rights are not the subject of the administration then going on—then the court requires that the person who claims to enforce those rights shall apply for leave to enforce them. Those rights may be rights to take possession, bring an action, or do various other things, but the court requires an application to be made to it. Now, on what principle would the court proceed in considering whether that application should be granted? I conceive that it proceeds on the principle of paying the utmost respect to the legal or equitable rights of the persons whose interests are not being administered before it. If it were to do otherwise the result would be that the rights of a stranger to the litigation would be diminished by the pendency of that litigation, and that the rights of the parties to the litigation would be increased and improved by the pendency of that litigation—a result which is obviously unjust, and which the court ought never to arrive at, and one at which, in my opinion, it never yet has arrived.

That principle, as expounded by James, L.J., in the case of In re David Lloyd & Co., is that the anxiety of the court must be, though requiring the application to be made to it, not to interfere with the rights of strangers. That being the general principle, it appears to me that this was primarily an application for leave to take possession by a person who has a right to possession, and I do not think the court has any ground for interfering with that right.

The discretion which the court exercises when asked to appoint a receiver differs toto cœlo from the discretion the court is asked to exercise here. In the former case the court has before it, assuming it to be an application by a mortgagee, both mortgagee and mortgagor, and it has regard to the rights of all the litigant parties before it. In that way, where the mortgagor happens to be a limited company which is in course of winding up, the court has, on the ground of convenience and on the ground of saving expense, frequently appointed the liquidator to be the receiver, and in that case there is an application made by the mortgagee to the discretion of the court, and he cannot object to the discretion of the court being exercised.

The main argument in this case seems to me to be based merely upon a confusion of two kinds of application—between an application to enforce the rights of a stranger and an application to the discretion of the court by a litigant asking to be appointed receiver.

But this is not a simple case of a mortgagee applying for leave to take possession; because in the debentures under which the applicants claim, power is given, not to take possession themselves, but to appoint a receiver for the purpose. That is, probably, merely for the sake of convenience. Being a corporation they can only act by an agent. The receiver appointed to take possession is a mere agent for the mortgagees. I can see no reason why we should not give possession to the agent of the mortgagees as well as to the mortgagees directly. It is equivalent to the debenture-holders taking possession under their mortgage, and the application is merely necessitated in order to avoid a contempt, owing to the winding up having placed the affairs of the company under the control of the court. But then it is said "The powers of the receiver are very large, and some of them necessarily come to an end on the happening of a winding-up order." That may or may not be the true construction of the deed. I incline to think that it is so, and that some of the powers will not continue after the winding up of the company, but it is not necessary to decide the point. No argument has been addressed to us to show that the power to take possession is one which necessarily comes to an end on the winding up of the mortgagor. The deed, therefore, stands as a valid one, although, according to its true construction, it may be that some of the powers cannot be exercised. I think, therefore, that the order which Cotton, L.J., has suggested is the right one.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Linklater & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Bonner, Wright, Thompson, & Co.

From Chan. Div. June 7, 1889.

In re CALLAO BIS CO. (a.)

Company—Voluntary winding up—Sale and transfer of assets to new company — Special resolution — Sanction of court—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 138, 161.

The sanction of the court to a special resolution for the transfer, under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, of the business or property of a company to another company (without which sanction the special resolution, in the event of an order being made within a year for winding up the old company by, or under the supervision of, the court, will be of no validity), cannot be obtained under section 138 in a voluntary winding up, but must be obtained in the matter of the winding up, either at the time of the making of an order for winding up by, or under the supervision of, the court, or at the time of the making of any order subsequent thereto.

Judgment of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

The Callao Bis Co. was incorporated in 1885 with a nominal capital of £200,000 in £1 shares, nearly all of which were allotted and fully paid up. An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held in March, 1889, when the following resolutions were passed:—(1) That the Callao Bis Co. (Limited) be wound up voluntarily under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862—1867. (2) That pursuant to section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, the liquidator be and he is hereby authorized to sell and transfer (subject to due provision being made for dissentient shareholders, if any) all the property and assets of the company to a new company, upon the terms of the scheme of reconstruction now submitted to the meeting and identified by the chairman.

The scheme referred to, contemplated the formation of a new company, which was to take over the assets and liabilities of the old company, and, by way of payment, was to allot the bulk of its ordinary £1 shares credited with 15s. paid up, and a certain number of its preference shares fully paid up, to the liquidator for distribution to the shareholders in the old company in proportion to their holdings therein. The above resolutions were duly confirmed as special resolutions at another extraordinary general meeting held sixteen days afterwards.

The new company having been formed, and an agreement for sale of the assets to them in accordance with the terms of the second resolution executed, the old company and its liquidator applied to the court by motion that the sale might be sanctioned by the court, in order to avoid the risk of the resolution being invalidated under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, in case of a compulsory winding-up order, or a supervision order, being made within a year.

North, J., held that the sanction of the court referred to at the end of section 161 was intended to be obtained in the compulsory winding up or winding up under supervision, and not in the voluntary winding up, and he also expressed a doubt whether the court had jurisdiction to entertain such an application in a voluntary winding up, though he thought section 138 might possibly cover it.

The company appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellant company.—The dissentient shareholders are insignificant in number. It would be extremely inconvenient that the validity of a scheme like this should remain in suspense for a year. There is nothing to prevent the court giving its sanction now. That can be done under section 138 in the voluntary winding up just the same as if the company were being wound up compulsorily by the court. No time is specified in section 161 within which the court is to give its sanction. Though Parliament says this can be done in a voluntary winding up, the learned judge considered that all the expense of getting a supervision order from the court must be incurred. There is nothing in the section which prevents the court exercising its jurisdiction at the present time. Every protection has been given to the dissentient shareholders. Section 138 has certainly been held applicable to a case arising under a scheme of this description: In re Union Bank of Kingston-upon-Hull, 28 W. R. 808, 13 Ch. D. 808; Ex parte Fox, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 176, at p. 186, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 54.

G. F. Hart, for a dissentient shareholder.—First, as to the grammatical wording of the section, the words are not "such resolution shall not be of any validity unless it 'shall be' sanctioned by the court," but the word used is "is"—"unless it is sanctioned by the court." Unless such an event as a winding-up or supervision order happens, the question of going to the court for its sanction does not arise at all. Such an order is a condition precedent. There is no machinery in section 161. The last part of that section was not intended to give anyone the power of any fresh machinery for obtaining the opinion of the court. "Such resolution" means, not a resolution for transferring or selling the property of the company, but a resolution to enable the liquidator to accept the consideration in a particular way. The sentence "and any sale made or arrangement entered into by the liquidators in pursuance of this section shall be binding on the members of the company being wound up" only applies between the company and its members. It is admitted there may be creditors of whom nothing is known yet, and the policy of the Act was to let them have a year to come in. The power is to sell the whole or a portion of the company's property. Can it be said a company can pass a resolution giving the liquidator power to sell any part; and then the liquidator can come to the court with the resolution to make any arrangement, and ask the court to sanction it? No winding-up order to be made would in any way affect the members of the company. Though the argument ab inconvenienti is very strong, the words of the section are very strong also, and there are arguments of convenience on the other side. As to the question of jurisdiction, everyone interested in the scheme must be represented or served. If done in a winding up, the liquidator will represent everyone except a particular creditor who may be prejudiced by the scheme. The court will require a thorough discussion and investigation of the scheme in all its branches, and therefore all shareholders, creditors, &c., must be represented. Nothing in the nature of this application has ever been granted under section 138. Only orders determining a question, not orders sanctioning a scheme, have been so granted. That was the case in the Union Bank case, and in Ex parte Fox there was merely a suggestion as to the jurisdiction under section 138. The winding-up jurisdiction is not the remedy for a contributory to invoke in such a case—he must bring an action. Such an application as the present ought not to be granted for the first time twenty-seven years after the passing of the statute. He referred to In re The Taurine Co., 32 W. R. 129, 25 Ch. D. 118.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application by way of appeal from an order of North, J., who decided that, when a resolution has been passed under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, the sanction of the court cannot be given to it, under that section, when no compulsory or supervision order has been made.

The first question is whether section 138 gives the court power to entertain this application. If it does not, there is no power to do so. In my opinion that section does give power to the court to entertain the question, as one arising in the winding up, because this is a question how the winding up is to be conducted, and how the shareholders are to get the value of their shares; but then it applies only unless the Act points out a different mode of procedure. It is clear the sanction of the court could be given if a compulsory order or supervision order were made. Then it is said it is inconvenient to have recourse to such an order. But it often happens that the Legislature does not provide against the inconveniences which may arise in any particular case in resorting to a remedy which it has provided.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In my opinion the view of North, J., is unfortunately the correct one. Section 161 enables a resolution to be passed in a voluntary winding up authorising the liquidator, either generally or in carrying out a particular scheme, to sell the assets and make payment to the shareholders by giving them shares in another company; and it provides that this shall be binding on all the members of the company which is being wound up, subject to this proviso: that dissenting members can require the liquidator either to abstain from carrying the resolution into effect, or to pay them the value of their shares. No provision is made there for creditors.

When we look back to section 146 we find that, where a company is being voluntarily wound up, and then an order for compulsory winding up is made, the court may, if it thinks fit, provide in such order or any other order, for the adoption of all or any of the proceedings taken in the course of the voluntary winding up. That does not apply to the case of the supervision order. But the proviso at the end of section 161 applies to both supervision and compulsory orders. In my opinion, what is intended by the proviso is the carrying out more fully, with reference to such sales as are contemplated by that section (and whether a winding-up order or a supervision order is made), of that which is provided for generally as regards a compulsory winding-up order in section 146. As there is not in section 161 anything which points to the sanction being given in the voluntary winding up, I think the fair construction is, that this resolution would be binding on the shareholders, but that, as possibly there are other creditors who may not know of the resolution or see how it will affect their interests, their rights are reserved; and so if within a year proceedings are taken which lead to an order for compulsory winding up, or continuing the winding up under supervision, then the resolution, and consequently the sale made under it, are to be of no validity, unless the court, either by the order directing the winding up or supervision, or by a subsequent order, directs that the resolution shall be a good resolution. In my opinion that is the correct construction of section 161. It may be inconvenient, but I think this is the course which must be adopted, notwithstanding the inconvenience. Generally speaking, the creditors would be the only persons who could raise this question and ask for an order to invalidate the resolution. I am not prepared to say that the court will never interfere by making a supervision order at the instance of a shareholder, but the court is very unwilling to do it, and, practically, the only difficulty is as regards the creditors who are not treated by section 161 as intended to be bound by any resolution made under it. The appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am thoroughly impressed with the inconveniences of the conclusion we have arrived at, because I cannot help seeing that the sale, though made perfectly bonâ fide, may be impeached at any time within a year, and after various things have been done under it. Still, I think North, J., has put the true construction on the clause. First, the words at the end of section 161 seem rather to import a sanction in a winding up, compulsorily or under supervision, than a sanction independently of it. The concluding words are to the effect that, if an order for winding up by, or under the supervision of, the court be made, the resolution is to be of no validity unless sanctioned by the court, the natural meaning of which is, unless the court at the time of making the order, or by subsequent order, sanctions the resolution. That conclusion, as pointed out by Cotton, L.J., fits in well with section 146, which, in the case of a compulsory winding up being ordered after the voluntary winding up has been going on, provides for the adoption, if the court thinks fit, of the proceedings in the voluntary winding up. The effect, therefore, appears to me to be that strong pressure is put on all persons concerned in making and carrying out these resolutions to make such a resolution as shall be sure of receiving the sanction of the court. If that is done the purchaser will have very little to fear of the court refusing its sanction. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs, and the appellants must pay the respondents' costs of the appeal, though the question is a proper one to be brought before the court.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant company, Snell, Son, & Greenip.

Solicitors for the respondent, Gresham, Davies, & Dallas.

From Chan. Div. May 20—22, 1889.

TURTON v. TURTON. (a.)

Trade name—Use of similar name—Defendant having same name as plaintiff—Injunction.

The plaintiffs had for many years carried on the business of steel plate manufacturers at Sheffield under the corporate name of "Thomas Turton & Sons (Limited)," and that name had obtained a prestige in the trade. The defendant, John Turton, had also for many years carried on at Sheffield a similar business under the name of "John Turton & Co." In 1888 John Turton took two of his sons into partnership with him, and they adopted the name of "John Turton & Sons" as their firm name.

The plaintiffs sought to have the defendants, John Turton and his sons, restrained from carrying on business under the name of "John Turton & Sons," or any other name so closely resembling the name of the plaintiffs as to be calculated to deceive. The evidence showed that the defendants had done nothing—apart from the adoption of the name of "John Turton & Sons"—to represent their goods or the business carried on by them as being the same as, or in any way connected with, the goods or business of the plaintiffs; there was, however, some evidence to show that, owing to the similarity of the names of the two firms, letters intended for the plaintiffs had been sent to the defendants.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction against the defendants.

Hendriks v. Montague, 30 W. R. 168, 17 Ch. D. 638, discussed.

Decision of North, J., reversed.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiffs in this action were a limited company carrying on at Sheffield the business of steel plate manufacturers under the corporate name of "Thomas Turton & Sons (Limited)." The plaintiffs were the successors in business of a firm who had for many years carried on the same business at Sheffield under the name of "Thomas Turton & Sons," and that name had become well known in the market and carried prestige with it. The defendants were John Turton and his two sons. The defendant John Turton had for many years carried on at Sheffield a business similar to that of the plaintiffs under the name "John Turton & Co." In June, 1888, John Turton took his two sons into partnership with him, and they then adopted as the name of their firm "John Turton & Sons."

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs by this action claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on their business under the firm name of "John Turton & Sons," or any other firm name so closely resembling the plaintiffs' name as to be calculated to deceive.

The evidence showed that, apart from the adoption of the name of "John Turton & Sons," the defendants had done nothing to represent their goods, or the business carried on by them, as being the same as, or in any way connected with, the goods or business of the plaintiffs. The evidence also showed that the defendant John Turton's sons had entered into a bonâ fide partnership with their father.

There was some evidence to show that since the defendants had adopted the name of "John Turton & Sons" letters intended for the plaintiffs had been delivered to the defendants, and that the similarity of the names was calculated to cause mistakes and blunders.

North, J., granted the injunction the plaintiffs claimed.

The defendants appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Everitt, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the appellants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and J. Cutler, for the respondents.

The arguments used and the material cases relied on are fully dealt with in the judgments.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action was brought for an injunction against the defendants, not for using any trade-mark of the plaintiffs, but for carrying on business under the name in which they have carried on business and in which they propose to carry on business, and to which they claim to have a right.

The plaintiffs had carried on business under the firm name of Thomas Turton & Sons. That business had been carried on by the plaintiffs and their predecessors for a long series of years at the same manufactory, and their business had been carried on in such an excellent manner that the name of Thomas Turton & Sons had become known in the steel or iron trade, and carried with it the prestige of the name, as signifying that if steel was bought from them it would be of the excellent quality that had always been maintained by the manufactory. It was not only that they had used the name, but that the name had come to be a name which would give a prestige to goods in the market. As regards the defendants, it has been proved John Turton, the father of the other defendants, first of all set up in the same town a business, a considerable part of which was the same kind of manufacture of steel as the plaintiffs. After a time he took into partnership his two sons, the other defendants. He had first of all carried on business in his own name of John Turton, and when he took his sons in as partners he took as his business description "John Turton & Sons." Now, it is not alleged—certainly it is not proved—against him, that he did anything in the way of his trade which tended to give any other meaning to the name in which he carried on his business, or which could give any other meaning to it, than merely the fact that he did carry on business and was in partnership with his sons. He had not done anything with the intent or for the purpose of making the use of his simple name look as if his name were the name of the plaintiffs. In some cases, besides using the name, parties have, to use what I think is a happy phrase of Cotton, L.J.'s, "garnished" that use—that is, they have done things besides using the name, in order that the use of that name might look as if it were being used by the old firm. There is nothing of that kind here. The defendants have carried on a business a great part of which is the same as the plaintiffs, but they have carried it on in the name of John Turton & Sons, the name of the principal being John Turton, and, it being true that he has taken his sons in as partners; the defendants have done nothing but that. That is all the defendants propose to do, and, as has been pointed out by Mr. Rigby, although at one time there seems to have been an allegation that the defendants were doing something more than that, in order to make people believe that the manufactory was the manufactory of the plaintiffs, that allegation is withdrawn, and therefore it is clear that there is no charge that the defendants have done anything but simply used it as their business name, and simply carried on their business with a statement that the father is carrying on his business himself as John Turton and with his sons as partners, which is the accurate and exact truth.

Therefore the first question of law in this case is this: Supposing that, and that only, is done by the defendants, but, nevertheless, some people, or, if you please, many people, in the market do from time to time give orders intending them for the plaintiffs' firm, which, on account of the similarity of name, go to the defendants' firm, are the plaintiffs entitled to an injunction? If there had been anything more than the mere use of the name by the defendants in the way I have stated, that there might have been a necessity for an injunction, I think, cannot be denied. Here are two firms: Thomas Turton & Sons and John Turton & Sons; well, careless people may not notice the difference of Christian name, and may look more to the name of "Turton & Sons," which are the same in both. That might be so. Therefore, for this purpose, I assume that the names are sufficiently alike to cause those blunders in trade; but they are blunders of the people who make the blunders. Has the defendant John Turton done anything to so far cause that blunder, even though he did not intend it, which entitles the court to stop him from doing what he is doing. He is simply stating that he is carrying on business with his two sons as partners. I say that is the accurate and exact truth of what he is doing. I will assume for the moment that it is pointed out to him that, he doing that, blunders will occur in the business, and that the results which are complained of will happen. Is there anything dishonest—is there anything wrong morally in any, even in the strictest sense—in a man using his own name, or stating that he is carrying on business exactly as he is carrying it on? Is there anything wrong in his continuing to do so because people make blunders, and even, if you please, because they make probable blunders? What is there wrong in what he is doing?

Now it is said that the plaintiffs have a trade name and a property in their name. I doubt about property, though they have this right: That no man shall wrongfully interfere with their name. But they have no right to say that a man may not rightly use his own name. I cannot conceive that the law is such. If the law were such, the law would be most extraordinary, and, to my mind, most unjust to prevent a man's using his own name. And I must say this, that all the arguments which have been used in this case would have been equally applicable if there had been nothing about sons, and if one man were carrying on business as Thomas Turton under the circumstances in which Thomas Turton & Sons were carrying on their business, and another man named John Turton were to come and carry on his business simply in his own name. Therefore, the proposition goes to this length: that if one man is in business, and has so carried on his business that his name has become a value in the market, another man must not use his own name. If that other man comes and carries on business, he must discard his own name and take a false name. The proposition seems to me so monstrous that the statement of it carries its own refutation. Therefore, upon principle, I should say it is perfectly clear that if all that a man does is to carry on the same business, and to state how he is carrying it on, that statement being the simple truth, and he does nothing more with regard to the respective names, he is doing no wrong. He is doing what he has an absolute right by the law of England to do, and he cannot be restrained from doing that.

Now let me see if there is authority for what I am saying. I am not going to read what is called the epigrammatic judgment of Knight Bruce, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896. I do not think that a truthful proposition is a bit worse because it is put in an epigrammatic form. It fixes the proposition on one's memory; and when I look at the judgment of Knight Bruce, L.J., I can see no difference in the smallest respect between that judgment and the judgment of Turner, L.J., which immediately follows it, except in the form of expression. But as something which will not give rise to cavil I will take the judgment of Turner, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess: "No man can have any right to represent his goods as the goods of another person, but in applications of this kind it must be made out that the defendant is selling his own goods as the goods of another." That, he says, is the fundamental proposition "where a person is selling goods under a particular name, and another person, not having that name"—that is, where it is not his real name—"is using it, it may be presumed that he so uses it to represent the goods sold by himself as the goods of the person whose name he uses." It looks to me rather as if that would be a primâ facie case. One name is stamped with peculiar value which is given to it, another man who has not that name comes and takes that name. I think primâ facie that would look as if he were doing it for the purpose of interfering, and for the purpose of representing his goods to be the goods of the other. "But where the defendant sells goods under his own name, and it happens that the plaintiff has the same name, it does not follow that the defendant is selling his goods as the goods of the plaintiff." That is to say, if only those two facts are established, that does not make a primâ facie case. The first does make a primâ facie case, but the second does not. Then Turner, L.J., goes into the second case. He does not say so, but the next sentence is, "It is a question of evidence in each case." The first is a primâ facie case, but it may be answered by evidence. In the second case, although that is not a primâ facie case, there may be other circumstances. "It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is false representation or not." He does not say whether there is "representation" or not, but "false representation." That is, he goes back to his fundamental proposition: No man can have the right to represent his goods as the goods of another person. Therefore, if a man uses his own name, that is no primâ facie case, but if, besides using his own name, he does other things so as to produce other circumstances which show that he is intending to represent, and is in point of fact making his goods represent, the goods of another person, then he is to be prohibited, but not otherwise.

I take that to be a perfectly correct representation of what I think the law is, and I think that when you look at the judgment of Lord Blackburn in the case of The "Singer" Machine Manufactures v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 664, 3 App. Cas. 376, you will see that he really comes to the same conclusion. At page 400 Lord Blackburn says, "This is not an action to recover damages for a wrong already committed, but an application for an injunction to prevent the continuance of a wrong which has been committed, and is threatened to be repeated, and I think that if it were proved that if the course pursued would really produce the effect of passing off the defendant's goods as and for the plaintiff's" he is speaking of the particular case in which a man had taken a name not his own—"the injunction should be granted (whatever might be the case as to the account) whether the defendant heretofore meant it to produce that effect or not." There he had the case of a business carried on by one man in such a way that the name had become valuable to him, and there was another man not using his own name, but taking a name which was not his, but closely resembling the plaintiff's name. That is the first case mentioned by Turner, L.J. Lord Blackburn seems to me, by what I am next going to read, to say that might be innocent up to that time because the defendant might not know and might not intend any interference. If a plaintiff were asking for damages for what was past he would have to prove more than the fact that the defendant had taken the name and had injured the plaintiff—the plaintiff would have to prove that the defendant intended it, that what the defendant was doing was fraudulent. That is clear. But Lord Blackburn says if the defendant had not that intent, what he had done, although injurious to the plaintiff up to that time, might be innocent, and if it were innocent the law cannot interfere. But Lord Blackburn goes on to say that under those circumstances the plaintiff, having shown the facts and what was done before, would not be called upon to prove the fraud in order to get an injunction. Why? Because after the matter had been made clear to the defendant and the injury he had been doing, not by taking his own name but by taking another name, if he had persevered as he threatened to do after learning that what he was doing produced these effects, he would, unless in very exceptional cases, do a wrong. Therefore it seems clear to me that you cannot grant an injunction on the ground that a man is doing an innocent or proposes to do an innocent thing. But Lord Blackburn says an injunction must be granted in such a case as that although the damages might not be recoverable from the past, because if the defendant went on as he threatened to do after the matter is pointed out to him, he would be doing a wrong thing. That seems to me to adopt the principle which Turner, L.J., laid down. It comes to this, that you cannot recover damages against a man if he has only done that which he has a perfect right to do; you cannot recover damages against a man unless he has done something which is a wrong against the plaintiff. You can grant an injunction against a man if he is proposing to do, and insisting that he has a right to do, that which if he does it in the future will be a wrong act against the plaintiff. Therefore it is not necessary to show a past wrong. It is sufficient in order to support a claim for an injunction that a man is proposing to do that which will be wrong in future. But if all that you are proposing to do in the future is simply that which by the law of this country you have a right to do, no injunction can go.

Therefore if you take the case before us and try it by those principles, the defendants have done no wrong in the past and even though that which is alleged to be the result, and which for this purpose I will assume to be the result, follows, and will take place in the future, nevertheless that result is not the result of any act of the defendants which can be said to be a wrong act even against the plaintiffs. The defendants have done nothing but carry on business and state to the world that they carry on that business in the exact accurate way in which they carry it on; John Turton has done nothing more than to carry on business under this statement, "I carry on my business as the father, John Turton, with my two sons as partners." That is strictly accurate and he has done nothing more. And I desire to say that if the name of the plaintiffs' business which they had carried on had been Thomas Turton & Co. and that name had become valuable, and if the defendants had bonâ fide and honestly formed a company themselves and had carried on business merely stating that their business was carried on by John Turton & Co., if that were an accurate description of a bonâ fide company constituted by themselves the same result would have followed if they had done nothing more than that, because that statement also would be only simply and perfectly accurate.

Therefore on these grounds I think that, even though the defendants had done damage to the plaintiffs, there would have been no ground for an injunction against the defendants.

I therefore think it unnecessary to determine—although I do not mean to determine it the other way—what the exact result of the evidence is with regard to the business of the plaintiffs.

I am of opinion in this case, both on principle and authority, that the appeal must succeed.

As to the case of Hendriks v. Montague, 30 W. R. 168, 17 Ch. D. 638, which has been cited as against myself and Cotton, L.J., in order, I suppose, to frighten us by something which we had said in that case, I can only say, speaking for myself, that if I have said something in a former case not necessary to the decision of the case, and I have found now that what I have said was wrong, I should nevertheless go home with a quiet mind, believing that when the point came to be material I decided it rightly, although when it was immaterial I had said something wrong about it.

COTTON, L.J.—This case is one of considerable importance, and I think the judgment that has been given by the Master of the Rolls is a right one. It would lead to most serious consequences if people having acquired a business reputation with a name could prevent any man of the same name from carrying on the same business. That is clear and simple.

As to the facts, I agree with what was stated by the Master of the Rolls, but I think it right to state them again shortly. The defendant John Turton, the father, had carried on business as steel roller only originally, but afterwards, and before he formed the present partnership, he carried on that business and added to it the business of steel manufacturer, and a year ago he took two sons, who had been brought up in the business, into partnership. Now it is not for one moment suggested that those sons had not a substantial interest in that partnership; it is not suggested that they were brought in simply for the purpose of adding their names to the firm name under which the father carried on business, but it was assumed that they were fairly and honestly partners in the business. Then the father having taken his two sons in and made them partners, takes the name of John Turton & Sons. In my opinion he does that in the ordinary way of expressing to the mercantile world the fact that his two sons were taken into the business with him in order to introduce them and to put them before the world as persons who were interested as partners in this business. He sends round a circular to all his customers, including the present plaintiffs, announcing that fact in terms to which no objection is made, except as applies to the use of the name John Turton & Sons.

The plaintiffs were a company who had been carrying on a business which in many respects is similar to the business carried on by the defendants, under the name of Thomas Turton & Sons, to which they add the word Limited wherever they express their name in various documents—invoices, &c. That is their name. No bills or billheads have been produced by the respondents.

I assume—because the plaintiffs have not shown anything to the contrary, and it would have been an important thing—that there is nothing in the plaintiffs' billheads which it can be said the defendants are imitating so as to make any false representation as to the name of the firm which they are carrying on. There is no trade-mark—no goods of the plaintiffs have been produced with any marks upon them which it is said the defendants are imitating or have upon their goods.

Therefore it simply comes to this, that there is the name of the defendants, taken under the circumstances which I have mentioned, John Turton & Sons. North, J., has restrained them from using that name in the business which they carry on, though there is nothing at all to represent in any way that the business which they are carrying on as John Turton & Sons is in any way connected with or is the same business as that carried on by the limited company, Thomas Turton & Sons.

We had laid down to us various ingenious propositions by Mr. Moulton which I will not discuss seriatim. What is the principle of these things? It is expressed in what was said by Turner, L.J., in Burgess v. Burgess. That has been read by the Master of the Rolls, and I will not read it again. But the principle is this—No man must pass off his goods as the goods of another. That is the principle upon which it goes. Of course, that may be done unintentionally, but where there is a manifest and natural meaning in the words used that the goods are the goods of somebody else, and the man who uses those terms uses, not his own name, but somebody else's, he would be stopped from doing so as soon as he is aware of the facts which make the primâ facie intention and result of what he is doing, passing off his goods as the goods of somebody else. It was formerly said that no action could be maintained unless a man had done so fraudulently and intentionally, but when he finds out that the natural and primâ facie meaning and the construction of what he is doing, when the facts are known, is to represent his goods to be somebody else's, then he would be stopped, even though he had done that originally, unintentionally, and innocently.

I may say here that the cases as to the trade-marks which were a great deal relied upon by Mr. Moulton are very different from the case of a name, because a trade-mark is a thing which is assumed and invented by a man for the purpose of his goods, and there is no necessity for anybody else putting that mark upon the goods unless the mark is meant to identify them in such a way as to represent that they are the goods of somebody else whose goods are identified in the same way. Of course, if a man takes a mark for his goods, the same as that of another man, if he has not done it intentionally, it is wrong to go on with that representation on his goods when primâ facie it would be taken to mean, not that they are his, but those of some other well-known manufacturer. But here there is no question of trade-mark. As I said before, it is simply a question of name. Here, in my opinion, what has been done by the defendants is simply in the ordinary mercantile way to indicate to the world and to the customers of his firm that the sons have been taken into the business and are carrying on the business with their father. North, J., said—and I think it was one of the foundations of his judgment—that this was a firm name, or a fancy name, and that was argued by Mr. Moulton. But what does this argument come to? I will put it in a syllogistic form. He says, some part of firm names are fancy names, therefore all may be so, therefore all are. It comes to this: that all are fancy names because some are, and all may be. That is entirely wrong. It is very true that a firm name may be a mere fancy name not indicating any members of the firm, but only indicating that the firm continued to carry on the business, where originally the firm name was a mere short description of those partners who carried on the firm. Further, it may not be even any description at all of the partners who carry on the business, but some name which has been adopted for some reason or other; then it can perhaps be called a fancy name. Here, if I am right in the conclusion at which I have arrived as to matters of fact, that without any fraudulent intention, but merely in the ordinary mercantile way of indicating the fact that the sons are partners, the defendants have taken the name that they have taken, it would be wrong to hold that this was a fancy name, or anything but a short convenient way of indicating that the sons are in the business, and have been taken in as partners. That once established, we ought not to deal with it on the footing upon which North, J., dealt with it—that it was a fancy name assumed by the defendants—but it is a mere statement in ordinary language, an honest statement of the persons who carry on the business, and it must be dealt with, it is suggested, in the same way as if it was not the name of the firm describing those members who make up the firm, but the name of an individual carrying on business in his own name. In my opinion the court cannot stop a man from carrying on his business in his own name, although it may be the name of a better known manufacturer, when he does nothing at all in any way to try and represent that he is that better known and successful manufacturer. If that were to be so, there would be at once a monopoly obtained in the use of names by any persons who by carrying on business in one name got a reputation; and it would be a very convenient way of enabling traders to prevent any competition with them by any persons who had the same name in the same trade. Of course necessarily, in my opinion, there must be some confusion when a person who has the same name as another carries on the same business in the same town or place, because, unless people are careful to see that it is Thomas or John they may easily go to one, when probably they intend to go to the other, and the Post-office may very frequently make mistakes, even although one has been established for a long time, if both carry on business together. If one man has been established a year before the other, could the court properly be asked successfully to prevent another man of the same name from coming into the town and carrying on the same business in the same goods simply because the Post-office would be likely to make mistakes and deliver letters to the wrong person? Of course, if anything were done by the second man to hold out or represent that his shop was the shop of the other, or that he was connected with the other when he was not, if there were something added to the name which would enable the court to interfere on the ground that he was trying to represent his business to be the business of the other man, then the court would interfere properly.

Then it was said that the authorities are in favour of the plaintiffs in this case, and various cases were referred to. They are well-known cases and do not require, therefore, any consideration for the purpose of supporting that view. One case that was mentioned was the case of Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84. There Croft was the executor of Day, who had owned the business of Day & Martin. The defendant was a man of the name of Day. I think a relation of the last Day. He was restrained, not from carrying on business in the name of Day & Martin, but from representing that his goods were goods manufactured by the old firm of Day & Martin. What had he done? He had got somebody of the name of Martin who was no connection in business with him to agree to come in and be his partner so as to get the benefit of the name of Day & Martin. Getting a man who is not interested in the business to come in and join him for the purpose of saying he has the name of Day & Martin would be very strong evidence indeed to show that he was trying to represent his goods as those of the old firm of Day & Martin, to which the executors had a right. When we come to the judgment of Lord Langdale he goes through the instances that were given for the purpose of showing that the defendant had made those representations. There was such a similarity in the advertisements of the defendant as to show an intention on his part to pass off his goods as the goods of another. I do not in any way say that fraud is necessary to induce the court to interfere. When a man knows that the natural consequence of what he is doing is to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else, then it is wrong on his part to continue that act. Mr. Moulton pressed in argument this: that the court ought to interfere and stop anything which may be injurious to another person. Yes, if the act done is a wrong one; but whenever a man sets up in business in a town, although it would be interfering with, and to a certain extent injuring, those who were carrying on business before under the same name, in my opinion it would be a wrongful act on the part of the court on those grounds to stop that man from carrying on his business.

Then there was a case quoted which I was rather surprised to hear cited; that was the case of The Merchant Banking Co. of London v. The Merchants' Joint-Stock Bank, 26 W. R. 847, 9 Ch. D. 560. In that case there was a judgment of the late Master of the Rolls. I shall refer to it because it gave a short, and therefore not complete or accurate, statement of Croft v. Day. What the Master of the Rolls said was this: "As the law originally stood I think that any person might use his own name for the purpose of trade. He might use any fancy name for the purpose of trade. If a man's name was Brown or Jones he was not compelled according to the common law to carry on trade under the name of Brown or Jones. He might carry it on under any fancy name he choose, and the mere fact of somebody else having the same name and carrying on trade under that name does not prevent another person from doing the same. If John Brown sells coals, another John Brown may sell potatoes," and I should add he may also sell coals. "There is no law that I know of to prevent his selling his potatoes under the name of John Brown, and the first John Brown could not in such a case restrain the second John Brown from carrying on trade under his own name." Then he goes on in a similar way to show that where there is the mere fact that one man of a particular name carries on a particular business, the court will not interfere to prevent a man who honestly does it from carrying on under the same name a similar trade or the same trade.

Now I come to another case which was referred to both by Mr. Cozens-Hardy and Mr. Moulton—Hendriks v. Montagu—on which North, J., founds his judgment, and founds it, I think, without considering what was the subject the learned judges were dealing with in their judgment when they used the expression on which he relies. That, I say, has always to be considered, because judges do not always guard themselves carefully when they are addressing people whom they suppose to have a knowledge of the law, so as to prevent their judgments being applied to all the possible cases which might arise under entirely dissimilar circumstances. In Hendriks v. Montagu there was a question between two companies. One was called the Universal Life Assurance Society—that was the plaintiff company—and the defendants chose to call themselves the Universe Life Assurance Association. That name of the defendants was in no way a statement of the facts, or of the persons who were going to carry on the business. It was there really a fancy name which they adopted—a name which they had manufactured themselves—and the court thought they ought not to be allowed to do that, having regard to the fact that there was a then existing company carrying on the business which the defendants proposed to carry on under that name—the Universal Life Assurance Society. It could not but be according to the ordinary course in the understanding of the people who had to deal with them, a representation that the business carried on by the defendants was the business, in fact, carried on by the plaintiffs. Therefore the court stopped that, and prevented it from being done. In that case, also, this fact was not immaterial, that, although it was not a case under the Companies Act, they were governed by a provision there that no name should be registered like a name already registered. In my opinion that case cannot in any way be relied upon in the present case.

A man takes a fancy name not to express real facts, but he takes a name which for some reason or other he chooses. If that had been the case here it would have been a different thing. In my opinion it would be wrong to come to the conclusion here that there was any passing off of the goods of the defendants as the goods of the plaintiffs. It must be a question of fact, as indicated by Turner, L.J., in the case of Burgess v. Burgess. The mere fact that the name is the same as that of another person, in my opinion, will not justify the court in assuming that they are passing off their goods as the goods of that other person. It may lead to the conclusion that there will be some difficulty occasioned by the fact, as undoubtedly there will be; but, in my opinion, when a man fairly states the business which is carried on in his own name or in the names of his partners, it is not that his goods may be passed off as the goods of some other person; it is only a representation that they are made by himself.

In my opinion, therefore, this judgment is wrong, and the appeal succeeds.

FRY, L.J.—I also find myself unable to agree with the decision of the learned judge who first tried this case. The facts of the case seem to me shortly to amount to this, that the defendants have made a statement of a fact—namely, that John Turton and his sons are partners. They made that statement simply, and without any varnish or colour. They made it honestly, and in the usual manner in which such statements are made in the course of business. Furthermore, they made it without any misrepresentation, either fraudulent or innocent; and they made it equally without any design or intention to injure the plaintiffs. The statement which they thus made was one which they had a primâ facie right to make, and it was one which they were interested in making. Those are the facts of the case according to my apprehension of them.

Now the legal question which emerges is this: Is the putting forth of such a statement by the defendants actionable by the fact that it will be misapprehended by some persons, and that the plaintiffs will, by reason of such misapprehension, suffer loss. In my opinion that question must decisively be answered in the negative. It appears to me that to answer it in any other way is to interfere with the undoubted right of her Majesty's subjects to use their own names and to make statements of fact which they are interested in making, and which they commit no wrong in making. If we were to hold that a cause of action arose from the misapprehension of the plaintiffs' customers, we should be doing this, we should be creating a cause of action against the defendants by reason of the carelessness or stupidity of the plaintiffs' customers. Now I know of no principle of law or equity which creates such a cause of action as that. I invited Mr. Moulton to tell me whether the cause of action was equitable or legal. He said it was equitable. I know of no such equity as the one which I have just stated. We must regard, again, the results of the affirmative of the proposition I have stated. It would be perpetually to interfere with the legitimate and honest use by a man of his own name, and to interfere with it in a manner which I think is entirely novel to the law of England.

Now, with regard to the authorities, I shall say very little, it appears to me that the plaintiff's contention is diametrically opposed to the well-known case of Burgess v. Burgess. It can stand neither with the judgment of Knight-Bruce, L.J., nor with the judgment of Turner, L.J., and further, I am of opinion that the cases which have been cited in support of the proposition are not relevant. The assumption and use of a trade-mark is not the statement of an existing fact. And again, the creation and assumption of a fancy title for a new company is not the stating of a fact, and it may well be, especially having regard to the section of the Companies' Act which prohibits the registration of companies with similar names, that the court may interfere to prevent promoters of a company assuming a name which is sure to result in deception. I think, therefore, that there is no authority in favour of the plaintiff's contention, and there is distinct authority against it. I think, therefore, that on the question of law which has been raised and discussed the plaintiffs are plainly wrong.

But to my mind they are scarcely, if at all, less wrong in point of fact, because, to my mind at any rate, it has not been proved in the way in which it ought to be proved to justify the granting of such an injunction, that in the present case the use by the defendants of their firm name will be so misapprehended by any considerable number of persons as to result in any substantial or considerable loss, or any loss by the plaintiffs which ought to be regarded at all by the court.

The evidence, to my mind, is of the most unsatisfactory description, a large number of gentlemen, no doubt of eminence and high position in their trades, come forward and swear one as much like the other as is conceivable. There are slight variations no doubt, in the affidavits, but substantially they come and swear the same words. I think the case ought to have been approached with totally different evidence if we were to find the point of fact in favour of the plaintiffs. We should have been shown to what extent the two trades were identical. We should have been shown in what way the deception would operate. We have to bear in mind in this case that it is not a new firm which has started into existence. We have not to measure the use of the word "Turton" but we have only to measure the effect of the change from "Turton & Co." to "Turton & Sons." Much of the evidence goes to show that the confusion arises from the name of "Turton," because sometimes one and sometimes the other was addressed as "Turton & Co."

And, further than that, it is in evidence that they have distinct trade-marks. To what extent are those trade-marks used in the orders which are given? I have no doubt they are extensively used. To what extent is it conceivable that the engineers who know all about the different firms will either ultimately be deluded or for any length of time be deluded by the likeness of the two names.

I think, therefore, that the case breaks down entirely upon the evidence, and I repeat that if the plaintiffs desired to maintain their case they should have produced a very different kind of evidence from that which they have produced. They have endeavoured rather to support this case by a large body of compurgators than by evidence revelant to the issue which was to be decided. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and the action dismissed, with costs.

Everitt, Q.C.—I ask that the costs should be on the higher scale? My friends persuaded the learned judge below that the case was of the greatest importance, and that the costs should be on the higher scale, and he gave them. Therefore I ask that your lordships will do the same.

FRY, L.J.—Mr. Hardy will hardly resist that, I think.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Johnson, Weatherall, & Sturt, for Burdekin & Co., Sheffield.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pattison, Wigg, & King, for Broomhead & Co., Sheffield.

From Q. B. Div. [and Q. B. Div.] May 2; Aug. 8, 1889.

BRACKLEY v. VESTRY OF ST. MARY, BATTERSEA. (a.)

Metropolis—Regulation of streets—Hand-barrow placed in street—Power of vestry to seize and detain—57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., s. 65 (local and personal).

The local authority, having the control of the streets and public places in the metropolis, has power, under section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., after giving due notice, to seize and detain the articles therein enumerated which are placed by any person in any street or public place within the district of the local authority, even though the person so offending may not have been convicted of the offence before a magistrate.

Action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful seizure and detention by the defendants of a hand-barrow belonging to the plaintiff, with certain articles thereon.

The defence was that the defendants were justified in the seizure and detention under 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., s. 65 (local and personal).

The plaintiff sent out a hand-barrow with certain goods thereon for the purposes of sale into one of the public streets within the defendants' district, and the barrow remained in the street in charge of one of the plaintiff's servants. The streetkeeper employed by the defendants served a written notice upon the plaintiff's servant that if he did not remove the barrow from the street, or if he placed it there again, the barrow would be seized and removed to the parish yard, to be there dealt with in accordance with the statute. After service of the above notice the plaintiff again placed his barrow in the street in charge of one of his servants, and the barrow and goods thereon were accordingly seized by the streetkeeper, and upon the plaintiff demanding them back the defendants refused to deliver them up until their charges were paid.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, contending that section 65 of the statute only gave power to seize and detain after conviction of the offender before a magistrate. In the present case the plaintiff had not been charged or convicted of the offence before a magistrate.

The action was tried by Charles, J., without a jury.

May 2.—Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiff.

Channell, Q.C., and J. C. Earle, for the defendants.

CHARLES, J.—In this case the plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendants a sum which it is agreed between the parties is to be £15 as compensation for the seizure by the defendants of a hand-barrow belonging to the plaintiff, while the barrow was upon the evening of July 14 in one of the public streets over which the defendants exercise supervision and control. The defendants justify the seizure of the barrow under section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., and the question I have to decide is this, whether that section authorizes the defendants to seize any hand-barrow in the streets within their jurisdiction after having given the owner of the hand-barrow notice to remove it from the street. In this case, upon three occasions, notice had been given to servants of the plaintiff that he must not keep his hand-barrow in the street, and in particular a written notice was given on the 14th of July to one Tyler, who then had the hand-barrow under his control, to this effect:—"Unless you do immediately remove and keep removed all goods, stalls, barrows, and any other matter or thing as hereunto required, or if, having removed the same, you shall at any time hereafter replace, or cause to be replaced, any of them or any other goods, stalls, barrows, matters, or things in or over any part of the said carriage or footway, I shall seize and remove such goods, stalls, barrows, or any other matter or thing to the parish yard, to be there dealt with in accordance with the statute in that case made and provided." That is signed by the streetkeeper to the defendant vestry. The contention on the part of the plaintiff is that this power of seizure is ancillary to the power which the section gives to the vestry to bring a person who disobeys a notice of that kind before a justice with a view to his being convicted of the offence. I do not say that there are not words in the section which warrant such a construction of it, because the section provides, in the first part of it, that if a person disobeys a notice of the description I have just read, it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace, on complaint being made to him, to issue a summons requiring a person accused of such an offence to appear before him. It is then provided that if it be found that such person has kept his barrow in the street in defiance of the notice of the vestry, the justices can inflict a fine of 40s. for the first offence, and for the second and every subsequent offence a sum not exceeding £5. Then there follows this clause:—"And also, not only shall such penalties become payable and be recovered, but it shall and may be lawful to and for any person or persons appointed, or to be appointed, by the said commissioners, or trustees, or other persons as aforesaid for that purpose, without any warrant or other authority than this Act, to seize any such stall, board, . . . hand-barrow," &c., and any material upon it. I own that I feel the force of what has been contended on the part of the plaintiff, that if that does give an out and out power of seizure, it has this effect, that before any judicial investigation has been made as to whether or not the owner of the barrow has been guilty of any offence pointed out by the Act the vestry may actually seize a barrow in the street. I think, however, that the words of the statute are too strong. I should like to have been able to take another view of the section, but I cannot help feeling that this is in terms an absolute statutory authority to seize the hand-barrow of a person who disobeys such a notice as was served in this case. On looking further into the section, my view of the statute is much strengthened by the directions as to what is to be done in case the goods seized are of a perishable nature.

The section goes on to provide:—"And in case any of the wares, goods, and merchandises so seized shall be perishable, or shall be articles of food, then the same shall be immediately forfeited, and such person or persons who shall seize the same shall deliver the same, or cause the same to be delivered, to the churchwardens or overseers of the poor, or to some of them, or to the master of any workhouse situate in the said parochial or other district, or of the parish whereunto such district shall belong." That clause indicates to me that the power to seize is not simply a power to seize in order to enforce a penalty that has been already imposed, but is a power to seize in order to remove obstructions from the street. There is nothing in the preamble of the statute that helps me very much, but without the preamble it is obvious that, from the terms of section 65, the object of this portion of the section of the statute is to keep the streets clear; and, having regard to the fact that the power to seize is immediately followed by an enactment that if the goods seized are perishable they are to be instantly sold, it seems to be that it would be wrong to construe the clause as contended for by the plaintiff—namely, that it confers simply a power to seize in order to enforce payment of a penalty which has already been imposed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then there are words in the latter part of the section which are relied upon by the plaintiff, and to which I must refer. The section proceeds to provide for what is to be done with the goods if they are not perishable. If they are not perishable they are to be removed to some place named for the reception of them, and notice of that place is to be given to the owner of the goods, "and the same shall be there kept and detained until such owner, driver, or other person interested therein as aforesaid shall cause to be paid the said penalty, together with the charges for taking or removing the same and of keeping such horse or horses, asses or mules, if any." Now, it is said that that indicates clearly that the seizure is not to take place until the penalty is imposed, otherwise what would be the sense of saying that the goods are to be detained until the said penalty, together with the charges, shall be paid? It seems to me that the true answer to that is, that the enactment with reference to the disposition of the goods must be read in connection with what has been done before the goods are seized, and that these words must mean that the goods are to be detained until the owner shall cause to be paid the penalty and the charges if the vestry have thought fit to proceed to the enforcement of the penalty, or, if not, until the charges of taking or removing the goods have been paid. In other words, that, the power to seize being unlimited, the goods are to be detained, if the vestry do not think fit to proceed before the magistrate, until the charges are paid, and, if they have thought fit to proceed before the magistrate, until the penalty as well as the charges have been paid. Then the section proceeds to use other language, which at first sight undoubtedly supports the view of the plaintiff, for it directs in its closing words that "the overplus of the money arising by such sale shall be returned to the owner or owners thereof if he or they shall have given such notice as aforesaid, after deducting the said penalty and such costs, charges, and expenses" as have been incurred. There, again, I think that must mean, after deducting in the one case the penalty, with the costs and charges, and in the other case the costs and charges only. That is the conclusion I have come to in this case. It is, no doubt, a strong thing that the vestry should have power to seize before any judicial investigation has taken place, but the language of the Act seems to me to give that power, and in doing so the Legislature have given them credit for not exercising it improperly. The defendants, therefore, are entitled to judgment.

Judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Aug. 8.—The same counsel appeared as before.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The only judgment that we need give in this case is to say that we entirely agree with the judgment of Charles, J., and with the reasons given by him.

LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, F. J. Perks.

Solicitor for the defendants, W. W. Young.

From Q. B. Div. June 27; July 13, 1889.

BECK v. PIERCE. (a.)

Husband—Wife—Liability of husband for wife's ante-nuptial debt—Judgment against separate estate of wife—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 13, 14, 15—Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiff having recovered judgment against a married woman for a debt incurred by her before her marriage, and such judgment being unsatisfied because she had no separate estate, sued her husband, who had received property from his wife, for the amount of the debt.

Held, that the action was not barred by the prior judgment against the wife.

A husband who is sued for the ante-nuptial debts of his wife is entitled to the benefit of the Statute of Limitations from the time when such debts first accrued against her.

Appeal from the decision of Grantham, J.

The action was brought by a solicitor for work done for the defendant's wife previous to his marriage with her. The defendant pleaded a prior judgment for the same debt subsequent to the marriage against the separate estate of his wife, and relied, as to part of the debt, on the Statute of Limitations.

It appeared that the whole of the work was done by the plaintiff for the wife within six years before her marriage with the defendant. The judgment against her was wholly unsatisfied, she having no separate estate, but the defendant admitted that he had received from his wife assets more than sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt.

Grantham, J., on the authority of King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Clare, for the appellant.—The Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75) creates two separate liabilities for the ante-nuptial debts of the wife. The wife is liable by section 13 to the extent of her separate property; the husband, by section 14, is liable to the extent of all property which he has acquired through or from his wife. The husband and wife are not, therefore, joint contractors, and judgment against the one cannot be a bar to an action against the other. The judgment against the wife was a judgment against property, and not against the person. [They cited Axford v. Reid, 37 W. R. 291, 22 Q. B. D. 548; Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Draycott v. Harrison, 34 W. R. 546, 17 Q. B. D. 147; King v. Hoare; Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; and Hallett v. Hastings, 35 W. R. 135, 35 Ch. D. 94.] The husband's liability commenced with his marriage, so the Statute of Limitations only begins to run from then. The plaintiff's employment was a continuous employment, and the Statute of Limitations does not apply if any part of their debt accrued within the six years.

Bigham, Q.C., and Carver, for the respondent.—Judgment was recovered against the defendant's wife for the whole amount of the debt. That therefore satisfied the debt, and no further action can be brought for it. The only liability of the husband is a joint liability with his wife: Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 15. There is no power to sue the husband alone, and section 14 only refers to his being sued jointly with his wife. Judgment against one of two persons jointly liable is an answer to any action against the other: King v. Hoare. The husband would be able to have his wife joined as a co-defendant if he was sued alone: Kendall v. Hamilton. As to the Statute of Limitations, the husband may avail himself of any defence open to the wife. The statute began to run in her favour from the moment the debt accrued.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Henn Collins, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13.—The judgment of the court was read by

LINDLEY, L.J.—The plaintiff is a solicitor, and he sues for payment of a bill of costs incurred by the defendant's wife before her marriage. About one-half of the bill is for work done more than six years before the commencement of the action, the other half is for work done since; and all the work was done within six years before the defendant's marriage.

After the marriage the plaintiff sued the wife and obtained judgment against her for the full amount of the bill, but payable out of her separate estate. She has none, and the judgment is wholly unsatisfied. The defendant was not made a party to these proceedings.

Two defences are relied upon—viz., first, the judgment recovered against the wife is said to be a defence to the whole action; second, the Statute of Limitations is pleaded to so much of the plaintiff's claim as became due more than six years before the writ was issued. Both these defences require attention.

The Married Women's Property Act has materially altered the position of husbands and wives towards the creditors of wives. The rights of creditors of women who marry before they have paid their debts are totally different from what they were at common law. At common law a husband was liable for such debts to the whole extent of his property, whether he knew of their existence or not, and whether he obtained any property from his wife or none. But he could not be sued alone for such debts if his wife was alive; and he could not be sued at all for them after his wife's death: Co. Lit. 351b, Com. Dig. Baron & Feme, 1 and 2c. Nor was a promise by him to pay such debts of any avail if the only consideration for the promise was his pre-existing liability to pay them: Mitchinson v. Hewson, 7 T. R. 348, where such a promise was averred. Nor would a court of equity assist his wife's creditors against him even if he had acquired property through her: Heard v. Stanford, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 134, pt. 5. If he and she were both sued, and judgment was recovered against both, such judgment could be enforced against the survivor. If judgment was recovered against her before her marriage, sci. fa. lay against him and her after marriage, and if judgment was obtained against them both on such sci. fa., and then she died, such judgment bound him: Obrian v. Ram, 3 Mod. 186, cited in 1 Salk. 116. But a judgment against her alone did not affect him after her death, except, of course, in his character of administrator.

The Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), has entirely altered the law as regards the liabilities of husbands for their wives' ante-nuptial debts. (1) He can now be sued without her, and whether she be alive or dead (see section 14, and the expression in section 15, "if in any action brought against the husband alone"). (2) He can be sued with her under section 15 if the plaintiff seeks to establish his claim wholly or in part against both husband and wife; but in this case the judgments may be separate, although to the extent to which they are both liable the judgment may be "a joint judgment against the husband personally and against the wife as to her separate property." What the word "joint" means in this sentence is not clear. Having regard to sections 13 and 14, it would be strange if, on the death of husband or wife, the survivor should alone be liable if judgment against them both were obtained under section 15. (3) The husband's liability is no longer unlimited, as at common law; it is limited to the value of his wife's property which he may have acquired (section 14). (4) As between him and her he is entitled to be indemnified out of her separate property (section 13).

The husband's liability since the Married Women's Property Act is, as it was before, a liability in respect of his wife's contracts and torts, and not a liability in respect of his own contracts or torts; and although he is not a surety, any defence open to her appears to be open to him also; for otherwise the creditor, by suing the husband first, would be able to obtain judgment against him, and then he would be able to obtain indemnity against his wife, and in that way she could be made liable indirectly to a greater extent than she could be made liable directly. Such a result does not seem consistent with the Act, nor with ordinary principles of justice.

Such being the husband's liability, it cannot be regarded as a joint liability only; if sued alone he cannot require his wife to be joined; and if she is sued alone in respect of her separate estate, she cannot require her husband to be joined (see section 1, cl. 2, and section 13).

The cases, therefore, of King v. Hoare and Kendall v. Hamilton have no application to actions against husbands for their wives' ante-nuptial debt; and notwithstanding the judgment obtained by the present plaintiff against the defendant's wife, as that judgment is wholly unsatisfied, this action is clearly maintainable, except so far as it may be barred by the Statute of Limitations. The husband's liability for his wife's ante-nuptial contracts first accrues on his marriage, unless he has previously done some act making him responsible for them. This proposition is self-evident, and is equally true whether his liability is imposed by common law or by statute. Perhaps, therefore, it might have been originally held that, as no right of action against him existed until marriage, the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run against him until the happening of the same event. But the cause of action in respect of which he is liable is his wife's contract, not his own; and the Statute of Limitations has always been regarded as beginning to run in his favour, as well as his wife's, from the time when the cause of action accrued against her, and any acknowledgment or part payment by her before marriage kept her debt alive both as against her and her after-taken husband; but similar acts by her after marriage were of no avail either against herself or as against her husband: Pittam v. Foster, 1 B. & C. 248; Neve v. Holland, 18 Q. B. 262.

The Statute of Limitations applies to debts payable by a married woman out of her separate estate (see Hallett v. Hastings); and the Married Women's Property Act apparently enables a wife to keep alive her liabilities in respect of her separate estate by making an acknowledgment or by part payment, or by suffering judgment to be obtained against her, but such acts of hers do not, we apprehend, affect her husband. On the other hand similar acts by him will not affect her direct liability to her creditors. Whether, if he chooses to keep alive his liability, he can still claim the benefit of his right to indemnity under section 13 is a question not necessary now to determine. But we can find nothing in the Married Women's Property Act to alter the cause of action of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's cause of action against the defendant is still founded on his wife's contract; and the plaintiff's cause of action is no more now the defendant's marriage than it was before the passing of the Act. Although the defendant's marriage is what makes him liable, there is no more reason now than there was before, for saying that, with reference to the Statute of Limitations, the cause of action accrues against him on his marriage, as distinguished from the time when it accrued against his wife. The Married Women's Property Act does not purport to amend or alter the law as regards the time within which actions must be commenced. The law in that respect is what it was. It was contended that the plaintiff's cause of action against the wife did not in fact accrue until all the work which the plaintiff did for her was wholly complete, and reliance was placed on Whitehead v. Lord, 7 Ex. 691. This point was disposed of in the course of the argument: we cannot think that the reasoning in that case applies to miscellaneous work done by a solicitor for his client, although it may apply to such continuous work as bringing and prosecuting an action. The defendant in this case can therefore avail himself of the Statute of Limitations as to so much of the plaintiff's demand as accrued to him against the defendant's wife more than six years before the commencement of the present action. But as to the rest, the defendant is liable.

The appeal, therefore, will be allowed, and judgment be entered for the plaintiff for the amount sued, less £33 1s., the amount barred by the statute.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Chester & Co., for Chapman, Roberts, & Beck, Manchester.

Solicitors for the defendant, Hamlin, Grammer, & Hamlin, for Brighouse, Brighouse, & Jones, Southport.

re Tredwell (1891) 2 Ch. 644

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — Aug. 6, 1889.

In re Dear.
Helby v. Dear. (a.)

Will—Gift during widowhood—Gift over on death.

A testator gave all his property to his wife in trust for the benefit of his children so long as she remained unmarried. In the event of her marrying again she was to have a life interest only in a sum of £2,000. He authorized his wife and trustee to advance to either of the children £2,000 from the estate. At his wife's death the estate then remaining was to be divided into four parts, and the proceeds divided equally among the children then surviving. The widow married again before any of the children came of age.

Held, that the residue vested in the children at the marriage of the widow.

Adjourned summons.

Charles Dear, by his will, dated the 16th of November, 1886, gave to his wife all his property, to be held by her "in trust for the benefit of my children so long as she remain unmarried," with the exception of one-fourth, which he directed to be invested and accumulated. . . "In the event of her marrying after my death she is to have a life interest only in the sum of £2,000," to be re-invested as therein mentioned, "and in the event of her death to be divided equally between my children." He authorized his wife and trustee to advance to either of the children "£2,000 from the estate." . . . "At my wife's death the estate then remaining to be divided into four parts, and the proceeds divided equally amongst the children then surviving." The testator died on the 20th of November, 1886, and his will was proved on the 21st of December following. The trustee appointed jointly with the testator's widow renounced the trusts of the will.

The widow married again in 1889, and took out a summons as plaintiff asking for the decision of the court as to who were the persons entitled, during the period between her second marriage and her death, to the income of the testator's estate beyond the income of the £2,000 payable to her during her life; whether, during such or any other period, any part of the income of the said estate ought to be accumulated; and whether, on her second marriage, the interests of the defendants (the testator's children, of whom there were four, all of them infants) in his estate, other than the £2,000, became vested, or whether such interests were contingent on their respectively surviving the plaintiff.

Marten, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the plaintiff.—The income is undisposed of. The trust for accumulation has stopped because it depends upon the widow not marrying again. "Estate" means here "capital," and does not include income. There is no gift of estate to children who do not survive their mother, nor a gift of intermediate income.

Millar, Q.C., and J. W. Williamson, jun., for the defendants.—"At my wife's death" must mean "when the estate comes to an end."

They cited Luxford v. Cheeke, 3 Lev. 125; Bainbridge v. Cream, 16 Beav. 25; Stanford v. Stanford, 35 W. R. 191, 34 Ch. D. 362; and In re Tucker, Bowchier v. Gordon, 35 W. R. 344, W. N., 1887, p. 37.

Marten, Q.C., replied.

Kay, J.—The testator's will clearly shows that the only objects of his bounty were intended to be his widow and children—no intestacy can be implied. It has been held that a gift for the wife during her life or widowhood, and at her death then over, is an imperfect gift intended to take effect on failure of the preceding trusts—i.e., on death or re-marriage. In this case I think the gift is to a contingent class, to be ascertained at the death of the wife, the children then surviving. The death of the wife means the period of distribution, according to the cases that have been cited, which I think apply. Otherwise this result would happen—although this is a residuary gift among children, yet one of these children might attain twenty-one and die in the lifetime of the widow, and between his attainment of twenty-one and the death of the widow there would be no provision for him at all. The only power of maintenance would be under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 43.

I do not dissent from Bainbridge v. Cream and Stanford v. Stanford, which are rather an extension of Luxford v. Cheeke, and I think a reasonable extension. The principle of Luxford v. Cheeke is, that when a testator gives property to his wife for life or until re-marriage, and then, forgetting that that provision is determinable on marriage, gives it over on her death only, that is held to mean death or remarriage. And it is not a very considerable extension of that doctrine, even if the property is given to a class surviving at the widow's death, to refer the words "then surviving" to the marriage as well as death, whichever shall first happen. In the event which has happened, I hold that the residue vested in the children of the testator living at the marriage of his widow.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Allen & Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Lawrence & Son.

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Chrimes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Aug. 5, 1889.

In re STANLEY'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Practice—Settled estate — Married woman — Separate examination—Settled Estates Act, 1877, ss. 24, 26, 50 —Orders of December, 1878, rr. 4, 13.

A married woman interested in a settled estate, who has been served with a notice of a petition for the approval by the court of a lease proposed to be made under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and who, in answer to such notice, states in writing that she submits her rights and interests to be dealt with by the court, need not be separately examined.

Petition.

By virtue of a settlement, dated the 20th of January, 1871, and of a subsequent partition deed, certain real estate was settled upon trust for J. T. Talbot Stanley for life, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainders over. The real estate was also charged with a sum of £10,000 and interest by way of jointure for F. S. C. Stanley, the wife of the said J. T. Talbot Stanley, and portions for their younger children.

This petition was presented by the trustees of the settlement under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, 1877, for the confirmation of a mining lease for ninety-nine years. The petition was not served on anyone, but notices were delivered to all the parties interested, including Mrs. F. S. C. Stanley, under section 26 of the Act, requiring them to state whether they assented or dissented to the application, or submitted their rights and interests, so far as they might be affected by the application, to the court.

Mrs. F. S. C. Stanley answered, in writing, that she submitted her rights and interests to the court. She had not been separately examined.

Cosens-Hardy, Q.C., and John Dixon, for the petition.—When a married woman submits her interests to the court it is not necessary that she should be separately examined: Seton, 4th ed., at p. 1484.

St. John Clerke, for the proposed lessee.

NORTH, J.—I do not think it is necessary that Mrs. Stanley should be examined.

Solicitors, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) July 2.

Ex parte HART.

In re HART. (b.)

Liquidation by arrangement — Discharge—Refusal to register resolution—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 125, sub-section (10)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, r. 303 — Bankruptcy (Discharge and Closure) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 66), s. 2.

In 1882 a debtor presented a petition which resulted in a liquidation by arrangement, and in 1884 resolutions were passed at a meeting of creditors closing the liquidation and refusing the debtor his discharge. In 1889 a further meeting of creditors was held, at which the debtor obtained a resolution granting him his discharge, and he applied to the county court registrar, under section 125, sub-section (10), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, to register such resolution.

Held, that the registrar was right in refusing to register the resolution, and that the proper course was for the debtor to apply for his discharge under section 2 of the Bankruptcy (Discharge and Closure) Act, 1887.

Appeal ex parte by the debtor against the refusal of the judge of the Coventry County Court to direct the registrar of the court to certify the debtor's discharge under section 125, sub-section (10), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

In 1882 a petition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, was presented by the debtor in the county court, which resulted in a liquidation by arrangement. On June 12, 1884, a meeting of the creditors was held, at which resolutions were passed releasing the trustee and closing the liquidation, and it was also resolved that the discharge of the debtor be refused. On the 11th of April, 1889, however, a further meeting was called, at which the debtor obtained a resolution granting him his discharge, and he thereupon applied to the county court registrar, under section 125, sub-section (10), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, for a certificate to that effect. The matter was referred by the registrar to the county court judge, who refused to direct the registrar to register the resolution, on the ground that the creditors had no right to pass it, and that the debtor's proper course was to apply for his discharge under section 2 of the Bankruptcy (Discharge and Closure) Act, 1887.

The debtor now appealed from that decision.

Sidney Woolf, for the debtor.—The real ground of the refusal was that the registrar was of opinion that since the passing of the Bankruptcy (Discharge and Closure) Act, 1887, the undischarged liquidating debtor or bankrupt must apply under that Act, and cannot apply under the procedure provided by the Act of 1869. But it is simply optional with the debtor. The Act of 1887 does not take away the right of the debtor to apply for his discharge under the Act of 1869. Here all the formalities were complied with, and the certificate ought to have been granted.

CAVE, J.—In this case the county court judge has affirmed the refusal of the registrar to register a resolution of the creditors granting the debtor his discharge, and from that decision the debtor has appealed. The bankruptcy was an old bankruptcy under the Act of 1869, which, in fact, resulted in a liquidation by arrangement, and some years ago there was a resolution of the creditors refusing the debtor his discharge and closing the bankruptcy. Quite recently a further meeting was held, at which the creditors have resolved to grant the discharge, and it was that resolution which the registrar refused to register, on the ground that the creditors had no power to pass it.

Now, I have read the judgment of the county court judge, and I must say that I entirely concur with it. It seems clear upon the enactment that the creditors, having closed the liquidation in 1884, had no power now to pass a resolution granting the debtor his discharge. It may be that the creditors had no right to place themselves in the position in which they did, and it was argued in the court below that it was a hardship on a liquidating debtor, who had in such a case no means of obtaining his discharge. But, as was pointed out by the county court judge, there were two answers to that contention; for, in the first place, if the creditors by their resolution put the debtor into such a position that he could not obtain his discharge from them, the court would have granted it of its own authority on being satisfied of the propriety of doing so; and, secondly, section 2 of the Bankruptcy (Discharge and Closure) Act, 1887, now affords a complete remedy, for by it there is express power given to the court to grant a debtor his discharge on his application in such a case as this. That is the course which ought to be adopted, and the debtor ought not, after the liquidation had been closed in 1884, to have summoned such creditors as would attend and get them to pass a resolution which they had no right to do.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
(b.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the debtor, Crowders & Vizard, for Brewetts, Coventry.

CORRECTION.—In re Royle, Royle v. Hayes, ante, p. 18; Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower, agents for W. H. Vaughan, were the solicitors for the appellant, not for the respondent, on this appeal. The respondent's solicitors were Messrs. Yielding, Barlow, & Piper, agents for Cobbett, Wheeler, & Cobbett.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 28, 29; April 5, 9, 11; July 1, 1889.

DERRY v. PEEK. (a.)

Company—Misrepresentation in prospectus—Liability of directors—Action of deceit.

In order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. If fraud be proved the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial.

The directors of a tramway company issued a prospectus containing the statement that the company had the right to use steam or other mechanical power. This was untrue, but, under the circumstances disclosed, the directors were considered to have acted honestly, believing that the fact was as stated by them. In an action by a shareholder against the directors, claiming damages for the fraudulent misrepresentations contained in the prospectus, on the faith of which he had taken shares in the company, Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541), that the action must be dismissed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541) reversing Stirling, J. The facts are given at length in the report below, and are shortly as follows:—The Plymouth, Devonport, and District Tramways Co. was incorporated by special Act of Parliament in 1882, and soon after the directors issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for ordinary share capital. The company was authorized by the special Act to use steam or any other mechanical motive power instead of horse power, but with the consent of the Board of Trade and the corporations. The prospectus contained a statement that the company by its special Act "has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses."

The company had not, at the time this statement was made, in fact obtained, and it subsequently failed to obtain, the consent of the Board of Trade or of the corporations of Plymouth and Devonport, as required by section 35 of their special Act.

A petition for winding up was presented, and a winding-up order made in May, 1885.

The respondent had taken 400 shares in the company, and in February, 1885 (shortly after the petition for winding up was presented), brought this action against the directors for damages for the misrepresentations in the prospectus. Stirling, J., before whom the case was heard, came to the conclusion that the directors believed that they had the right stated in the prospectus, and dismissed the action. The Court of Appeal considered the appellants liable, the court being of opinion that the directors had not reasonable grounds for their belief. Against this the directors appealed.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C. (Muir Mackenzie with them), for the appellants.—This is the first case in which an imperfect statement has been held sufficient to found an action of deceit. At the most the statement is inaccurate in the sense of being imperfect. The real question is, Did they make this statement with a guilty intent to deceive? The common law is laid down clearly in Taylor v. Ashton, 11 M. & W. 401 (the headnote wrong) and Joliffe v. Baker, 32 W. R. 59, 11 Q. B. D. 255. Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad. 114, is relied on contrâ. There, defendant represented he had authority. The idea that something less than fraud was enough, crept in in Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 145, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 14. Smith v. Chadwick, 30 W. R. 661, 32 Ibid. 687, 20 Ch. D. 27, 9 App. Cas. 187; and Weir v. Bell, 26 W. R. 147, 3 Ex. D. 238, were also referred to.

Bompas, Q.C., Widdrington Byrne, Q.C. (Pattullo with them), for the respondent.—The inference of fact when a man does not take proper care is recklessness, and it is not for the defendants to judge whether the inaccuracy is material or not: Peek v. Gurney, 22 W. R. 29, L. R. 6, H. L. 377; Lord Westbury in New Brunswick Railway and Land Co. v. Conybeare, 10 W. R. 305, 9 H. L. Cas. 711; Slim v. Croucher, 8 W. R. 347, 1 De G. F. & J. 518, 523; Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174; Smith v. Chadwick; Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 925, 29 W. R. Dig. 232; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51; Haycraft v. Creasy, 2 East, 92; Chandelor v Lopus, Croke Jac. 4; Polhill v. Walter; Milne v. Marwood, 15 C. B. 778, 3 W. R. C. L. Dig. 173; Denton v. Great Northern Railway, 4 W. R. 240, 5 El. & Bl. 860; Thom v. Bigland, 1 W. R. 290, 8 Ex. 725; Rawlins v. Wickham, 7 W. R. 145, 3 De G. & J. 304; Mathias v. Yetts, 30 W. R. 215, were referred to.

The House took time for consideration.

July 1.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—I have so recently expressed an opinion in the Court of Appeal on the subject of actions of this character, that I do not think it necessary to do more than say that I adhere to what I there said.* To quote language, now some centuries old, in dealing with actions of this character, "Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud," does not give rise to such actions (per Croke, J., in Baily v. Merrell, 3 Bulstrode, 95). I have had also the opportunity of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend, Lord Herschell, and I could desire to add nothing to his exhaustive and lucid treatment of the authorities.

When I turn to the question of fact, I confess I am not altogether satisfied. In the first place, I think the statement in the prospectus was untrue, untrue in fact, and, to the minds of such persons as were likely to take shares, I think well calculated to mislead. I think such persons would have no idea of the technical division between tramways that had rights to use mechanical means, and tramways that had not. What I think they would understand would be that this particular tramway was in an exceptionally advantageous position—that the statement was of a present existing fact—that it had, at the time of the invited subscription for shares, the right to use steam. And I think such a statement, if wilfully made with the consciousness of its inaccuracy, would give rise to an action for deceit provided that damage had been sustained, if a person had acted upon a belief induced by such a prospectus. But upon the question that these statements were made with a consciousness of their misleading character, I cannot but be influenced by the opinions entertained by so many of your lordships, that they are consistent with the directors' innocence of any intention to deceive. The learned judge who saw and heard the witnesses acquitted the defendants of intentional deceit, and although the Court of Appeal held them liable, overruling the decision of the learned judge below, they appear to me to have justified their decision upon grounds which, as I have already said, I do not think tenable—namely, that they, the directors, were liable because they had no reasonable ground for the belief, which nevertheless it is assumed, they sincerely entertained. I think it would have been satisfactory to have had a more minute and exact account of how this prospectus was framed, the actual evidence of the draftsman of it, and the discussions which took place upon the alteration in form; which alteration gave such marked and peculiar prominence to the special feature of this particular tramway in respect of the possession of power to use steam. Nevertheless, if, as I have said, the facts are reconcilable with the innocence of the directors, and with the absence of the mens rea which I consider an essential condition of an action for deceit, the mere fact of the inaccuracy of the statement ought not to be pressed into constituting a liability, which appears to me not to exist according to the law of England. As to the question whether Sir Henry Peek was induced to take his shares by reliance on the misleading statement, I admit that I have very considerable doubt. On the one hand, I do not believe that anyone can so far analyze his mental impressions as to be able to say what particular fact in a prospectus induced him to subscribe. On the other hand, the description of Sir Henry Peek, even now that the question has been pointedly raised and brought to his mind, of what did or did not induce him to take his shares, is hardly reconcilable with his having been substantially induced by the statement in question to take them. On the whole, I acquiesce in the judgment which one of your lordships is about to move—namely, that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAYTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* See Arnison v. Smith (No. 2), 37 W. R., at p. 741, 41 Ch. D., at p. 367.

Lord Watson.—I agree with Stirling, J., that, as a matter of fact, the appellants did honestly believe in the truth of the representation upon which this action of deceit is based. It is by no means clear that the learned judges of the Court of Appeal meant to differ from that conclusion, but they have held that a man who makes a representation with the view of its being acted upon, in the honest belief that it is true, commits a fraud in the eye of the law, if the court or a jury shall be of opinion that he had not reasonable grounds for his belief. I have no hesitation in rejecting that doctrine, for which I can find no warrant in the law of England. But I shall not trouble your lordships with any observations of mine, because I accept without reserve the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Herschell.

Lord Bramwell.—I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. I am glad to come to this conclusion, for, as far as my judgment goes, it exonerates five men of good character and conduct from a charge of fraud which, with all submission, I think wholly unfounded—a charge supported on such materials as to make all character precarious. I hope this will not be misunderstood; that promoters of companies will not suppose that they can safely make inaccurate statements with no responsibility. I should much regret any such notion, for the general public is so at the mercy of company promoters, sometimes dishonest, sometimes over-sanguine, that it requires al the protection that the law can give it. Particularly should I regret if it was supposed that I did not entirely disapprove of the conduct of those directors who accepted their qualification from the contractor or intended contractor. It is wonderful to me that honest men of ordinary intelligence cannot see the impropriety of this. It is obvious that the contractor can only give this qualification because he means to get it back in the price given for the work he is to do. That price is to be fixed by the directors who have taken his money. They are paid by him to give him a good price, as high a price as they can, while their duty to their shareholders is to give him one as low as they can. But there is another thing. The public, seeing these names, may well say, "These are respectable and intelligent men who think well enough of this scheme to adventure their money in it; we will do the same," little knowing that those thus trusted had made themselves safe against loss if the thing turned out ill, while they might gain if it was successful. I am glad to think that Mr. Wilde, a member of my old profession, was not one of those so bribed. The only shade of doubt I have in the case is that this safety from loss in the directors may have made them less careful in judging of the truth of any statements they have made. There is another matter I wish to dispose of before going into the particular facts of the case. I think we need not trouble ourselves about "legal fraud," nor whether it is a good or bad expression; because I hold that actual fraud must be proved in this case to make the defendants liable, and, as I understand, there is never any occasion to use the phrase, "legal fraud," except when actual fraud cannot be established. "Legal fraud" is only used when some vague ground of action is to be resorted to, or, generally speaking, when the person using it will not take the trouble to find, or cannot find, what duty has been violated or right infringed, but thinks a claim is somehow made out. With the most sincere respect for Sir J. Hannen, I cannot think the expression "convenient." I do not think it is "an expression which very clearly conveys an idea"; at least, I am certain it does not to my mind. I think it a mischievous phrase, and one which has contributed to what I must consider the erroneous decision in this case. But with these remarks I have done with it, and will proceed to consider whether the law is not that actual fraud must be proved, and whether that has been done. Now I really am reluctant to cite authorities to show that actual fraud must be established in such a case as this. It is one of the first things one learnt, and one has never heard it doubted until recently. I am very glad to think that my noble and learned friend now sitting opposite to me (Lord Herschell), who has been referred to by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, has taken the trouble to go into the authorities fully; but to some extent I deprecate it, because it seems to me somewhat within the principle "Qui s'excuse s'accuse." As I have said, I never heard a doubt on this subject till very recently. When a man makes a contract with another he is bound by it; and, in making it, he is bound not to bring it about by fraud. Warrantizando vendidit gives a cause of action if the warranty is broken; knowingly and fraudulently stating a material untruth which brings about wholly or partly the contract also gives a cause of action. To this may now be added the equitable rule (which is not in question here) that a material misrepresentation, though not fraudulent, may give a right to avoid or rescind a contract where capable of such rescission. To found an action for damages there must be a contract and breach, or fraud. The statement of claim in this case states fraud. Of course that need not be proved, merely because it is stated. But no one ever heard of or saw a statement of claim or declaration for deceit without it. There is not an authority at common law, or by a common-law lawyer, to the contrary; none has been cited, though there may be some incautious, hesitating expressions, which point that way. Every case, from the earliest in Comyn's Digest to the present day, alleges it. Further, the learned judges of the Court of Appeal hardly deny it. There is, indeed, an opinion to the contrary of the late Master of the Rolls, but it must be remembered that his knowledge of actions of deceit was small. I cannot think, then, that it is necessary to cite cases to show that to maintain this action fraud in the defendants must be shown. Now as to the evidence. The plaintiff's case is that the defendants made an untrue statement, which they knew to be untrue, and likely to influence persons reading it; therefore they were fraudulent. It is not necessary to consider whether a primâ facie case was made out by the plaintiff. We have all the evidence before us, and must judge on the whole. The alleged untrue statement is that "the company has the right to use steam or mechanical power instead of horses," and that a saving would be thereby effected. Now, this is certainly untrue; because it is stated as an absolute right, when in truth it was conditional on the approval of the Board of Trade, and the sanction or consent of two local boards; and a conditional right is not the same as an absolute right. It is also certain that the defendants knew what the truth was, and therefore knew that what they said was untrue. But it does not follow that the statement was fraudulently made. There are various kinds of untruth. There is an absolute untruth, an untruth in itself, that no addition or qualification can make true; as, if a man says a thing he saw was black, when it was white, as he remembers and knows. So, as to knowing the truth. A man may know it, and yet it may not be present to his mind at the moment of speaking; or, if the fact is present to his mind, it may not occur to him to be of any use to mention it. For example, suppose a man was asked whether a writing was necessary in a contract for the making and purchase of goods, he might well say yes, without adding that payment on receipt of the goods, or part, would suffice. He might well think that the question he was asked was whether a contract for goods, to be made, required a writing like a contract for goods in existence. If he was writing on the subject he would, of course, state the exception or qualification. Now, consider the case here. These directors naturally trust to their solicitors to prepare their prospectus. It is prepared and laid before them. They find the statement of their power to use steam, without qualification. It does not occur to them to alter it. They swear they had no fraudulent intention. At the very last they cannot see the fraud. There is their oath, their previous character unimpeached, and there is to my mind this further consideration, the truth would have served their purpose as well. "We have power to use steam, &c., of course with the usual conditions of the approval of the Board of Trade, and the consent of the local authorities, but we may make sure of these being granted, as the Board of Trade has already allowed the power to be inserted in the Act, and the local authorities have expressed their approbation of the scheme." During the argument I said I am not sure that I should not have passed the prospectus. I will not say so now, because certainly I would not pass it now after knowing the unfortunate use made of the statement, and no one can tell what would have been the state of his mind if one of the factors influencing it was wanting. But I firmly believe it might have been, and was, honestly done by these defendants. Stirling, J. saw and heard them, and was of that opinion. It is difficult to say that the plaintiff was not. The report of the 6th of November, 1884, showed that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, showed also that the Corporation of Devonport would not consent, showed therefore the "untruth," and yet the plaintiff "had every confidence in the directors." And see his answer to questions 53 and 365. I now proceed to consider the judgments that have been delivered. It is not necessary to declare my great respect for those who have delivered them. Stirling, J., refuses to say whether actual fraud must be shown, and deals with the case on the footing that the question is whether the defendants had reasonable grounds for making the statement they did. He holds, as I do, that they thought the company had the right, as put in the prospectus, to use steam. Then he says he must "come to the conclusion that they had reasonable grounds for their belief; at all events their grounds were not so unreasonable as to justify me in charging them with having been guilty of fraud." It is singular that the learned judge seems to consider that unreasonableness must be proved to such an extent as to show fraud. He then proceeds, for what seems to me unanswerable reasons, to show that they did every one believe that they had the right stated in the prospectus. He refers to what he saw of them in the box. He says he cannot come to the conclusion that their belief was so unreasonable and so unfounded, and their proceedings so reckless or careless that they ought to be fixed with the consequences of deceit. He makes an excellent remark that "mercantile men dealing with matters of business would be the first to cry out if I extended the notion of deceit into what is honestly done in the belief that those things would come about, and when they did not come about, make them liable in an action of fraud." My only variation of this would be that it may be that the objection did not, and naturally did not, occur to them. It has not been argued, and I will say no more on the question whether had the plaintiff known the contents of the Act he would or would not have applied for the shares, than that I agree with Stirling, J. Cotton, L.J., says the law is "that where a man makes a statement to be acted on by others which is false, and which is known by him to be false, or is made by him recklessly, or without a care whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true," he is liable to an action for deceit. Well, I agree to all before the "that is," and I agree to what comes after if it is taken as equivalent to what goes before—viz., "recklessly or without care whether it is true or false," understanding "recklessly" as explained by "without care whether it is true or false." For a man who makes a statement without care and regard for its truth or falsity commits a fraud. He is a rogue. For every man who makes a statement says, "The truth is so-and-so, and I know it or believe it." I say I agree to this as I understand it. It seems to me, with great respect, that the learned Lord Justice lost sight of his own definition, and glided into a different opinion. He says, "There is a duty cast upon a director who makes that statement to take care that there are no statements in it which in fact are false; to take care that he has reasonable grounds for the material statements which are contained in that document (prospectus), which he intends should be acted on by others. And although, in my opinion, it is not necessary there should be what I should call fraud, there must be a departure from duty, and he has violated the right which those who receive the statements have, to have true statements only made to them." This seems to be a most formidable matter. I agree there is some such duty. I agree that not only directors in prospectuses, but all persons in all dealings, should tell the truth. If they do not they furnish evidence of fraud; they subject themselves to have the contract rescinded. But to say that there is "a right to have true statements only made," I cannot agree, and I think it would be much to be regretted if there was any such right. Mercantile men, as Stirling, J., says, would indeed cry out. No qualification is stated. If this is law, the statement may be reasonably believed to be true by him who makes it, but if untrue there is to be a cause of action, and that although he may have refused a warranty. I hope not. There is a duty to tell the truth. But it is a duty of imperfect obligation. It is a duty for the non-observance of which the law gives no remedy if there is no fraud. His lordship says:—"Where a man makes a false statement without reasonable ground to suppose it to be true, and without taking care to ascertain if it is true, he is liable civilly as much as a person who commits what is usually called fraud." I say I agree, if that means making a statement of which he knows or believes not the truth. His lordship proceeds to examine whether the defendants had reasonable ground for believing what they said, and comes to the conclusion that they had not, and so holds them liable, not because they were dishonest, but because they were unreasonable. I say they never undertook to be otherwise. He says:—"It is not that I attribute to them any intention to commit fraud, but they have made a statement without any sufficient reason for believing it to be true." Sir James Hannen says that he agrees with Cotton, L.J.'s, statement of the law, and adds: "If a man takes upon himself to assert a thing to be true which he does not know to be true, and has no reasonable ground to believe to be true," it is sufficient in an action of deceit. I agree, if he knows he has no such reasonable ground; otherwise, with great respect, I differ. He cites Lord Cairns (Reese River Silver Mining Co. v. Smith, 17 W. R. 1046, L. R. 4 H. L. 79), that "if persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant, whether they are true or not, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that alone." So say I; but this does not support Sir James's proposition. Nor does he deal with what he quotes from Lord Cranworth. But, further, he speaks of legal fraud as meaning "that degree of moral culpability in the statement of an untruth to induce another to alter his position to which the law attaches responsibility." But if there is moral culpability, I agree there is responsibility. But to believe without reasonable grounds is not moral culpability, but (if there is such a thing) mental culpability. He says: "The word fraud is, in common parlance, reserved for actions of great turpitude, but the law applies it to lesser breaches of moral duty." I agree the law applies it to all breaches of the moral duty to tell the truth in dealing with others; but that duty cannot be honestly broken. To be actionable a breach of that duty must be dishonest. Nay, it is a man's duty sometimes to tell an untruth. For instance, when asked as to a servant's character, he must say what he believes is the truth, however he may have formed his opinion, and however it wrong it may be. His lordship says he cannot think the directors had any reasonable ground for believing the prospectus to be true. But had they the question present to their minds? Even if this were the question, I should decide in their favour. As to the judgment of Lopes, L.J., I quite agree with what he says:—"I know of no fraud which will support an action of deceit to which some moral delinquency does not belong." I think that shows the meaning of what he says, "fourthly," though that is made doubtful by what he says elsewhere. I think, with all respect, that in all the judgments there is, I must say it, a confusion of unreasonableness of belief as evidence of dishonesty, and unreasonableness of belief as of itself a ground of action. I have examined these judgments at this length owing to my sense of their importance, and the importance of the question they deal with. I think it most undesirable that actions should be maintainable in respect of statements made unreasonably perhaps, but honestly. I think it would be disastrous if there was "a right to have true statements only made." This case is an example. I think that in this, as in some other cases, courts of equity have made the mistake of disregarding a valuable general principle in the desire to effect what is, or is thought to be, justice in a particular instance. It might, perhaps, be desirable to enact that in prospectuses of public companies there should be a warranty of the truth of all statements, except where it was expressly said there was no warranty. The objection is to exceptional legislation, and to the danger of driving respectable and responsible men from being promoters, and of substituting for them those who are neither. In this particular case I hold that, unless fraud in the defendants could be shown, the action is not maintainable. I am satisfied there was no fraud. Further, if an unreasonable misstatement were enough, I hold there was none. Still further, I do not believe that the plaintiff was influenced by the misstatement, though I am entirely satisfied that he was an honest witness.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The pleadings and the facts have already been referred to by the noble lords who have addressed the House. The action is for deceit. The writ was sued out in February, 1885, and originally claimed rescission of the contract with the company. It was subsequently amended by striking out the company as defendants, and also the prayer for rescission, and it assumed the character of an action for deceit against the present appellants (five of the directors), and claimed "Damages for the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendants."

The statement of claim, which is sufficient in form to raise the real question, alleged the misrepresentation to exist in the prospectus issued in January, 1883, and to consist of the paragraph so often read, that the company had a right to use steam or other mechanical motive power; and it was further alleged "that the defendants intended thereby to represent that the company had an absolute right to use steam and other mechanical power," and that such representation was made fraudulently, and with the view to induce the plaintiff to take shares in the company.

So far the real issue seems to have been raised fairly and clearly, and to depend on matter of fact. There were circumstances connected with the promotion of the company, and the procuring of four of the defendants to act as directors which tended to create suspicion as to these statements and their bona fides, and attracted the attention directly of the learned judge before whom the cause was tried. The defendants, who were severally produced as witnesses at the trial, were exposed to a very lengthened and searching cross-examination by counsel for the plaintiff, and were also carefully examined by the judge, as to these transactions, with the result apparently of freeing them from any imputation therein of moral misconduct.

The question which I am about to examine in the first instance, and excluding for the present the element of fraud, is whether the unsigned statement in the prospectus was a false statement in the sense of being untrue. That it was inaccurate so far as it purported to give the legal effect of the special Act I do not doubt, but was it untrue as representing the position of the company in a popular and business sense? The General Tramway Act, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 78, which regulates tramways generally, but subject to the provisions of the special Act, if any, of each company, places them under the supervision of the Board of Trade with a view to public safety, and for public protection generally, and by its 34th section it provides "that carriages used on tramways shall be moved by the powers prescribed by the special Act."

The special Act of this company became law on the 24th of July, 1882, and by section 4 the company incorporated by the Act is empowered to make the seven tramways in question in all respects in accordance with the plans and sections. Section 15 provides minutely for their formation, subject to the orders of the Board of Trade, and by section 16 the tramway is not to be opened for public traffic until it shall have been inspected and certified by the Board of Trade to be fit for such traffic.

Before referring to the 35th section of the special Act, we may glance at section 37 of that Act which empowers the Board of Trade to make bye-laws as to any of the tramways on which steam may be used under the authority of the Act, and section 44, which provides that where the company intend to use steam they shall give two months' notice. There are several other sections providing for the use of steam power if the company should elect to use it as a motor. In the light of those sections of the special Act and of section 34 of the general Act, let us now look at the particular paragraph of the prospectus, and section 35 of the special Act. By that section Parliament has done that which Parliament could do, and which the Board of Trade could not do. It has conferred on the company authority to use steam as its motive power. It has not imposed on the company the use of steam-power, but it says they may use it if they elect to do so. Before dealing with the consent of the Board of Trade, I desire to call attention to the provision in the 35th section, "that the exercise of the powers hereby conferred with respect to the use of steam shall be subject to the regulations in schedule A., and to any regulations which may be added thereto, or substituted therefor, by the Board of Trade for securing to the public all reasonable protection against danger, in the exercise of the powers by this Act conferred, with respect to the use of steam." Schedule A., referred to in section 35, contains no less than ten regulations for the direction of the company in the exercise of the right so conferred to use steam-power. Now, turning back to the words "with the consent of the Board of Trade," in section 35 of the special Act, that consent could not confer, nor would its absence take away, the right conferred by the Legislature to use steam as a motor. Its true character is that of a precaution imposed by the Legislature to defer the actual exercise of the right conferred until the supervision of the Board of Trade secures to the public all reasonable protections against danger. To attain these objects, the Legislature provides that the powers it has conferred should not be actually exercised without the consent of the Board of Trade.

I have, though with difficulty, arrived at the conclusion that the statement in the prospectus, that by the special Act the company had the right to use steam-power, was untrue in a popular or business sense.

Let us see for a moment in what way and with what meaning General Hutchinson used similar expressions. In his report of the 12th of July, 1884, he says: "The Act of 1882 gives, however, power to the company to use mechanical power over all their system; and I think it would be most objectionable that this power should be exercised on parts of Tramway No. 1 on account of the narrowness of three of the roads."

The remainder of the incriminated paragraph of the prospectus is "and it is fully expected that by means of this (i.e., the use of steam) a considerable saving will result in the working expenses of the line, as compared with other tramways worked by horses." This was not untrue; there had been a division of opinion in the directory on the subject, which was finally, and before the issue of the prospectus, resolved in favour of steam, as appears from Mr. Petheck's letter of the 7th of January, 1883. The conclusion I have arrived at is that this paragraph of the prospectus, though inaccurate in point of law in one particular, seems on the whole to have been morally true. If this view is correct, it is an answer to the action; but, assuming that it is not correct, or that your lordships are not prepared to adopt it, I proceed to express my opinion on the remaining substance of the action. Cotton, L.J., describes the action as "an action of deceit, a mere common law action." The description is accurate, and I proceed to deal with it as a mere common law action. It has not been in the least altered in the characteristics by having been instituted in the Chancery Division, or tried by a judge, without the aid of a jury, nor are your lordships necessarily driven to consider on the present appeal some of the subtle and refined distinctions, which have been engrafted on the clear and simple principles of the common law. The action for deceit at common law is founded on fraud. It is essential to the action that moral fraud should be established, and since the case of Evans v. Collins, 5 Q. B. 820, in the Exchequer Chamber, it has never been doubted that fraud must concur with the false statement to maintain the action. It would not be sufficient to show that a false representation had been made. It must further be established that the defendant knew at the time of making it that the representation was untrue, or, to adopt the language of the learned editors of "The Leading Cases," that "the defendant must be shown to have been actually and fraudulently cognisant of the falsehood of his representation or to have made it fraudulently without belief that it was true." The leading counsel for the respondent met the argument fairly on the allegations of facts. He alleged "that the defendants were not honest; that they stated in the prospectus a definite lie, and knew that it was a lie." That is the very issue, in fact, in the case.

The whole law and all the cases on the subject will be found in the notes of Chandelor v. Lopus and Pasley v. Freeman. There is also a clear and able summary of the decisions both in law and in equity, brought down to the present time in the recent edition of "Benjamin on Sales," by Pearson, Gee, and Boyd.

I desire to make an observation on Chandelor v. Lopus. The report in Cro. Jac. 4 would seem to have but little direct bearing on the present case were it not for the opinion attributed to Anderson, J.; but there is a valuable note in 2 Dyer by Vaillant (75 a), which is as follows:—Lopus brought an action upon the case against Chandelor, and showed that, whereas the defendant was a goldsmith, and skilled in the nature of precious stones, and being possessed of a stone which the defendant asserted and assured the said plaintiff to be a true and perfect stone, &c., called the bezoir stone, &c., upon which the defendant bought it, &c.; there the opinion of Popham, C.J., was, "that if I have any commodities which are damaged (whether victuals or otherwise), and I, knowing them to be so, sell them for good, and affirm them to be so, an action upon the case lies for the deceit; but, although they may be damaged, if I, knowing not that, affirm them to be good, still no action lies, without I warrant them to be good." The action seems originally to have been on a warranty which failed in fact, as there has been no warranty, and it was then sought to support it as an action for deceit; but it was not alleged in the court that the defendant knew the representation to be untrue. It was in reference to that that the observation of Popham, C.J., was made. He had the reputation of being a consummate lawyer.

The note in 2 Dyer (75 a) was probably by Mr. Treby, afterwards Chief Justice Treby. He edited an edition of "Dyer," published in 1688. I have not had an opportunity of referring to it, but it is said that he gave the public some highly authoritative notes in that edition. I have quoted from Mr. Vaillant's edition, published in 1793.

The whole evidence given on this appeal has been laid before your lordships, and we have to deal with it as a whole. That evidence has been already so fully stated and criticized that it is not necessary for me to do more than to state the conclusions of fact which, in my opinion, are reasonably to be deduced from it—viz., that the several defendants did not know that the incriminated statement in the prospectus was untrue; and that, on the contrary, they severally, and in good faith, believed it to be true. The conclusions, in fact, at which I have arrived render it unnecessary for me to consider the long and rather blundering list of authorities to which your lordships were referred, or to criticize the reasons given in the Court of Appeal for their decision in the present case. I desire, however, to make a single observation.

There is one characteristic which, as it seems to me, pervades each of the several judgments of the Court of Appeal—viz., that the bonâ fide belief of the defendants in the truth of the representation was unavailing, unless it was a reasonable belief resting on reasonable grounds. If this is correct, it seems to me that in an action for "deceit" it would be necessary to submit to the jury (if tried before that tribunal), not only the existence of that belief bonâ fide, but also the grounds on which it was arrived at, and their reasonableness.

I am by no means satisfied that such is the law, and, if now driven to express an opinion on it, I would prefer following the opinion of Lord Cranworth in Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, in which he said, "I confess that my opinion was that in what his lordship (Lord Chelmsford) thus stated he went beyond what principle warrants. If persons in the situations of directors of a bank make statements as to the conditions of its affairs which they bonâ fide believe to be true, I cannot think they can be guilty of fraud, because other persons think, or the court thinks, or your lordships think, that there was no sufficient ground to warrant the opinion which they had formed. If a little more care or caution must have led the directors to a conclusion different from that which they put forth, this may afford strong evidence to show that they did not really believe in the truth of what they stated, and so that they were guilty of fraud. But this would be the consequence, not of their having stated as true what they had not reasonable ground to believe to be true, but of their having stated as true what they did not believe to be true." A director is bound in all particulars to be careful and circumspect, and not, either in his statements to the public or in the performance of the duties he has undertaken, to be careless or negligent or rash. Want of care or circumspection, as well as recklessness, may in such a case as the present be taken into consideration in determining at every stage the question of bona fides.

I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In the statement of claim in this action, the respondent, who is the plaintiff, alleges that the appellants made, in a prospectus issued by them, certain statements which were untrue, that they well knew the facts were not as stated in the prospectus, and made the representations fraudulently and with a view to induce the plaintiff to take shares in the company. "The action is one which is commonly called an action of deceit, a mere common law action." This is the description of it given by Cotton, L.J., in delivering judgment. I think it is important that it should be borne in mind that such an action differs essentially from one brought to obtain rescission of a contract on the ground of misrepresentation of a material fact. The principles which govern the two actions differ widely—where rescission is claimed, it is only necessary to prove that there was misrepresentation; then, however honestly it may have been made, however free from blame the person who made it, the contract, having been obtained by misrepresentation, cannot stand. In an action of deceit, on the contrary, it is not enough to establish misrepresentation alone; it is conceded on all hands that something more must be proved to cast liability upon the defendant, though it has been a matter of controversy what additional elements are requisite. I lay stress upon this, because observations made by learned judges in actions for rescission have been cited and much relied upon at the bar by counsel for the respondent. Care must obviously be observed in applying the language used in relation to such actions to an action of deceit. Even if the scope of the language used extend beyond the particular action which was being dealt with, it must be remembered that the learned judges were not engaged in determining what is necessary to support an action of deceit, or in discriminating with nicety the elements which enter into it.

There is another class of actions which I must refer to also for the purpose of putting it aside. I mean those cases where a person within whose special province it lay to know a particular fact, has given an erroneous answer to an inquiry made with regard to it by a person desirous of ascertaining the fact for the purpose of determining his course accordingly, and has been held bound to make good the assurance he has given. Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470, may be cited as an example, where a trustee had been asked by an intending lender upon the security of a trust fund, whether notice of any prior incumbrance upon the fund had been given to him. In cases like this, it has been said that the circumstance that the answer was honestly made in the belief that it was true affords no defence to the action. Lord Selborne pointed out in Brownlie v. Campbell that these cases were in an altogether different category from actions to recover damages for false representation, such as we are now dealing with.

One other observation I have to make before proceeding to consider the law which has been laid down by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal in the case before your lordships. "An action of deceit is a common law action, and must be decided on the same principles, whether it be brought in the Chancery Division or in any of the Common Law Divisions, there being in my opinion no such thing as an equitable action for deceit." This was the language of Cotton, L.J., in Arkwright v. Newbold, 29 W. R. 455, 17 Ch. D. 301. It was adopted by Lord Blackburn in Smith v. Chadwick, and is not, I think, open to dispute.

In the court below, Cotton, L.J., said, "What, in my opinion, is a correct statement of the law is this: that where a man makes a statement, to be acted upon by others, which is false, and which is known by him to be false, or is made by him recklessly, or without care whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, he is liable in an action of deceit at the suit of anyone to whom it was addressed, and who was materially induced by the misstatement to do an act to his prejudice." About much that is here stated there cannot, I think, be two opinions. But when the learned Lord Justice speaks of a statement made recklessly or without care, "whether it is true or false, that is, without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true," I find myself, with all respect, unable to agree that these are convertible expressions. To make a statement, careless whether it be true or false, and therefore without any real belief in its truth, appears to me to be an essentially different thing from making, through want of care, a false statement which is nevertheless honestly believed to be true. And it is surely conceivable that a man may believe that what he states is the fact, though he has been so wanting in care that the court may think that there were no sufficient grounds to warrant his belief. I shall have to consider hereafter whether the want of reasonable ground for believing the statement made is sufficient to support an action of deceit. I am only concerned for the moment to point out that it does not follow that it is so because there is authority for saying that a statement made recklessly, without caring whether it be true or false, affords sufficient foundation for such an action. That the learned Lord Justice thought that if a false statement were made without reasonable ground for believing it to be true, an action of deceit would lie, is clear from a subsequent passage in his judgment. He says that when statements are made in a prospectus like the present, to be circulated amongst persons in order to induce them to take shares, "there is a duty cast upon the director or other person who makes those statements to take care that there are no expressions in them which in fact are false; to take care that he has reasonable ground for the material statements which are contained in that document which he prepares and circulates for the very purpose of its being acted upon by others." The learned judge proceeds to say, "Although in my opinion it is not necessary that there should be what I should call fraud, yet, in these actions, according to my view of the law, there must be a departure from duty, that is to say, an untrue statement made without any reasonable ground for believing that statement to be true; and, in my opinion, when a man makes an untrue statement, with an intention that it shall be acted upon, without any reasonable ground for believing that statement to be true, he makes a default in a duty which was thrown upon him from the position he has taken upon himself, and he violates the right, which those to whom he makes the statement have, to have true statements only made to them." Now, I have first to remark on these observations that the alleged "right" must surely be here stated too widely if it is intended to refer to a legal right, the violation of which may give rise to an action for damges. For, if there be a right to have true statements only made, this will render liable to an action those who make untrue statements, however innocently. This cannot have been meant. I think it must have been intended to make the statement of the right correspond with that of the alleged duty, the departure from which is said to be making an untrue statement without any reasonable ground for believing it to true. I have further to observe that the Lord Justice distinctly says that if there be such a departure from duty, an action of deceit can be maintained, though there be not what he should call fraud. I shall have by-and-bye to consider the discussions which have arisen as to the difference between the popular understanding of the word "fraud," and the interpretation given to it by lawyers, which have led to the use of such expressions as "legal fraud" or "fraud in law," but I may state at once that, in my opinion, without proof of fraud, no action of deceit is maintainable. When I examine the cases which have been decided upon this branch of the law, I shall endeavour to show that there is abundant authority to warrant this proposition.

I return now to the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. Sir James Hannen says, "I take the law to be that if a man takes upon himself to assert a thing to be true, which he does not know to be true and has no reasonable ground to believe to be true, in order to induce another to act upon the assertion, who does so act, and is thereby damnified, the person so damnified is entitled to maintain an action for deceit." Again, Lopes, L.J., states what in his opinion is the result of the cases. I will not trouble your lordships with quoting the first three propositions which he lays down, although I do not feel sure that the third is distinct from, and not rather an instance of, the case dealt with by the second proposition. But he says that a person making a false statement intended to be, and in fact relied on by the person to whom it is made, may be sued by the person damaged thereby. "Fourthly, if it is untrue in fact, but believed to be true without any reasonable grounds for such belief."

It will thus be seen that all the learned judges concurred in thinking that it was sufficient to prove that the representations made were not in accordance with fact, and that the person making them had no reasonable ground for believing them. They did not treat the absence of such reasonable grounds as evidence merely that the statements were made recklessly, careless whether they were true or false, and without belief that they were true, but they adopted as the test of liability, not the existence of belief in the truth of the assertions made, but whether the belief in them was founded upon any reasonable grounds. It will be seen further, that the court did not purport to be establishing any new doctrine. They deemed that they were only following the cases already decided, and that the proposition which they concurred in laying down was established by prior authorities. Indeed, Lopes, L.J., expressly states the law in this respect to be well settled. This renders a close and critical examination of the earlier authorities necessary.

I need not go further back than the leading case of Pasley v. Freeman. If it was not there for the first time held that an action of deceit would lie in respect of fraudulent representations against a person not a party to a contract induced by them, the law was at all events not so well settled but that a distinguished judge, Grose, J., differing from his brethren on the bench, held that such an action was not maintainable. Buller, J., who held that the action lay, adopted in relation to it the language of Croke, J., in 3 Bulstrode, who said, "Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but where these two concur an action lies": Baily v. Merrell, 3 Bulstrode, 95. In reviewing the case of Crosse v. Gardner, Carth, 90, Buller, J., in Pasley v. Freeman, says, "Knowledge of the falsehood of the thing asserted is fraud and deceit," and further, after pointing out that in Risney v. Selby, Salk. 211, the judgment proceeded wholly on the ground that the defendant knew what he asserted to be false, he adds (3 T. R., at p. 60), "The assertion alone will not maintain the action, but the plaintiff must go on to prove that it was false, and that the defendant knew it to be so," the latter words being specially emphasized. Kenyon, C.J., said, "The plaintiff applied to the defendant, telling him that they were going to deal with Falck, and desired to be informed of his credit, when the defendant, fraudulently, and knowing it to be otherwise, and with the design to deceive the plaintiff, made the false affirmation stated on the record, by which he sustained damage. Can a doubt be entertained for a moment that this is injurious to the plaintiff?" In this case it was evidently considered that fraud was the basis of the action, and that such fraud might consist in making a statement known to be false.

Haycraft v. Creasey was, again, an action in respect of a false affirmation made by the defendant to the plaintiff about the credit of a third party whom the plaintiff was about to trust. The words complained of were, "I can assure you of my own knowledge that you may credit Miss R. to any amount with perfect safety." All the judges were agreed that fraud was of the essence of the action, but they differed in their view of the conclusion to be drawn from the facts. Lord Kenyon thought that fraud had been proved because the defendant stated that to be true within his own knowledge which he did not know to be true. The other judges, thinking that the defendant's words touching his own knowledge were no more than a strong expression of opinion, inasmuch as a statement concerning the credit of another can be no more than a matter of opinion, and that he did believe the lady's credit to be what he represented, held that the action would not lie. It is beside the present purpose to inquire which view of the facts was the more sound. Upon the law, there was no difference of opinion. It is a distinct decision that knowledge of the falsity of the affirmation made is essential to the maintenance of the action, and that belief in its truth affords a defence.

I may pass now to Foster v. Charles, 7 Bing. 105. It was there contended that the defendant was not liable, even though the representation he had made was false to his knowledge, because he had no intention of defrauding or injuring the plaintiff. This contention was not upheld by the court; Tindal, C.J., saying, "It is fraud in law if a party makes representations which he knows to be false, and injury ensues, although the motives from which the representations proceeded may not have been bad." This is the first of the cases in which I have met with the expression "fraud in law." It was manifestly used in relation to the argument that the defendant was not actuated by a desire to defraud or injure the person to whom the representation was made. The popular use of the word "fraud" perhaps involves generally the conception of such a motive as one of its elements. But I do not think the Chief Justice intended to indicate any doubt that the act which he characterized as a fraud in law was in truth fraudulent as a matter of fact also. Wilfully to tell a falsehood intending that another shall be led to act upon it as if it were the truth may well be termed fraudulent, whatever the motive which induces it, though it be neither gain to the person making the assertion nor injury to the person to whom it is made.

Foster v. Charles was followed in Corbet v. Brown 8 Bing. 33, and shortly afterwards in Polhill v. Walter. The learned counsel for the respondent placed great reliance on this case, because although the jury had negatived the existence of fraud in fact the defendant was nevertheless held liable. It is plain, however, that all that was meant by this finding of the jury was that the defendant was not actuated by any corrupt or improper motive, for Lord Tenterden says, "It was contended that in order to maintain this species of action it is not necessary to prove that the false representation was made from a corrupt motive of gain to the defendant, or a wicked motive of injury to the plaintiff; it was said to be enough if a representation is made which the party making it knows to be untrue, and which is intended by him, or which, from the mode in which it is made, is calculated to induce another to act on the faith of it in such a way as that he may incur damage, and that damage is actually incurred. A wilful falsehood of such a nature was contended to be, in the legal sense of the word, fraud, and for this position was cited Foster v. Charles, to which may be added the recent case of Corbet v. Brown. The principle of these cases appears to us to be well founded, and to apply to the present."

In a later case of Crawshay v. Thompson, 4 M. & G. 357, Maule, J., explains Polhill v. Walter thus: "If a wrong be done by a false representation of a party who knows such representation to be false, the law will infer an intention to injure. That is the effect of Polhill v. Walter." In the same case Cresswell, J., defines "fraud in law" in terms which have been often quoted. "The case," he says, "may be considered to establish the principle that fraud in law consists in knowingly asserting that which is false in fact, to the injury of another."

In Moens v. Heyworth, 10 M. & W. 157, which was decided in the same year as Crawshay v. Thompson, Lord Abinger having suggested that an action of fraud might be maintained where no moral blame was to be imputed, Baron Parke said, "To support that count (viz., a count for fraudulent representation) it was essential to prove that the defendants knowingly," and I observe that this word is emphasized "by words or acts made such a representation as is stated in the third count relative to the invoice of these goods, as they knew to be untrue."

The next case in the series, Taylor v. Ashton, is one which strikes me as being of great importance. It was an action brought against directors of a bank, for fraudulent representations as to its affairs whereby the plaintiff was induced to take shares. The jury found the defendants not guilty of fraud, but expressed the opinion that they had been guilty of gross negligence. Exception was taken to the mode in which the case was left to the jury, and it was contended that their verdict entitled the plaintiff to judgment. Baron Parke, however, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, "It is insisted that even that (viz., the gross negligence which the jury had found) accompanied with damage to the plaintiff in consequence of that gross negligence would be sufficient to gain him a right of action. From this proposition we entirely dissent, because we are of opinion that, independently of any contract between the parties, no one can be made responsible for a representation of this kind unless it be fraudulently made. . . . But then it was said that in order to constitute that fraud, it was not necessary to show the defendants knew the fact they stated to be untrue, that it was enough that the fact was untrue, if they communicated that fact for a deceitful purpose, and to that proposition the court is prepared to assent. It is not necessary to show that the defendants knew the facts to be untrue; if they stated a fact which was untrue for a fraudulent purpose, they at the same time not believing that fact to be true, in that case it would be both a legal and moral fraud."

Now, it is impossible to conceive a more emphatic declaration than this, that to support an action of deceit fraud must be proved, and that nothing less than fraud will do. I can find no trace of the idea that it would suffice if it were shown that the defendants had not reasonable grounds for believing the statements they made. It is difficult to understand how the defendants could, in the case on which I am commenting, have been guilty of gross negligence in making the statements they did, if they had reasonable grounds for believing them to be true, or if they had taken care that they had reasonable grounds for making them.

All the cases I have hitherto referred to were in courts of first instance. But in Collins v. Evans, 5 Q. B. 805, they were reviewed by the Exchequer Chamber. The judgment of the court was delivered by Tindal, C.J. After stating the question at issue to be "whether a statement or representation which is false in fact, but not known to be so by the party making it, but, on the contrary, made honestly, and in the full belief that it is true, affords a ground for action," he proceeds to say: "The current of authorities from Pasley v. Freeman downwards, has laid down the general rule of law to be that fraud must concur with the false statement in order to give a ground of action." Is it not clear that the court considered that fraud was absent if the statement was "made honestly, and in the full belief that it was true?"

In Evans v. Edmunds, 1 W. R. 412, 13 C. B. 777, Maule, J. expressed an important opinion often quoted, which has been thought to carry the law further than the previous authorities, though I really do not think it does so. He said, "If a man having no knowledge whatever on the subject takes upon himself to represent a certain state of facts to exist, he does so at his peril, and if it be done either with a view to secure some benefit to himself, or to deceive a third person, he is in law guilty of fraud, for he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of that which he so asserts. Although the person making the representation may have no knowledge of its falsehood, the representation may still have been fraudulently made." The foundation of this proposition manifestly is, that a person making any statement which he intends another to act upon, must be taken to warrant his belief in its truth. Any person making such a statement must always be aware that the person to whom it is made will understand, if not that he who makes it knows, yet at least that he believes it to be true. And if he has no such belief, he is as much guilty of fraud as if he had made any other representation which he knew to be false, or did not believe to be true.

I now arrive at the earliest case in which I find the suggestion that an untrue statement made without reasonable ground for believing it, will support an action for deceit. In Addie v. The Western Bank of Scotland the Lord President told the jury "that if a case should occur of directors taking upon themselves to put forth in their report statements of importance in regard to the affairs of the bank, false in themselves, and which they did not believe, or had no reasonable ground to believe, to be true, that would be misrepresentation or deceit." Exception having been taken to this direction without avail in the Court of Session, Lord Chelmsford in this House said, "I agree in the propriety of this interlocutor. In the argument upon this exception, the case was put of an honest belief being entertained by the directors, of the reasonableness of which, it was said, the jury, upon this direction, would have to judge. But supposing a person makes an untrue statement, which he asserts to be the result of a bonâ fide belief in its truth, how can the bona fides be tested, except by considering the grounds of such belief. And if an untrue statement is made which is founded upon a belief which is destitute of all reasonable grounds, or which the least inquiry would immediately correct, I do not see that it is not fairly and correctly characterised as misrepresentation and deceit." I think there is here some confusion between that which is evidence of fraud, and that which constitutes it A consideration of the grounds of belief is no doubt an important aid in ascertaining whether the belief was really entertained. A man's mere assertion that he believed the statement he made to be true is not accepted as conclusive proof he did so. There may be such an absence of reasonable ground for his belief as, in spite of his assertion, to carry conviction to the mind that he had not really the belief which he alleges. If the learned lord intended to go further, as apparently he did, and to say that, though the belief was really entertained, yet if there were no reasonable grounds for it the person making the statement was guilty of fraud in the same way as if he had known what he stated to be false, I say with all respect that the previous authorities afford no warrant for the view that an action of deceit would lie under such circumstances. A man who forms his belief carelessly, or is unreasonably credulous, may be blameworthy when he makes a representation on which another is to act, but he is not in my opinion fraudulent in the sense in which that word was used in all the cases from Pasley v. Freeman down to that with which I am now dealing. Even when the expression "fraud in law" has been employed, there has always been present and regarded as an essential element, that the deception was wilful, either because the untrue statement was known to be untrue, or because belief in it was asserted without such belief existing. I have made these remarks with the more confidence because they appear to me to have the high sanction of Lord Cranworth. In delivering his opinion in the same case he said:—"I confess that my opinion was, that in what his lordship (the Lord President) then stated, he went beyond what principle warrants. If persons in the situation of directors of a bank made statements as to the condition of its affairs which they bonâ fide believe to be true, I cannot think they can be guilty of fraud because other persons think, or the court thinks, or your lordships think, that there was no sufficient ground to warrant the opinion which they had formed. If a little more care and caution must have led the directors to a conclusion different from that which they put forth, this may afford strong evidence to show that they did not really believe in the truth of what they stated, and so that they were guilty of fraud. But this would be a consequence, not of their stating as true what they had not reasonable ground to believe to be true, but of their having stated as true what they did not believe to be true." Sir James Hannen in the court below seeks to limit the application of what Lord Cranworth says to cases where the statement made is a matter of opinion only. With all deference, I do not think it was intended to be, or can be, so limited. The direction which he was considering and which he thought went beyond what true principle warranted had relation to making false statements of importance in regard to the affairs of the bank. When this is borne in mind, and the words which follow those which are quoted by Sir James Hannen are looked at, it becomes to my mind obvious that Lord Cranworth did not use the words "the opinion which they had formed" as meaning anything different from "the belief which they entertained."

The opinions expressed by Lord Cairns in two well-known cases have been cited as though they supported the view that an action of deceit might be maintained without any fraud on the part of the persons sued. I do not think they bear any such construction. In the case of the Reese Silver Mining Co. v. Smith, 17 W. R. 1046, L. R. 4 H. L. 64, he said:—"If persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant whether they are true or untrue, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to be untrue." This must mean that the persons referred to were conscious, when making the assertion, that they were ignorant whether it was true or untrue. For if not, it might be said of anyone who innocently makes a false statement. He must be ignorant that it is untrue, for otherwise he would not make it innocently; he must be ignorant that it is true, for by the hypothesis it is false. Construing the language of Lord Cairns in the sense I have indicated, it is no more than an adoption of the opinion expressed by Maule, J., in Evans v. Edmunds. It is a case of the representation of a person's belief in a fact when he is conscious that he knows not whether it be true or false, and when he has therefore no such belief. When Lord Cairns speaks of it as not being fraud in the more invidious sense, he refers, I think, only to the fact that there was no intention to cheat or injure.

In Peek v. Gurney the same learned lord, after alluding to the circumstances that the defendants had been acquitted of fraud upon a criminal charge, and that there was a great deal to show that they were labouring under the impression that the concern had in it the elements of a profitable commercial undertaking, proceeds to say, "They may be absolved from any charge of a wilful design or motive to mislead or defraud the public. But in a civil proceeding of this kind, all that your lordships have to examine is the question—Was there or was there not misrepresentation in point of fact? If there was, however innocent the motive may have been, your lordships will be obliged to arrive at the consequences which probably would result from what was done." In the case then under consideration it was clear, that if there had been a false statement of fact, it had been knowingly made. Lord Cairns certainly could not have meant that in an action of deceit the only question to be considered was whether or not there was misrepresentation in point of fact. All that he had there pointed out was, that in such a case motive was immaterial; that it mattered not that there was no design to mislead or defraud the public, if a false representation were knowingly made. It was therefore but an affirmation of the law laid down in Foster v. Charles, Polhill v. Walter, and other cases I have already referred to.

I come now to very recent cases. In Weir v. Bell, Lord Bramwell vigorously criticized the expression "legal fraud," and indicated a very decided opinion that an action founded on fraud could not be sustained except by the proof of fraud in fact. I have already given my reasons for thinking that, until recent times, at all events, the judges who spoke of fraud in law did not mean to exclude the existence of fraud in fact, but only of an intention to defraud or injure. In the same case Cotton, L.J., stated the law in much the same way as he did in the present case, treating "recklessly" as equivalent to "without any reasonable ground for believing" the statements made. But the same learned judge in Arkwright v. Newbold laid down the law somewhat differently, for he said, "In an action of deceit, the representation to found the action must not be innocent, that is to say, it must be made either with knowledge of its being false, or with a reckless disregard as to whether it is or is not true." And his exposition of the law was substantially the same in Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, 33 W. R. 911, 29 Ch. D. 459. In this latter case, Bowen, L.J., defined what the plaintiff must prove in addition to the falsity of the statement as, "Secondly, that it was false to the knowledge of the defendants, or that they made it not caring whether it was true or false."

It only remains to notice the case of Smith v. Chadwick. The late Master of the Rolls there said, "A man may issue a prospectus or make any other statement to induce another to enter into a contract, believing his statement is true, and not intending to deceive; but he may, through carelessness, have made statements which are not true, and which he ought to have known were not true, and if he does so, he is liable in an action for deceit. He cannot be allowed to escape merely because he had good intentions and did not intend to defraud." This, like everything else that fell from that learned judge, is worthy of respectful consideration. With the last sentence I quite agree, but I cannot assent to the doctrine that a false statement made through carelessness, and which ought to have been known to be untrue, of itself renders the person who makes it liable to an action for deceit. This does not seem to me by any means necessarily to amount to fraud; without which, the action will not, in my opinion, lie. It must be remembered that it was not requisite for Sir George Jessel in Smith v. Chadwick to form an opinion whether a statement carelessly made, but honestly believed, could be the foundation of an action of deceit. The decision did not turn on any such point. The conclusion at which he arrived is expressed in these terms: "On the whole I have come to the conclusion that this, although in some respects inaccurate, and in some respects not altogether free from imputation of carelessness, was a fair, honest, and bonâ fide statement on the part of the defendants, and by no means exposes them to an action for deceit." I may further note that in the same case Lindley, L.J., said:—"The plaintiff has to prove, first, that the misrepresentation was made to him; secondly, he must prove that it was false; thirdly, that it was false to the knowledge of the defendants, or, at all events, that they did not believe it to be true." This appears to me to be a different statement of the law from that which I have just criticized, and one much more in accord with the prior decisions. The case of Smith v. Chadwick was carried to your lordship's House. Lord Selborne thus laid down the law:—"I conceive that in an action of deceit it is the duty of the plaintiff to establish two things: first, actual fraud, which is to be judged of by the nature and character of the representation made, considered with reference to the object for which they were made, the knowledge or means of knowledge of the person making them, and the intention which the law justly imputes to every man to produce those consequences which are the natural results of his acts; and, secondly, he must establish that this fraud was an inducing cause to the contract." It will be noticed that the noble and learned lord regards the proof of actual fraud as essential; all the other matters to which he refers are elements to be considered in determining whether such fraud has been established. Lord Blackburn indicated that although he nearly agreed with the Master of the Rolls, that learned judge had not quite stated what he conceived to be the law. He did not point out precisely how far he differed, but it is impossible to read his judgment in this case, or in that of Brownlie v. Campbell, without seeing that, in his opinion, proof of actual fraud, of a wilful deception, was requisite.

Having now drawn attention, I believe, to all the cases having a material bearing upon the question under consideration, I proceed to state briefly the conclusions to which I have been led. I think the authorities establish the following propositions:—First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made. I think these propositions embrace all that can be supported by decided cases from the time of Pasley v. Freeman down to Addie's case in 1867, when the first suggestion is to be found that belief in the truth of what he has stated will not suffice to absolve the defendant if his belief be based on no reasonable grounds. I have shown that this view was at once dissented from by Lord Cranworth, so that there was at the outset as much authority against it as for it. And I have met with no further assertion of Lord Chelmsford's view until the case of Weir v. Bell, where it seems to be involved in Cotton, L.J.'s enunciation of the law of deceit. But no reason is there given in support of the view; it is treated as well-established law. The dictum of the late Master of the Rolls—that a false statement made through carelessness, which the person making it ought to have known to be untrue, would sustain an action of deceit—carried the matter still further. But that such an action could be maintained notwithstanding an honest belief that the statement made was true, if there were no reasonable grounds for the belief, was, I think, for the first time decided in the case now under appeal. In my opinion, making a false statement through want of care falls far short of and is a very different thing from fraud, and the same may be said of a false representation honestly believed, though on insufficient grounds. Indeed, Cotton, L.J., himself indicated in the words I have already quoted that he should not call it fraud. But the whole current of authorities, with which I have so long detained your lordships, shows to my mind conclusively that fraud is essential to found an action of deceit, and that it cannot be maintained when the acts proved cannot properly be so termed. And the case of Taylor v. Ashton appears to me to be in direct conflict with the dictum of Sir George Jessel, and inconsistent with the view taken by the learned judge in the court below. I observe that Mr. Pollock, in his able work on Torts, at page 243 n, referring, I presume, to the dicta of Cotton, L.J., and Jessel, M.R., says that the actual decision in Taylor v. Ashton is not consistent with the modern cases on the duty of directors of companies. I think he is right. But for the reasons I have given I am unable to hold that anything less than fraud will render directors or any other persons liable to an action of deceit. At the same time I desire to say distinctly that when a false statement has been made the questions whether there were reasonable grounds for believing it, and what were the means of knowledge in the possession of the person making it, are most weighty matters for consideration. The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality. I can conceive many cases where the fact that an alleged belief was destitute of all reasonable foundation would suffice of itself to convince the court that it was not really entertained, and that the representation was a fraudulent one. So, too, although means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Brownlie v. Campbell, a very different thing from knowledge, If I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false. I have arrived with some reluctance at the conclusion to which I have felt myself compelled, for I think those who put before the public a prospectus to induce them to embark their money in a commercial enterprise ought to be vigilant to see that it contains such representations only as are in strict accordance with fact, and I should be very unwilling to give any countenance to the contrary idea. I think there is much to be said for the view that this moral duty ought to be converted into a legal obligation, and that the want of reasonable care to see that statements, made under such circumstances, are true, should be made an actionable wrong. But this is not a matter fit for discussion on the present occasion. If it is to be done the Legislature must intervene and expressly give a right of action in respect of such a departure from duty. It ought not, I think, to be done by straining the law, and holding that to be fraudulent which the tribunal feels cannot properly be so described. I think mischief is likely to result from blurring the distinction between carelessness and fraud, and equally holding a man fraudulent whether what he does be or be not deserving of that designation. It now remains for me to apply what I believe to be the law to the facts of the present case. The charge against the defendants is that they fraudulently represented that by the special Act of Parliament which the company had obtained they had a right to use steam or other mechanical power instead of horses. The test which I purpose employing is to inquire whether the defendants knowingly made a false statement in this respect, or whether, on the contrary, they honestly believed what they stated to be a true and fair representation of the facts. Before considering whether the charge of fraud is proved, I may say that I approach the case of all the defendants except Wilde with the inclination to scrutinize their conduct with severity. They most improperly received sums of money from the promoters, and this unquestionably lays them open to the suspicion of being ready to put before the public whatever was desired by those who were promoting the undertaking. But I think this must not be unduly pressed, and when I find that the statement impeached was concurred in by one whose conduct in the respect I have mentioned was free from blame, and who was under no similar pressure, the case assumes, I think, a different complexion. I must further remark that the learned judge who tried the cause, and who tells us that he carefully watched the demeanour of the witnesses and scanned their evidence, came without hesitation to the conclusion that they were witnesses of truth, and that their evidence, whatever may be its effect, might safely be relied on. An opinion so formed ought not to be differed from except on very clear grounds, and, after carefully considering the evidence, I see no reason to dissent from Stirling, J.'s conclusion. I shall, therefore, assume the truth of their testimony. I agree with the court below, that the statement made did not accurately convey to the mind of a person reading it what the rights of the company were, but to judge whether it may nevertheless have been put forward without subjecting the defendants to the imputation of fraud, your lordships must consider what were the circumstances. By the General Tramways Act of 1870 it is provided that all carriages used on any tramway shall be moved by the power prescribed by the special Act, and, where no such power is prescribed, by animal power only. In order, therefore, to enable the company to use steam power, an Act of Parliament had to be obtained empowering its use. This had been done, but the power was clogged with the condition that it was only to be used with the consent of the Board of Trade. It was therefore incorrect to say that the company had the right to use steam; they would only have that right if they obtained the consent of the Board of Trade. But it is impossible not to see that the fact which would impress itself upon the minds of those connected with the company was that they had, after submitting the plans to the Board of Trade, obtained a special Act empowering the use of steam. It might well be that the fact that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary would not dwell in the same way upon their minds if they thought that the consent of the board would be obtained as a matter of course if their requirements were complied with, and that it was therefore a mere question of expenditure and care. The provision might seem to them analogous to that contained in the General Tramways Act, and I believe in the Railways Act also, prohibiting the line being opened until it had been inspected by the Board of Trade and certified fit for traffic, which no one would regard as a condition practically limiting the right to use the line for the purpose of a tramway or railway. I do not say that the two cases are strictly analogous in point of law, but they may well have been thought so by business men. I turn now to the evidence of the defendants. I will take first that of Mr. Wilde, whose conduct in relation to the promotion of the company is free from suspicion. He is a member of the bar and director of one of the London tramway companies. He states that he was aware that the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, but that he thought that such consent had been practically given, inasmuch as, pursuant to the standing orders, the plans had been laid before the Board of Trade with the statement that it was intended to use mechanical as well as horse power, and, no objection having been raised by the Board of Trade, and the Bill obtained, he took it for granted that no objection would be raised afterwards, provided the works were properly carried out. He considered, therefore, that practically and substantially they had the right to use steam, and that the statement was perfectly true. Mr. Pethick's evidence is to much the same effect. He thought the Board of Trade had no more right to refuse their consent than they would in the case of a railway; that they might have required additions or alterations; but that, on any reasonable requirements being complied with, they could not refuse their consent. It never entered his thoughts that, after the board had passed their plans, with the knowledge that it was proposed to use steam, they would refuse their consent. Mr. Moore states that he was under the impression that the passage in the prospectus represented the effect of section 35 of the Act, inasmuch as he understood that the consent was obtained. He so understood from the statements made at the board by the solicitors to the company, to the general effect that everything was in order for the use of steam; the Act had been obtained subject to the usual restrictions, and that they were starting as a tramway company, with full power to use steam as other companies were doing. Mr. Wakefield, according to his evidence, believed that the statement in the prospectus was fair; he never had a doubt about it. It never occurred to him to say anything about the consent of the Board of Trade, because, as they had got the Act of Parliament for steam, he presumed at once that they would get it. Mr. Derry's evidence is somewhat confused; but I think the bare effect of it is that, though he was aware that under the Act the consent of the Board of Trade was necessary, he thought that, the company having obtained their Act, the board were going to give their consent, and that the question of such consent being necessary never crossed his mind at the time the prospectus was issued. He believed at that time that it was correct to say they had the right to use steam. As I have said, Stirling, J., gave credit to these witnesses, and I see no reason to differ from him. What conclusion ought to be drawn from their evidence? I think they were mistaken in supposing that the consent of the Board of Trade would follow as a matter of course because they had obtained their Act. It was absolutely in the discretion of the board whether such consent should be given. The prospectus was therefore inaccurate. But that is not the question. If they believed that the consent of the Board of Trade was practically concluded by the passing of the Act, has the plaintiff made out, which it was for him to do, that they had been guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation? I think not. I cannot hold it proved as to any one of them that he knowingly made a false statement, or one which he did not believe to be true, or was careless whether what he stated was true or false. In short, I think they honestly believed that what they asserted was true, and I am of opinion that the charge of fraud made against them has not been established. It is not unworthy of note that in his report to the Board of Trade, General Hutchinson, who was obviously aware of the provisions of the special Act, falls into the very same inaccuracy of language as is complained of in the defendants, for he says, "The Act of 1882 gives the company authority to use mechanical power over all their system." I quite admit that the statements of witnesses as to their belief are by no means to be accepted blindfold. The probabilities must be considered. Whenever it is necessary to arrive at a conclusion as to the state of mind of another person, and to determine whether his belief under given circumstances was such as he alleges, we can only do so by applying the standard of conduct which our own experience of the ways of men has enabled us to form; by asking ourselves whether a reasonable man would be likely under the circumstances so to believe. I have applied this test with the result that I have a strong conviction that a reasonable man, situated as the defendants were, with their knowledge and means of knowledge, might well believe what they state they did believe, and consider that the representation made was substantially true. Adopting the language of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Smith v. Chadwick, I conclude by saying that, upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the statement "though in some respects inaccurate and not altogether free from imputation of carelessness, was a fair honest, and bonâ fide statement on the part of the defendants, and by no means exposes them to an action for deceit." I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Order of Court of Appeal of the 19th of November 1887, so far as appealed from, reversed; judgment of the Chancery Division of the 24th of March, 1887, restored; the respondent to pay to the appellants their costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House.

Solicitors, Linklater, Hackwood, Addison, & Brown; Tamplin, Taylor, & Joseph.

From C. A. (England). March 4, 5, 7; April 8, 1889.

Macdougall v. Knight. (a.)

Libel—Privilege—Publication of judgment.

A jury found that an alleged libel was (1) a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of a judge; (2) that it was published bonâ fide and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case, in order to protect the reputation of the defendants, and in reasonable self-defence; and (3) that the publication was not malicious.

Held, that it was too late after the trial to raise the question whether or not the judgment did truly represent all the evidence given.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (34 W. R. 727, 17 Q. B. D. 636) affirmed, but for different reasons.

To what extent a judge's judgment or summing up to a jury is privileged, discussed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 727, 17 Q. B. D. 636).

The action was brought by the appellant against the respondents to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel contained in a pamphlet which purported to be a verbatim report of the judgment of North, J., pronounced in a cause in the Chancery Division brought by the appellant against the respondents.

The whole course of the proceedings are given in the judgment of Lord Halsbury, C.

The appellant in person.

Coleman v. West Hartlepool Railway Co., 8 W. R. 734; Stevens v. Sampson, 28 W. R. 87, 5 Ex. D. 53; Milissich v. Lloyd's, 25 W. R. 353; Lewis v. Clement, 3 B. & A. 702; Lewis v. Levy, 6 W. R. 629, E. B. & E. 537, were referred to.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and W. B. Odgers, for the respondents, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord Halsbury, C.—This is an action of libel in which the plaintiff complains of the defendants publishing a pamphlet purporting to be a verbatim report of the judgment of North, J., pronounced in a cause in which the plaintiff sued the present defendants in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. The statement of claim alleges that the libel complained of was the publishing of a pamphlet purporting to be a verbatim report of the judgment of North, J., and, as something turns in this case upon the question which the plaintiff sought to raise, it is material to consider the pleadings.

The passages of which the plaintiff complains are set out as the particulars of the statements and innuendoes forming the alleged libel, and the third paragraph of the defendants' defence is as follows:—(3) "The defendants are auctioneers and upholsterers carrying on business in Bath, and having a large number of customers resident in Bath and the neighbourhood. The plaintiff brought the said action against the defendants in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice charging the defendants with breach of contract, misrepresentation, and breach of faith. The said action was assigned for trial to the Hon. North, J., who, after a trial which lasted five days, gave judgment in favour of the defendants. The said pamphlet is a fair, accurate, and honest report of the said judgment of the Hon. North, J., and was published by the defendants bonâ fide and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case, and in order to protect their reputation and their said business, and in reasonable self-defence and without any malice towards the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by Charles H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff replied by joining issue on the defendants' defence, and these were the issues which came before Huddleston, B., and a jury to be determined.

The publication of the pamphlet was admitted, and it was sought to be justified as a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of North, J., and was alleged to be published by the defendants bonâ fide, and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case, and in order to protect their reputation and their said business, and in reasonable self-defence and without any malice towards the plaintiff.

The jury found all the questions involved in these issues in favour of the defendants. They found that the pamphlet was a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of North, J.; they found that it was published by the defendants bonâ fide, and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case in order to protect their reputation, and in reasonable self-defence, and they found that the publication was not malicious.

Now, it is impossible to deny upon the issues thus raised upon the pleadings that the judgment must be for the defendants, or that if the third paragraph of the defence is not an answer to the action a motion should have been made for judgment for the plaintiff, notwithstanding that there was a finding by the jury upon the issues in favour of the defendants. No such motion was made, but the notice of motion to the Divisional Court states, as the ground of the application to that court for a new trial, that the judge misdirected the jury by telling them that the occasion was privileged, and in telling them that if the pamphlet was a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of North, J., its publication was privileged; and in not telling them that to be privileged it must be a fair, accurate, and honest report of all the proceedings at the trial. Also on the ground that the judge improperly ruled that the plaintiff was not entitled on the pleadings to object to the third paragraph of the defence as bad in law. Also on the ground that the judge improperly refused to give the plaintiff leave to amend his reply by adding that he objected to the third paragraph in point of law, and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. None of these points seem really to have been argued either before the Divisional Court or the Court of Appeal except the point as to the judgment being a separate and independent portion of the proceedings at the trial which need not disclose all that took place at the trial.

I think several questions which might have arisen as to that point are concluded by the conduct of the parties at the trial, and in the course they took before the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal.

Huddleston, B. (page 142 of the appendix), says:—"What I shall ask the jury in substance is this. The plaintiff complains of what he calls a libel. The defendant says, first of all, that the pamphlet is a verbatim report of the judgment of North, J.; and then next he says, in substance the words were in fact spoken by the Hon. North, J., in delivering judgment. Those are the words complained of. He does not say that the whole of the book is put in the statement of claim; he merely says the passages. Then the defendant has pleaded that these passages were in fact uttered by North, J. Then he says that they are 'auctioneers and upholsterers carrying on business at Bath, and having a large number of customers resident in Bath and the neighbourhood. The plaintiff brought the said action against the defendants in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, charging the defendants with breach of contract, misrepresentation, and breach of faith. The said action was assigned for trial to the Hon. North, J., who, after a trial which lasted five days, gave judgment in favour of the defendants.' Those facts seem to be admitted. Then they go on to say this: 'The said pamphlet is a fair, accurate, and honest report of the said judgment of the Hon. North, J., and was published by the defendants bonâ fide, and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case, and in order to protect their reputation and their said business, and in reasonable self-defence, and without any malice towards the plaintiff.' Then, if the jury say that in their opinion that is so, there is a verdict for the defendants. Th t is the question."

Now, I think it was the duty of those who are suggesting that other questions ought to have been asked and other issues raised to have intervened at this point, and to have requested Huddleston, B., definitely and distinctly to put the questions that they now insist ought to have been submitted to the jury. But nothing of the sort was done. The parties took their chance of what the jury would do, and I think nothing could be more mischievous than to allow litigants to raise new questions when, under such circumstances, the jury have decided against them. If such a course were permitted, no end could possibly be found for litigation. But I do not think it is alone from this omission that the course pursued by the plaintiff prevents him from complaining.

On a careful review of what passed at the trial, I think that the plaintiff did mean to deny the verbatim accuracy of the report of the judgment, and I think, further, that the effort which was made at the trial, and partly renewed at your lordships' bar, was not so much to contest the accuracy of the report, as a report of what actually took place, as to show that North, J., had drawn erroneous conclusions from the facts put in proof before him.

The ground on which the privilege of accurately reporting what takes place in a court of justice is based is, that judicial proceedings are in this country public, and that the publication of what takes place there, even though matters defamatory to an individual may thus obtain wider circulation than they otherwise would, is allowed because such publication is merely enlarging the area of the court, and communicating to all that which all had the right to know.

I am not prepared to admit that the judgment of a learned judge must necessarily be privileged. It is obvious that a partial account of what takes place in a court of justice may be the exact reverse of putting the person to whom publication is made in the same position as if he were present himself. If the evidence of a witness containing matter defamatory to an individual were published, and the cross-examination which showed the witness to be a person unworthy of belief were suppressed, it would obviously be a partial and inaccurate account of what took place; and if a learned judge's judgment or summing-up to a jury did not, in fact, give reasonable opportunities to the reader to form his own judgment as to what conclusion should be drawn from the evidence given, I think the publication of such partial, and in that respect inaccurate, representations of the evidence might be the subject of an action for libel to which the supposed privilege in what was said by a judge would be no answer. Nor do I think there is any presumption one way or the other as to whether a judge's judgment does or does not give such a complete and substantially accurate account of the matters upon which he is adjudicating as to bring it within the privilege. If it be so, it must be proved to be so by evidence, and certainly not inferred as a presumption of law.

But in this case it is very obvious that the learned judge was never asked to submit any such questions as are now insisted on to the jury. The plaintiff was himself cross-examined as to whether there was any evidence in the cause not referred to in what is called the summing-up, and I think he wholly failed to suggest that the judge's judgment was erroneous in omitting to notice any evidence given in the cause; he complains of it, not because it did not fairly represent the evidence which in fact had been given, but because the learned judge did not draw from the evidence that was given, the same conclusions which Mr. McDougall insists he should have drawn.

Now, the question whether or not the judgment did truly represent all the evidence which had been given was a question of fact to be tried, if tried at all, before the jury, with the witnesses there, and with the documents before them. It is too late, either in the Divisional Court, in the Court of Appeal, or in this House, to suggest that that question should have been submitted to the jury when no such suggestion was made at the trial itself.

It seems to me that it would be most unjust to allow such a question to be raised at so late a period, and thus to allow a new case to be started by a plaintiff who had failed upon the questions of fact upon which he had elected to stand.

It seems to me that substantial justice was done by the course Huddleston, B., pursued, and I therefore think this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Watson.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved. The plaintiff joined issue with the defendants upon the defence stated, and the jury found upon all points against him, and I have seen no good cause for disturbing their verdict. Various other questions of delicacy and importance were discussed at the bar; but seeing that I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that not one of these questions has been competently raised for the consideration of the House, I express no opinion with regard to them.

Lord Bramwell.—I agree with the opinion of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and with the reasons that he has given for it; but I wish to say a few words partly in justice to the plaintiff and partly to prevent the possibility of the decision of this House being mistaken, though I do not think it ought to be after what the noble and learned lord has said.

The case is shortly this: The plaintiff brought a former action against the defendants in the Chancery Division. North, J., rightly or wrongly, in the course of his judgment in that case expressed an opinion which was not creditable to the plaintiff, and which, when published, would be the subject-matter of an action for libel. Upon the same materials the Court of Appeal afterwards, though they affirmed the judgment of North, J., stated their dissent from the comments which he had made unfavourable to the plaintiff's character in the matter. The defendants in that action, who are also the defendants in this action, before the judgment of the Court of Appeal had been given, published the judgment of North, J., with the disparaging remarks in it to which I have referred, and distributed, I think, 1,500 copies of it to their own customers and patrons as they called them, and they did not accompany the publication of that judgment with the publication of the evidence.

Now, it is perfectly clear that upon that statement they did not give the plaintiff that chance of a favourable opinion being taken of his conduct in the case which they would have done if they had published the evidence, which, when it was before the Court of Appeal, caused the learned judges of that court to entertain the favourable opinion to which I have referred. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that even if the judgment was correctly published—and I have no doubt it was—it was so found by the jury—it was not a publication of all the circumstances of the case such as to enable persons to form possibly opinions unfavourable to the plaintiff, but possibly opinions favourable to him. Now this was done by the defendants not as purveyors of news; not that I mean to say a newspaper has any particular privilege except so far as it may be given by statute. It was not published by them for that purpose, but it was published by them for the sake of vindicating, as they said, their characters with their customers.

Now, what I wish to say in point of law is this (the noble and learned lord on the woolsack has expressed his doubt upon it already): That I am by no means prepared to say that under those circumstances there was not a cause of action on the part of the plaintiff against the defendants for libel for the publication of this judgment unaccompanied by the evidence. It is to be observed that there is no justification. That what North, J., said was true; the only statement in the statement of defence is that the report of the judgment was accurate, and was published without malice. I wish to guard against its being supposed that this House is holding that there was not a subject-matter of an action for libel there.

Then why is it that the plaintiff has not succeeded? For the reason that has been given by the Lord Chancellor. After the verdict of the jury had been given the objection should have been taken—"But I am entitled to judgment because, although the jury have found the facts in issue against me, no cause of action is stated in the declaration, because it is not stated in the declaration that it was a fair report of the proceedings at the trial, but merely a fair report of the judgment." That is the course that should have been taken, and if the learned judge had refused to give judgment for the plaintiff, then an application should have been made to the Divisional Court, and their refusal, if they had refused, should have been the subject-matter of an appeal upon that ground. But the point has never been so taken. There has been some curious suggestion that in some way or other the jury ought to have been asked a question which, in truth, was a question of law. The consequence is that the true ground for maintaining the plaintiff's action has never been put before any tribunal as it ought to have been. It has been put, as I say, not as an objection to the statement of claim, but in some way, not very intelligibly, that the learned judge did not leave some question to the jury which, in reality, if it was anything, was not a question raised upon the pleadings, but which was a question of law.

I have thought it right to make these remarks, as I have said, partly in justice to the plaintiff, and partly in order that it might not be supposed that this House is affirming that there was not a subject-matter of an action for libel in this case.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The pleadings and the facts have been already summarized. The replication "joins issue on the defence," but it contains no averment that the defence is insufficient in law, and, on the contrary, as the defence consists entirely of matters of fact, the replication imports that if the facts relied on in the defence should be established in proof, the defence is good in law.

The defendants' pamphlet contains the paragraphs complained of in the statement of claim, which undoubtedly are libellous of the plaintiff, and sufficient to maintain his action if the publication be not justified, or protected, or excused.

The defence admits the publication of the pamphlet, but alleges that the pamphlet is a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of North, J., in the chancery action, and that it was published in good faith and without malice. That is the substance of the defence, though the pleading comprises some other allegations, not absolutely necessary, but which go to rebut any inference of malice and to show the defendants' interest in the matter, and that in the publication they were not exceeding the limits of privilege. The defence, then, consisted of two main allegations—viz., (1) that the report gave accurately what North, J., did actually say in his judgment in the chancery action; (2) that the pamphlet was published without malice. This cause came to trial, and there was a perplexing contest as to what ought to be received in evidence and what rejected; but finally considerable latitude was given by the learned judge, and out of the tangle and confusion created principally by the plaintiff's examination it appeared plainly that the plaintiff failed to establish that the pamphlet was unfair or inaccurate, or that any material part of the evidence had been omitted in North, J.'s summary. The defendants' evidence proved that it did contain a fair, accurate, and honest report of what North, J., had said in his judgment in the chancery cause.

If it was expedient to enter on the question, I may point out that although the plaintiff got the utmost latitude from Huddleston, B., yet he failed in his contention to establish that the judgment of North, J., did not contain a full summary of the proceedings and evidence in the trial before him.

The jury found affirmatively that the pamphlet was a fair, accurate, and honest report of that judgment, and published by the defendants bonâ fide, with the honest intention of making known the facts of the case, in order to protect their reputation and in reasonable self-defence; and also found negatively that there was no malice. Thereupon judgment was given for the defendants.

I concur with the judge that there ought to have been then an end of this case, but the plaintiff's counsel had, in the course of the trial, put it rather doubtfully that the defence was not good in law. After the close of his case he says: "Your lordship understands I do not admit that this is a good plea of privilege." The defendants' counsel does not appear to have taken any objection to the summing up, or asked for any specific direction in point of law.

I collect from what occurred that the allegation of the plaintiff was that a publication of the judge's judgment alone could not raise a justification; it must be a report of the whole proceedings at the trial; that such a report, to be full and to be justified, should have contained the whole proceedings and the evidence at the trial, which had been dragging along for many days before the judge pronounced his judgment.

Now let us see what this judgment of North, J., really was. It was not exactly similar to a summing up of a judge to a jury who have heard the evidence, where he is acting in their aid as to the findings in fact which they are to determine, and directing them on such questions of law as have arisen. North, J., without a jury had the function of deciding on the facts and on the law, and had necessarily to review the evidence and state his conclusions on the facts. His decision on both facts and law was final between the parties unless reversed or varied on appeal. The plaintiff did appeal, both on fact and in law, and he has failed in the Divisional Court, in the Court of Appeal, and before your lordships.

North, J., was therefore pronouncing, and did pronounce, what was and is the final decision on the rights of the parties in that very complicated suit, and so far as they could be then determined at that stage of the suit. But before announcing his decision he precedes it by a review of the trial, and summarises the pleadings, the evidence, and the issues, and also gives his reasons at large for the judgment he is about to pronounce. The reasons for the judgment and the judgment itself are quite distinct, though together usually described as the judgment of the judge. If the decision of the judge, as pronounced by him, and subsequently recorded in his order or decree, had been accurately published, it would not be libellous unless the privilege which protects such a publication had been displaced by proof of actual malice.

The appellant pressed on your lordships that the defence (assuming it to be true in fact) presented no answer to the action, and he claimed to have judgment entered for him. He ought to have raised that question before the Divisional Court, but did not do so; but I assume, for the purpose of this appeal, that if the pleading presents no legal defence, then even at this stage of the cause the appellant's contention should prevail.

The privilege which attaches to the publication of the proceedings of courts of justice rests on the foundation that the law of this land is administered publicly and openly, and its administration is at once subjected to, and protected by, the full and searching light of public opinion and public criticism. The openness and publicity of our courts forms one of the excellences of our practice of the law, and admits of exception only in rare cases of such a character that public morality requires that the proceedings should be in camera wholly or in part. This openness and publicity was at one time peculiar to the law of England.

Barrington, in his observations on the statutes, and speaking of our open courts, says:—"I do not recollect to have met in any of the European laws with an injunction that all causes shall be heard ostiis apertis, except in those of the Republic of Lucca. In Scotland, by a statute of William and Mary, all causes must be tried with open doors, rape and the like being excepted, and Mr. Emlyn, in his preface to his edition of State Trials, says:—"In other countries the courts of justice are held in secret, with us publicly and in open view; there the witnesses are examined in private, and in the prisoner's absence; with us face to face, and in the prisoner's presence."

From this practice of the law the principle has been deduced, and in modern times expanded, that as a general rule the publication of a fair and bonâ fide report of the proceedings of a court of justice is primâ facie to be protected, and I may add that, speaking for myself alone, I am not disposed to narrow or limit that privilege. So far the law is not contested. But the appellant contends, in this particular case, that the occasion is not privileged because the defendants did not publish the whole trial, but only the judgment.

I do not intend to indulge in any abstract propositions. There is danger in doing so, and especially where the appellant has not been represented by counsel before your lordships. No authority has been brought before your lordships for the assertion that the privilege cannot exist where the publication is of a part only of the proceeding. Lewis v. Levy is directly contrary. Where, as in the case before North, J., the trial had been completed, and the publisher, in his publication, gives only the last scene—i.e., the decision, with the judge's reasons for that decision—he may incur considerable risks—e.g., he may exceed the limits of privilege, and he leaves himself open to the imputation that he has adopted the plan of a partial publication as the vehicle of malice. In the present case the defendants are freed from those dangers by their defence, which is now to be taken as true in all its facts.

The trial of the chancery cause before North, J., is stated to have occupied five days, and his judgment and reasons were delivered on a subsequent day, and I can entertain no doubt that in this particular case the publication of that decision, preceded by the judge's summary of the case, and the evidence, with his own reasons, comes primâ facie within the protection afforded to the publication of proceedings of public courts of justice, and that to obtain that protection it was not necessary to give a report of all prior proceedings at the trial.

I confine my judgment to the particular case before your lordships' House. Your lordships will find some more extensive propositions expressed in the reasons of the courts below also discussed here. I do not mean to express dissent, but, as to some of them, I think that it would be desirable that they should be fully and pointedly discussed, before your lordships should be called on finally to accept them.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I concur in the motion proposed, but I prefer to do so upon the grounds which have been expressed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson).

Lord WATSON.—I desire to make an explanation.

I did not think it necessary to express any opinion as to whether the plea stated by the defendants was a good plea, because it did not occur to me, for the reasons assigned by the Lord Chancellor, that the plea had been competently challenged in these proceedings.

On the other hand, I am free to state my opinion that, if the plea had been held bad, it would have been a question, not for the court, but for the jury to determine, whether the facts were sufficiently and fairly disclosed in the opinion of the learned judge.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Hermann H. Myer.

Solicitors for the respondents, Torr, Janeways, Gribble, & Oddie, for Payne & Fuller, Bath.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Oct. 29.

In re BRACKEN.

DOUGHTY v. TOWNSON. (a.)

Administration—Executor—Statutory notice to creditors and others—Advertisements—Sufficiency of publication—Practice—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 29—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, rr. 44, 46.

There is no rule of practice in the Chancery Division rendering it in every case necessary for the sufficiency of the publication of notices to creditors and others, under section 29 of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, to have an advertisement of such notice inserted in the Times, or some other London daily paper, in addition to the London Gazette.

On the death of a testator, who had for many years previously thereto resided in Lancashire, where he had carried on the business of a farmer, the usual statutory notice to creditors and others was published by his executor in the London Gazette and in three local weekly papers, but not in the Times nor in any other London daily paper.

Held, that there had been sufficient publication of the notice to discharge the executor from liability.

The notice in question was dated the 16th of September, 1875, and the advertisement was published in the local papers on the 17th and 18th of September, and in the London Gazette on the 21st of September. The time limited by the notice for sending in claims was, not one month from the date of publication of the last advertisement, but one month from the date of the notice.

Held, that the notice was not insufficient on that ground.

Wood v. Weightman, 20 W. R. 459, L. R. 13 Eq. 434, discussed.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiff in this action claimed to be entitled, under the will of John Bracken, to a share in the proceeds of sale of certain property which had been sold in 1847 by John Chapman, as the then sole surviving executor of John Bracken, and which, as the plaintiff alleged, Chapman had never accounted for. Chapman had died in 1875, and this action was brought in 1888 against the defendant Townson, the sole surviving executor of Chapman.

The defendant, by his defence, admitted that he had received assets of Chapman's estate sufficient to answer all claims against the same, but pleaded that he or his co-executors had long since fully administered the same in a due course of administration, and had advertised for and paid all claims against the estate as by law required, and had not now in his possession any such assets.

North, J., had ordered that the point of law as to the sufficiency of the advertisements raised by this defence should, under ord. 25, r. 2, be disposed of before the trial of the action. A statement of facts, admitted by both plaintiff and defendant, was put in evidence for this purpose.

It appeared from this statement that John Chapman was a farmer who, at the time of his death and for forty years previous thereto, had resided in the parish of Tatham, in the county of Lancaster, and that the persons residing in that parish use Lancaster as their market town. A notice in the usual statutory form requiring all creditors or claimants upon the estate of John Chapman to send in particulars of their debts or claims to the executors of Chapman "before the expiration of one calendar month from the date hereof"—viz., the 16th of September, 1875—was advertised in the London Gazette of the 21st of September, 1875, in the Lancaster Gazette of the 18th of September, 1875, in the Lancaster Guardian of the same date, and in the Lancaster Observer of the 17th of September, 1875. The three last-mentioned papers were weekly papers, and were admitted to have a local circulation in Tatham. The plaintiff in the action resided at New York, in America, where her mother and grandmother, through whom she claimed, had also resided some years previous to 1847.

Section 29 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 enacts that: "Where an executor or administrator shall have given such or the like notices as, in the opinion of the court in which such executor or administrator is sought to be charged, would have been given by the Court of Chancery in an administration suit for creditors and others to send in to the executor or administrator their claims against the estate of the testator or intestate, such executor or administrator shall at the expiration of the time named in the said notices, or the last of the said notices for sending in such claims, be at liberty to distribute the assets of the testator or intestate, or any part thereof, amongst the parties entitled thereto, having regard to the claims of which such executor or administrator has then notice, and shall not be liable for the assets or any part thereof so distributed to any person of whose claim such executor or administrator shall not have had notice at the time of the distribution of the said assets."

On the above stated facts North, J., held that the advertisements issued were sufficient, and that no claim could now be sustained against the executor.

The plaintiff appealed.

Seward Brice, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, for the appellant.—The advertisements ought to have been inserted in the Times or some other well-known London paper as well as in the London Gazette and the local papers; it is the practice of the Court of Chancery in administration suits to advertise in the Times or some well-known London paper in addition to the London Gazette: Wood v. Weightman, 20 W. R. 459, L. R. 13 Eq. 434. [FRY, L.J.—Is this point open to appeal? The statute says: "Such notices as would have been given by the Court of Chancery . . . in the opinion of the court in which the executor is sought to be charged," does that include the Court of Appeal?] We contend that the conclusion come to by the judge below as to the practice of the Court of Chancery was erroneous, and we are entitled to appeal on that ground. Again, the time limited by the notice was not sufficient, it should have been at least a month from the date on which the last advertisement of the notice was published and not a month from the date of the notice itself: Wood v. Weightman.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred also to Newton v. Sherry, 24 W. R. 371, 1 C. P. D. 246.

Gatey, for the respondent, the executor, was not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of North, J., on a point of law raised on an admitted statement of facts. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, the present appellant, that the defendant was not relieved from liability because the statutory notice to creditors of the estate of J. Chapman, given by the defendant and his co-executors, was not—as the plaintiff alleges—sufficiently advertised. The notice was advertised in the London Gazette and in three Lancashire papers circulating in the locality where the testator had lived for many years; but the plaintiff contends that it should have been advertised also in the Times or some other well-known daily London paper, on the ground that it was the practice of the Court of Chancery in a creditors' administration action to direct advertisements to be inserted in such papers. In my opinion, however, for several reasons, this contention cannot be supported. Both the learned judge below and his chief clerk have found that such advertisement was not necessary. Then in the case of Wood v. Weightman, before Lord Romilly, there had been no advertisement in the London Gazette, and in my opinion that case lays down no set rule of practice as to the papers in which such advertisements should be inserted. In Daniell's Chancery Practice, 6th ed., p. 1014, it is stated that "the advertisement is inserted . . . in the London Gazette, and in such other papers as may be directed by the judge," and that indicates no such set rule of practice as is alleged by the plaintiff. In the chambers, at all events, of the learned judge who decided this case the practice is not to require, as an absolute rule, an advertisement in the Times or other London daily paper. Though I am not as familiar as my brothers are with the practice in chambers, yet my own view is that, under the circumstances of a case like this, where the testator had been living for many years previous to his death in Lancashire, and not carrying on business in London, an advertisement in the local papers, in addition to an advertisement in the London Gazette, was all that was necessary.

Then it was said that the time fixed by the notice was not sufficient, and that there should have been one month allowed from the date of the publication of the advertisement, instead of one month from the day of the date of the notice. In the present case the notice was dated "September 16, 1875," and the advertisements were issued on the 17th and 18th of September in the local papers and on the 21st of September in the London Gazette. I cannot think that that makes the notice insufficient, and I think that the time given was sufficient. In my opinion the decision of the learned judge below was quite right.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to decide is whether the executor has given such or the like notice as, in the opinion of the court in which the executor is sought to be charged, would have been given by the Court of Chancery in an administration suit. It still remains an open question whether this case is one in which an appeal to this court lies. But, assuming that an appeal does lie to this court, we should be extremely chary to interfere with the view of the court below—the court which is the proper tribunal to decide this matter. Is the opinion expressed by North, J., clearly wrong? As to the practice of the Court of Chancery, I leave it to my learned brothers to express their views of the decision of North, J., on that point. But I find with regard to the sufficiency of these advertisements the following facts:—First, that North, J., has, after consultation with his chief clerk, come to the conclusion that it was not the practice of the Court of Chancery to require advertisements to be inserted, as a matter of necessity, in the Times or other London daily paper; and, secondly, that no authority has been or can be produced to show that there has been any practice of the Court of Chancery contrary to the opinion taken by North, J., for the case of Wood v. Weightman is not such an authority. It is, therefore, quite impossible for us to overrule the decision of that learned judge.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Warriner & Kinch, for J. Stone, Derby.

Solicitors for the respondent, Tahourdin & Hargreaves, for Johnson & Tilly, Lancaster.

From Chan. Div. Aug. 9, 1889.

CURWEN v. MILBURN. (a.)

Practice—Solicitor and client—Costs—Taxation—Bill of costs including items barred by Statute of Limitations—Solicitor's lien.

M. had acted for many years as solicitor for C. In June, 1888, C., becoming dissatisfied with M., signed an authority to other solicitors to obtain and receive from M. all deeds and documents in M.'s possession belonging to C. or relating to his property. The new solicitors wrote to M. requesting him, if he had any claim to a lien upon C.'s deeds, &c., to send them full particulars, and inclosing a copy of their authority. In further correspondence they asked for an early appointment for delivery up of C.'s deeds, documents, &c., and intimated that C. only required M. to deliver particulars of any unsettled bill of costs M. might have against him. Early in July, 1888, C. took out an originating summons as plaintiff against M. as defendant for taxation, and delivery up of deeds, &c., instead of proceeding by the usual petition of course (the summons containing no undertaking by C., such as would have been contained in a petition of course, to pay what should be found due on the taxation), and obtained an order for delivery by M. (within fifteen days of service of the order) to C. of a bill of M.'s fees and disbursements in all matters in which M. had been employed as solicitor for C., with a reference to the taxing master to tax and settle "the said bill," and to certify the amount due on either side, and for payment of the amount certified. And it was further ordered that C. should be at liberty to pay £350 into court, and that M. should thereupon deliver up to C. on oath all C.'s documents, &c., which were in M.'s possession or power, and that M.'s lien on such documents, &c., should attach to the £350 when paid into court, and that the delivery of the documents should be without prejudice to M.'s lien. The taxing master, in taxing the bill, struck out the items incurred more than six years previous to the proceedings, on the ground that they were statute-barred, without reference to their propriety in other respects.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, the real object of the proceeding being clearly to obtain delivery up of C.'s documents, and for that purpose to ascertain the amount of M.'s lien on them, it must have been intended by the order to treat all the items as "due," whether they were recoverable by action or not, and therefore the taxing master ought to have taxed them all, whether statute-barred or otherwise.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Whether there was in the correspondence any acknowledgment sufficient to take the items, which would otherwise have been barred, out of the Statute of Limitations, quære.

Appeal from North, J.

In this case it appeared that Mr. Milburn, the defendant, had acted for many years as the plaintiff's solicitor. Eventually, however, becoming dissatisfied with the defendant, the plaintiff, on the 16th of June, 1888, signed a written authority, addressed to another firm of solicitors, requesting them to obtain and receive from the defendant all deeds and documents in the possession, custody, or power of the defendant belonging to the plaintiff, or in any way relating to his manor of P., and also all other deeds, &c., in the possession, custody, or power of the defendant belonging to the plaintiff, or in any way relating to the lands, tenements, hereditaments, matters, actions, things, and premises in which the plaintiff was in any way interested, and of which deeds, &c., the defendant had the possession, custody, or power as solicitor for the plaintiff, and also to obtain and receive from the defendant an account of his dealings and transactions with the plaintiff's lands, tenements, hereditaments, matters, actions, things, and premises since the defendant was appointed the plaintiff's solicitor many years ago, or for such other period as the new solicitors might think fit, and the plaintiff thereby authorized and requested the defendant to deliver up to the new solicitors all such deeds, books, papers, and documents as aforesaid. The new solicitors accordingly wrote to the defendant, inclosing a copy of the authority, and requesting him, if he claimed any lien upon the deeds, &c., of their client, to deliver them full particulars thereof without delay. Later on they wrote, in answer to questions, "Our client only requires you to deliver particulars of any unsettled bill of costs you may have against him," and asking for an early appointment for delivery up of their client's deeds, books, papers, and documents. That was on the 26th of June, 1888.

Mr. Curwen, on the 4th of July, 1888, issued an originating summons, as plaintiff, against Milburn as defendant, instead of proceeding by an ordinary petition of course, and the summons did not contain the submission by the plaintiff (which would have been contained in a petition of course) to pay what should be found due on taxation. An order, however, was made on the summons (upon the undertaking of the plaintiff to pay any additional costs caused by the form of proceeding) that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant any such additional costs, such costs to be taxed, and that the defendant should, on or before the 1st of October, 1888, or subsequently within fifteen days after service of the order, deliver to the plaintiff "a bill of his fees and disbursements in all suits, causes, or other matters of business in which he has been employed as solicitor for the plaintiff," and that it be referred to the taxing master to tax and settle the said bill, and there was a further order for the production on oath by the defendant of books, papers, &c., and that the defendant should give credit for all sums of money by him received of, or on account of, the plaintiff, and that he should be at liberty to charge all sums of money paid by him to, or on account of, the plaintiff. And it was ordered that if such bill, when taxed, be less by a sixth part than the said bill as delivered, the master to tax the plaintiff his costs of this application and of such reference, such last-mentioned costs to include only such costs as would have been incurred if the plaintiff had proceeded by a petition of course; and that if such bill, when taxed, shall not be less by a sixth part than the said bill as delivered, the master do tax the defendant his costs of this application and of such reference. And it was ordered that the master should certify the amount due from the plaintiff to the defendant, or from the defendant to the plaintiff, as the case might be, having regard to the costs of the application and of such reference so to be taxed as aforesaid, and any sum or sums of money which might have been so received or paid as aforesaid. Then, after directions for the payment of the amount so certified, the order proceeded to direct that the plaintiff should be at liberty to pay into court the sum of £350, and that the defendant should thereupon deliver over to the plaintiff on oath, on or before the 1st of October, 1888, all deeds, &c., in his custody or power belonging to the plaintiff, and, the plaintiff so requesting, and the defendant assenting, that the defendant should, within fifteen days after the payment into court of the £350, hand over to the plaintiff such documents as the plaintiff might, by himself or his solicitor, designate as wanted for immediate use. And it was ordered that the existing lien of the defendant upon the documents in his possession do attach to the sum of £350 when paid into court, and that the delivery over of such documents by him to the plaintiff be also without prejudice to the defendant's lien.

The taxing master proceeded accordingly to tax the defendant's bill, and in doing so struck out all the items incurred before a certain date on the ground that they were statute-barred, without reference to their propriety in other respects.

The defendant then delivered the following objections to the taxation:—(1) That he had a lien for his costs which was not affected by the Statute of Limitations; and (2) that the correspondence contained a sufficient acknowledgment of the plaintiff's indebtedness, as regards the items struck out, to take the case out of the statute. The master replied:—"The question of lien is not one for the taxing master, and does not render it incumbent upon him to tax a bill barred by the statute, or open to valid objection of any other description than that of amount. No evidence has been produced which, in my opinion, is sufficient to take the disallowed items out of the statute." He accordingly certified that he had taxed and settled the bill of fees at the sum of £204 11s. 9d., and, after allowing for moneys received by the defendant, and payments made by him, and for the costs of the reference, he certified that a sum of £25 18s. 2d. remained due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

The defendant then took out a summons to review the taxation on the ground that the taxing master's certificate, finding that only so much was due in respect of the bill he had been directed to tax, would prejudice the defendant's lien in respect of the statute-barred items, and might prevent him from enforcing it, as he would have no answer to an application for delivery up of the plaintiff's documents.

North, J., held that there was in the correspondence a sufficient acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute, and that the master ought to have taxed the items he had disallowed, but he declined to decide whether, under the common order to tax, the master would be right in disallowing without taxation all items in a bill of costs which were statute-barred. He held that that question did not arise in the present case, as the parties clearly intended to have a taxation for the purpose of determining the amount of the solicitors' lien.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the appellant.—The letter of the 26th of June is relied on by the other side as taking the case out of the statute. Strictly speaking, no bills of costs had been delivered, but merely accounts. The bill in question began in 1873 and went down to 1878. The judge held that the letters amounted to a promise to pay. There are two points:—First, the letters were not written by Curwen himself, but by his agents, who had only a limited authority given by the document of the 16th of June. That did not authorize the solicitor to promise to pay a debt which would otherwise have been statute-barred. In the first place, this was not signed by the client himself; and, secondly, even if it had been, it would not be a sufficient acknowledgment. In Quincey v. Sharpe, 24 W. R. 373, 1 Ex. D. 72, which is relied on for the defendant, there was a clear demand, made twice over, for the account, and the letters had been written before the statute had run, though the action was brought after it had run. Here the statute had run before the letter was written. It is admitted there were accounts within six years, and the document must be taken as referring to them. Where there are several debts, some barred and others not, can it be reasonable to hold that asking for an account is a promise to pay the barred debts as well as the others? The authorities were reviewed in Green v. Humphreys, 26 Ch. D. 474, 32 W. R. Dig. 120. In Skeet v. Lindsay, 25 W. R. 322, there was a clear promise to pay what was due. If it were the law that, by merely asking for your account you rendered yourself liable for an old statute-barred debt which was not in your mind at all, it would be going much further than any case has yet gone. We are not asking to defeat the solicitor's lien as to the statute-barred debt. There must be a recognition by the debtor of the debt as a debt binding upon him: Rowe v. Hopwood, 17 W. R. 28, L. R. 4 Q. B. 1. If a man merely asks for an account it is an acknowledgment; but if he signs at the foot of an account that it is correct that is no acknowledgment. In Spong v. Wright, 9 M. & W. 629, the qualifying words "if just" were held to prevent a promise to pay being an acknowledgment. So in Mitchell's claim, 19 W. R. 1130, L. R. 6 Ch. 822, where it was held there was no unconditional promise to pay. That is exactly what occurred here. The clause here is equivalent to "if just." We are willing (if necessary) to submit to the order being varied so as to make it without prejudice to the defendant's lien. The taxing master would not, under the common order for a taxation of a bill of costs, tax statute-barred items. Surely the plaintiff could not have been ordered personally to pay debts barred by the statute when he had made no acknowledgment and done nothing to take them out of the statute.

Romer, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the respondents.—What the plaintiff wanted to have taxed was all the bills of costs since the defendant was appointed his solicitor, many years ago. That authority was enclosed to the respondent, and an early appointment for delivery up of all books, deeds, and papers was requested. The object of the application was to obtain possession of the deeds, &c., for which purpose it was necessary to ascertain the amount of the defendant's lien on them. Under the order our client is bound to hand over the whole of the deeds on payment into court of £350. That must refer to the lien. The order directs delivery of "a bill," and taxation of "the said bill." The taxing master, therefore, had no jurisdiction to mutilate these accounts, and only deal with those parts of them which refer to the last six years. Secondly, as to the authority of the solicitors, the letter was ample authority in itself, but we can look at the other circumstances as well as that. They were the client's solicitors. Are we to inquire whether they went beyond their authority? The client himself has not ventured to deny the authority. [They cited Bright v. Legerton, 8 W. R. 678, 9 W. R. 239.] Delivery of all the bills was demanded. [FAY, L.J.—I think asking for one's account really means this (apart from authority), "Let me see what you claim," LOPES, L.J.—I think it is an admission that he owes something.] In France v. Sympson, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42, Kay, 678, at p. 681, Page-Wood, V.C., said:—"It is not necessary for the purpose of a suit for an account to have an acknowledgment that a debt is actually due; but it is enough that there is an acknowledgment that an account is pending, and that the defendant promises to pay the balance." A statute-barred debt is "due," though it cannot be recovered. The common form of undertaking in an order to tax a bill of costs is to pay what shall appear to be "due" (1 Seton, 4th ed., p. 604). That must include statute-barred debts: otherwise the clients could recover their deeds without reference to the solicitor's lien.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—Bright v. Legerton has no application to this case.

COTTON, L.J.—We have a question to decide here on the effect of an order made on a summons. It does not arise upon an order for taxation under the Solicitors Act, made upon the usual petition of course, but upon an order made on a special application for delivery and taxation of the defendant's bills of costs, and for delivery up of the plaintiff's documents, the order being that the defendant do deliver to the plaintiff a bill of his fees and disbursements in all causes and other matters in which he has acted as the plaintiff's solicitor, and that the bill be taxed. Then it is ordered that the taxing master shall certify the amount that is due from the plaintiff to the defendant, or from the defendant to the plaintiff, and that the balance so certified to be due be paid. And the plaintiff is to be at liberty to pay into court £350, on which the solicitor is to have a lien instead of on the books and papers, which, in the event of the £350 being so paid in, are to be delivered up to the plaintiff. If taxation was all that was wanted, this certainly seems a most extraordinary method of obtaining it. The evident purpose was to enable the plaintiff to obtain possession of his documents, and the real object of the taxation was to ascertain the amount of the defendant's lien on these documents. In my opinion the solicitor was bound to bring in bills of costs as to all the transactions, and the taxing master did not obey the order in only taxing the bills incurred within six years, and refusing to tax the other items on the ground that they were statute-barred. It is argued that the taxing master could not certify as due, items so barred. In my opinion the meaning of the order was that everything properly owing from the client, whether statute-barred or not, was to be regarded as "due." Debts barred by the Statute of Limitations are due, though no action can be brought to enforce payment of them. Then it is contended that as the plaintiff gave no undertaking to pay, he cannot be ordered to pay an amount which includes debts barred by statute. But the plaintiff has submitted to an order to pay what is found due on taking an account.

In my opinion, therefore, we cannot differ from the judgment appealed from, though we do not affirm it on precisely the same grounds. The whole matter is governed by this order made on the summons, the object of which was to ascertain the amount for which the defendant has a lien on the plaintiff's documents.

It is unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff has done anything amounting to an acknowledgment of his indebtedness in respect of the statute-barred items.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The client, for some reason known to himself, was minded to depart from the ordinary course, and obtained an order upon a special application, which order was not in the usual form of an order made upon a petition of course.

The substance of the order requires the plaintiff's solicitor to deliver a bill of costs of all the suits, causes, and all other matters of business in which the defendant was employed or acted as the plaintiff's solicitor, and the taxing master was to tax and settle the bill as one bill.

Then the taxing master was to certify the amount or balance due from the plaintiff to the defendant, or from the defendant to the plaintiff, which was to be done in one certificate on the one bill, so that the certificate was to certify what was due for all matters of business extending over the entire period during which the defendant had acted as the plaintiff's solicitor. Liberty was given to the plaintiff to pay £350 into court, and upon his doing so his documents were to be handed over to him by the defendant. It appears to me that if this appeal were right, this order would have directed two certificates to be made, one for the amount for which the plaintiff was personally liable, and another for the amount for which the defendant had a lien; whereas, in fact, it only directed one certificate to be made. Therefore, I think the appellant is now too late in trying to raise this distinction. He ought to have asked only for the bill of costs as to the items not barred by the statute.

We all know that the effect of the Statute of Limitations is not to extinguish a debt, but only to prevent its recovery. The appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Speechly, Mumford, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Wood & Wootton.

App. Bankruptcy. Oct. 25.

Ex parte BALL.
In re FRENCH. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Receiving order — Petition presented in wrong court—Judgment debt—Appeal pending from judgment—Discretion of registrar—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 95, 97, and s. 7 (4).

The presentment of a bankruptcy petition in a wrong bankruptcy court by inadvertence will not invalidate the jurisdiction, as, by section 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, when read with section 95, the proceedings can be removed into the proper court.

Ex parte May, In re Brightmore, 33 W. R. 598, 14 Q. B. D. 37, approved.

A judgment debtor cannot, on the ground that an appeal from such judgment is pending, claim a stay of bankruptcy proceedings for the judgment debt as of right, as a stay on such grounds is entirely in the discretion of the registrar under section 7 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Appeal of J. E. French, the debtor, against a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Linklater on the petition of the trustee of the estate of T. S. Ashwin.

The grounds of the appellant were:—(1) That the London Bankruptcy Court had no jurisdiction to make the receiving order as the debtor's residence and domicile were in the country. (2) That the order was made in the matter of a judgment for costs in the High Court upon which an appeal was pending. (3) That this judgment debt was the only debt of the debtor, and that he had no assets to distribute.

Morton Daniel, for the appellant.—The only evidence in this case upon which the registrar could act was an affidavit of the debtor alleging that he lived at Southsea, and had only once been to the office in London where it was alleged he transacted business. A man who had been made a debtor under a judgment from which an appeal had been lodged, had a right to claim that proceedings in bankruptcy against him for that debt should be suspended pending the hearing of an appeal. The affidavit of the debtor showed that he had no other debts, and had no property to be distributed. Bankruptcy proceedings were for the purpose of distributing a debtor's estates among his creditors. Here there was only one debt and no estate to distribute. Admitting the discretion of the registrar to make the order, it should be reversed upon the merits of the case. Ashwin had brought an action against the debtor for the recovery of certain deeds which had passed to the debtor for good consideration and were no longer in his possession.

Bartley-Denniss, for the respondent, the trustee of Ashwin's estate, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Three grounds for this motion have been stated. I will take them in order. First, it is said there was no jurisdiction in the London Bankruptcy Court to make the original order, because the debtor was resident in the country. It is clear that the decision in Ex parte May, In re Brightmore, 33 W. R. 598, 14 Q. B. D. 37, has put the proper construction on sections 95 and 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), as applicable to such cases. When a receiving order has been made inadvertently in the wrong court, that is not sufficient ground to make out no jurisdiction, but, on the contrary, by the provisions of section 97, the proceedings can be removed to the proper court, thus implying that the jurisdiction of the first court is not ousted, but is only transferred. There is no contention here that the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings before the registrar in London was otherwise than by inadvertence: indeed we have only the statement of the debtor on affidavit that he has no residence in London, on which the suggestion of such inadvertence can be raised. At any rate no harm could be done to the debtor by such inadvertence, if any, since section 97 provides for the removal of the proceedings to any other court. The Bankruptcy Rules, 1884, rr. 19, &c., for the transfer of proceedings, equally assume that there is no lack of jurisdiction owing to the commencement of the proceedings being taken in the wrong court. This point of want of jurisdiction, therefore, fails.

Secondly, it is said that the judgment of the High Court, on the failure to comply with which the receiving order was applied for, being made the subject of an appeal, there was no jurisdiction in the registrar to issue a receiving order under such circumstances. But by the construction of section 7 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act the mere fact of an appeal being pending is not sufficient as of right to prevent a receiving order being made. The matter is within the discretion of the registrar, and, acting upon the well-known rule that we shall not interfere with discretionary powers unless we are "clearly of opinion" that it was wrongly exercised, I see no reason for being of such clear opinion. The registrar in his discretion held that the appeal did not seem a hopeful one, and my view would be the same.

Thirdly, it is said that no receiving order is to be made upon the mere neglect of the debtor to pay a debt under a judgment if it is proved to be the only debt he owes, and that he has no assets to be distributed. To make an order under such circumstances is said to be an abuse of the bankruptcy law. It is not necessary for us here to determine whether this is good ground for staying a bankruptcy proceeding. Here the bankrupt fails to prove either fact. The mere statement in his affidavit before us is not enough. He must show in his examination before the court that such is the state of the case before any appeal to us can be made on such ground. The fact of his living without any assets is in itself a subject for examination. We cannot act upon that assumption here. I think, therefore, the appeal must fail upon this ground also, and must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The third ground of appeal depends upon proved facts before we can entertain it. There must always be a certain amount of ambiguity in the affidavit of a bankrupt who says that he has no property and no debts.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, T. S. Ashwin.

Solicitors for the respondent, Newman, Hays, & Co.

From Q. B. Div. Oct. 31.

PHILLIPS v. REES.* (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress for rent—Charges of distress—Bailiff's right to percentage fee—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 49; 2*nd schedule.*

In a distress for rent the bailiff and not the landlord is entitled to the percentage fee for "levying distress" specified in the 2nd schedule to the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883.

Coode v. Johns, 35 W. R. 47, 17 Q. B. D. 714, dissented from.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on a special case.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of a farm, authorized the defendant, a certificated bailiff under the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, to levy a distress on the goods of the tenant of the farm for £300 arrears of rent. The defendant levied the distress, and received from the tenant the amount of the rent and £7 10s., being 2½ per cent. upon the amount of the rent due, as well as the fee of £1 1s. to the bailiff for levy, being the charges authorized by the second schedule to the Act. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to the £7 10s., and brought this action to recover that amount. The Divisional Court (Mathew and Grantham, JJ.), on the authority of Coode v. Johns, 35 W. R. 47, 17 Q. B. D. 714, gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Section 49 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, enacts that "no person whatsoever making any distress for rent" when the sum demanded and due exceeds £20 shall be entitled to more costs and charges for such distress than such as are set forth in the second schedule.

The second schedule provides a scale of charges, the two first items being (1) "Levying distress. Three per centum on any sum exceeding £20 and not exceeding £50. Two and a half per centum on any sum exceeding £50." (2) "To bailiff for levy, £1 1s."

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and J. A. Foote, for the defendant.—Coode v. Johns was wrongly decided. There is no distinction between "making" and "levying" a distress. 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, which fixed a scale of charges for distresses not exceeding £20, speaks of a broker "making" a distress. Formerly the bailiff got a percentage of one shilling in the pound. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, was not intended to alter the law in this respect, but only to regulate the charges. In the second schedule to that Act the percentage is cut down, and one guinea is given in addition. But both sums go to the bailiff. The words "levying distress" are also used in the schedule to the rules made under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, but the guinea to the bailiff for levy is omitted. It is admitted that the percentage for levying distress under that Act will go to the bailiff, and the same words ought to be construed in the same way in the schedule to the Act of 1883.

They also referred to Hart v. Leach, 1 M. & W. 560.

Gore, for the plaintiffs.—The language used in the rules made by the Lord Chancellor under the Act of 1888 is no test for construing the language of Parliament in 1883. The words in section 49 of the Act of 1883, which is the governing section, are "making any distress" which mean authorizing a distress. The second schedule does not say to whom the percentage for "levying distress" is to go, and as it is expressly stated that the bailiff is to have one guinea for levy, the bailiff cannot be entitled to the percentage fee, and therefore the person authorizing the distress—that is, the landlord—is entitled.

He referred to Harding v. Hall, 14 W. R. 646.

Foote replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was an action between a landlord and a bailiff who had been employed by the former in carrying out a distress for rent. The bailiff levied the distress, and realized in addition to the rent certain charges as against the tenant which are set out in the second schedule to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. The landlord asserts that he is entitled to part of those charges—namely, the 2½ per cent. on the sum of £300, the amount of the rent due. That depends upon the true construction of the Act of 1883. The same point was raised in 1886 in the case of Coode v. Johns, and it was there decided by the Divisional Court in favour of the landlord, and we are now asked to say that we do not agree with that decision.

In order to construe the Act we are entitled, or rather bound, to consider the state of the law at the time when the Act was passed. Prior to the passing of the Act the landlord had a right, when rent was in arrear, to distrain for the amount of the rent and for the expenses of realizing the rent by means of the distress. The ordinary course was to employ a bailiff. The goods of the tenant would be seized and sold for the purpose of realizing the rent in arrear and the expenses of the distress, and so far as the tenant was concerned the matter ended. As between the landlord and the bailiff, their relation was that of principal and agent. The usual course was for the landlord not to give express directions to the bailiff, but merely to authorize him to distrain the tenant's goods for the amount of the rent in arrear. That relationship and the contract implied from it were well known to the law. The authority of the bailiff was to realize by the distress the amount of the rent and the expenses of realising the rent by the distress. The terms of the implied contract were so well known to the law that the law took judicial notice of them. Apart from special stipulations, those terms were that the landlord should pay the bailiff a reasonable sum for his services. The bailiff usually got that sum from the tenant as part of the expenses, but if he was unable to do so the landlord would pay it to him. What was a reasonable sum came as a matter of custom to be fixed in most parts of England. It was fixed at five per cent. on the amount of the rent distrained for. Then came the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, one of its objects being to regulate the charges of a distress. That Act was passed for the protection of tenants, and it fixed the sum payable for the costs and charges of a distress. It does not seem to me that the object of the Act was to interfere in any way with the contract between the landlord and the bailiff. It only regulated the amount of the expenses of the distress in favour of the tenant. There is nothing in the Act to show that it goes beyond the relief of the tenant. It is said that section 49 shows that the Act goes further. The words—"no person whatsoever making any distress for rent" exceeding £20 shall be entitled to any more costs and charges than are set forth in the second schedule—are relied upon as referring to the landlord and not to the bailiff. It seems to me that they naturally include the person who actually levies the distress—that is, the bailiff. They would no doubt also include the landlord, who authorizes the distress. Then turning to the second schedule, the object of which is to fix the costs and charges beyond which the tenant is not to be harassed, the first item is "levying distress" so much per cent. It is not said to whom the percentage is to be paid. Nor when one considers the matter was it necessary for the Legislature to say so. It matters not to the tenant to whom the sum is to go. The essential point for him is the amount. The next item is "to bailiff for levy," £1 1s. The other items are not material to the present case. It seems to me that there is nothing to show that these two items are anything more than in substitution for the costs and charges which the bailiff levied before the Act and which he kept for himself. Instead of a charge of 5 per cent. the bailiff is now to receive 3 per cent or 2½ per cent., as the case may be, and also one guinea for levy. The implied contract between the landlord and the bailiff is not altered, and that part of the expenses of realizing the rent the bailiff can keep, and he can make no further charge against the landlord. There is nothing to show that the landlord is to get more than he got before the Act. Therefore he gets his rent and no more. That being my construction of the Act, I cannot agree with the decision in Coode v. Johns. Nor are we bound to follow it in accordance with the well-known rule that where a particular construction has been given to a statute or mercantile contract, and that construction has been acted upon throughout the country, and men's dealings have been regulated by it, the court will follow it though they may disagree with it, because in my opinion the time that has elapsed since that decision is not sufficiently long. Nor can I see anything in the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, which shows that the Legislature thought that decision right, and based the new legislation upon it. Therefore we must say that we do not agree with it, and this appeal must be allowed.

* The Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, and the rules made thereunder, did not apply to this case, as the action was commenced before the Act came into operation.

(a) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question before us turns upon one or two sections of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and upon the second schedule to that Act. To understand the Act it is necessary to bear in mind the law as it stood before the Act. At common law a landlord had no right to sell goods distrained upon at all. The landlord had only the right to hold them, and the tenant had the right to redeem them on paying the rent due and the expenses. By 2 W. & M. Sess. 1, c. 5, the landlord was given the right to sell, and the right to realise the rent due, and the charges of the distress is expressly referred to. So far there was no scheduled scale of charges. The charges were to be reasonable charges. It is well known that the charges made were in many cases extortionate, and to remedy that the 57 Geo. 3, c. 93 created a scale of charges where the rent distrained for did not exceed £20, and that scale was fixed as between landlord and tenant, as between landlord and bailiff, and as between tenant and bailiff. The common law remained applicable to distresses for rent above £20. The landlord was still entitled in those cases to reasonable charges.

But when one looks at the authorities and the books on the subject, one sees that the charges never went to the landlord. The landlord only got his rent. Then came the Act of 1883, which substituted a schedule of charges for reasonable charges. Section 49 does not, in my opinion, touch the right to the authorized costs and charges; it only touches the amount, and leaves the person entitled to them as before the Act. The landlord says that he is entitled to the percentage charges, and he relies mainly upon the language of the second schedule. It is said on his behalf that the express mention of the bailiff being entitled to the guinea for levy suggests that the bailiff is to have no more. Primâ facie that is so, but when I consider the effect of it, such a construction seems to me to be utterly unreasonable, and I decline to draw that primâ facie inference. The result of such a construction would be that whereas before the Act the bailiff would be entitled to reasonable charges, after the Act he was only to have a guinea. The true view seems to me to be that the scheduled charges, are simply substituted for the former reasonable charges which generally amounted to five per cent. on the rent distrained for. That being so, I am unable to concur in the decision in Coode v. Johns, and this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the landlord or the bailiff is entitled to the percentage. Precisely the same question arose in Coode v. Johns, but I am unable to agree with that decision. It is material to consider the law as it stood before the Act of 1883. The bailiff included in his levy the costs and charges of realizing the distress. These costs and charges usually amounted to 1s. in the pound. The landlord received only his rent, the bailiff took the percentage. The Act of 1883 was passed to prevent extortion by bailiffs and to regulate the charges to be made. It seems to me that the words, "making a distress" and "levying a distress," used in sections 49 to 52 and in the second schedule to the Act, are equivalent terms. The Act was not intended to make any change as regards the person who was to receive the charges. The bailiff received the percentage charge before the Act, and he is to receive it now. I cannot imagine any reason why it should be given to the landlord. The landlord incurs no expenses as a general rule. The bailiff, on the other hand, may have travelling expenses to pay, and also board and lodging, and it seems only reasonable that he should still receive the percentage. The same words authorising the percentage for "levying distress" are used in the rules made under the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, the only difference being that the words "to bailiff for levy, £1 1s.," are omitted. Therefore if the proper construction of the Act of 1883 was that the landlord should get the percentage for "levying distress," he would also get it under the Act of 1888, and the bailiff would get nothing. In my opinion the bailiff takes the percentage, and this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Peacock & Goddard, for Eaton, Evans, & Williams, Haverfordwest.

Solicitors for the defendant, Prior, Church, & Adams, for J. Price, Haverfordwest.

From Q. B. Div. June 20, 1889.

EDEN v. RIDSDALE'S RAILWAY LAMP AND LIGHTING CO. (a.)

Company — Directors — Fiduciary position — Gift by promoters to director.

During the negotiations between the promoters of a company and the company, one of the promoters gave to one of the directors certain shares in the company.

Held, that the company had the option of claiming from such director the shares, or their highest value while held by him.

Appeal from the decision of Grantham, J.

The action was brought to recover fees alleged to be due to the plaintiff as a director of the defendant company. The defendants counter-claimed for a declaration that the plaintiff was a trustee for the defendants of 200 shares of the company standing in his name, or their value, at the defendants' election.

The company was formed to take over a lamp business, the promoters being two persons named Flatau and Elborough, the former of whom had purchased the business, which he sold to the company. Flatau and the plaintiff, among others, became directors, and Flatau, at the plaintiff's request, transferred to him 200 shares, which were thereupon registered in his name. At this time the terms of the contract for sale had not been carried out, and there were still questions pending with regard to it.

Grantham, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff on claim and counter-claim, and the defendants appealed.

W. Graham and Gwynne James, for the appellants.

Sidney Woolf and A. H. Carrington, for the respondents.

The following cases were cited:—Hay's case, 24 W. R. 191, L. R. 10 Ch. 593; Carling's case, 24 W. R. 165, 1 Ch. D. 115; McKay's case, 24 W. R. 49, 2 Ch. D. 1; De Ruvigne's case, 25 W. R. 476, 5 Ch. D. 306; Pearson's case, 25 W. R. 618, 5 Ch. D. 336; Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610; Nant-y-Glo and Blaina Iron Works Co. v. Grave, 26 W. R. 594, 12 Ch. D. 738; Coventry and Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660; Clarke and Belden's case, 37 L. T. 222.

Lord EBBER, M.R.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant company, of which he was a director, to recover fees which he alleged were due to him as a director. The company not only traversed this claim, but they set up a counter-claim on the ground that the plaintiff, as director, was agent for the company, and that whilst he was agent he misconducted himself in a particular manner, so as to render him liable in damages. With regard to the claim, it appears that the plaintiff was appointed a director, and acted in that capacity, and no defence has been established to his claim for fees, so that he is entitled to recover the £400 which he claims as fees. As to the counter-claim, the case stands thus. The plaintiff was appointed director before the contract, which the company was formed to carry out, was made, and at that time he had applied for and had allotted to him a sufficient number of shares to qualify him as director. Whilst he was in this position the contract was entered into, so as to become binding on the company, and there was nothing to complain of in the conduct of the plaintiff at that time. But the contract having been made, had to be carried out; there were obligations on either side, and it was the duty of the directors to look to the interest of the company in carrying it out, and the duty of the plaintiff, as one of the directors and an agent for the company, to act for the company in all matters connected with the contract between the company and Flatau, the other contracting party. Whilst things were in that condition the plaintiff suggested to Flatau that he, the plaintiff, was in an unfavourable position as compared with the other directors, to each of whom Flatau had given vendors' shares to the amount of their qualification, while the plaintiff had qualified himself, and, thereupon, Flatau gave the plaintiff 200 vendors' shares. The reason suggested for the gift was to put the plaintiff on the same footing as the other directors. They were given because he was an agent, and in the course of carrying out of the contract. I do not say that the plaintiff took these shares from a man whose actions he was, as agent for the company, bound to watch, upon any agreement, or even understanding that he was to betray his trust and act favourably to Flatau—that would probably be to go too far, further than the learned judge who tried the case has gone; but I do not hesitate to say that the plaintiff put himself in a position which the law does not allow an agent to assume. It was not that he intended to defraud his principals, but he put himself in a position of temptation to do so. The duty of an agent to his principal does not permit the agent to put himself in such a position, and if he does so he commits a wrong against his principal.

It has been argued that the cases which have been decided between a director and his company do not apply where there is, as here, a binding contract between the promoter and the company. It may be that none of the cases have been decided under such circumstances as the present, but this rule of law is applicable to all agents. In such a case the remedy of the principal is an option either to claim what the agent has received, or to sue for damages. If that which the agent has received is money he must hand it over to his principal; if it is not money, but something else, the principal may insist on having it, or, if he chooses, the value of it. An agent who has so failed in his duty ought to have at once informed his principal of the breach of duty. In such a case the principal would claim that which the agent has received, and would thus have an opportunity of selling at the highest value reached. So if the agent does not disclose the matter, the value which the principal may claim, is the value which he might have obtained for the thing at any time between the wrongful act and the time when it came to his knowledge. Applying this to the case before us, the question is, what was the highest value of the shares after the plaintiff acquired them, and before the disclosure of the facts. The burden of proof of value would be on the defendants, but if they give primâ facie proof, then the onus would be shifted.

Transfers have been put in showing that the shares reached par value, so that the defendants are entitled to recover on their counter-claim the sum of £200. Under the circumstances there should be no costs of either claim or counter-claim, but the appeal has succeeded, and must be allowed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question on the counter-claim is, what are the rights of the defendants in respect of the 200 fully paid-up shares which the plaintiff received from Flatau. The position of affairs was this:—Under the contract Flatau was entitled to a very large sum of money, and the company had nothing out of which to pay it. In that state of things Flatau gave the plaintiff 200 shares. It would, in my opinion, be contrary to all principles of law and equity to allow the plaintiff to retain a gift so made to him by Flatau. A gift by a promoter to a director whilst there are any questions open between the company and the promoter, must be accounted for by the director to the company for whom he is an agent, and the company has the option of claiming what is given, or its value—i.e., the highest value whilst held by the director. The defendants, therefore, in this case are entitled to recover the shares, or their value. The evidence shows that at some time or other the shares were at par, and that is, therefore, the value which the defendants are entitled to set on them and to recover. The appeal must succeed, and I agree with the Master of the Rolls as to the costs.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The important question in the case is that of the right of a director to retain a gift made to him by the promoter of a company. The result of the cases is that, if a director receives a gift from a vendor at a time when a contract of sale is not completed, he cannot retain it against the company, but must either hand it over to the company or pay its highest value. Here the plaintiff was agent for the defendants when he received the shares from Flatau, the contract was still incomplete, and questions might arise between Flatau and the company. Under these circumstances the plaintiff must account for the shares to the defendants. The value has been shown from the transfers, and the defendants are entitled to recover that value. I quite agree on the question of costs.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Hatchett-Jones, & Co.

Solicitor for the defendants, Horace W. Chatterton.

From Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. June 24, 1889.

"THE WESTBOURNE." (a.)

Ship—Salvage—Towage agreement—Supervening circumstances rendering agreement impossible.

The defendants' steamship becoming disabled when about 250 miles from Gibraltar and about sixty from Carthagena, an agreement was made with the master of the plaintiffs' steamship that the plaintiffs' vessel should tow her to Gibraltar for £600, the defendants' vessel to provide the hawsers. At this time the weather was moderate. The next day the wind increased to a hurricane, and, in consequence, several of the hawsers broke, only one rope being left. The master of the plaintiffs' vessel, finding it impossible to tow to Gibraltar, towed the defendants' vessel to Carthagena. The plaintiffs having brought an action of salvage,

Held, affirming the judgment of Butt, J., that the supervening circumstances had made the service rendered wholly different from that contracted for, and that the court had jurisdiction to award salvage entirely independent of the contract.

Appeal from the judgment of Butt, J., in an action of salvage.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Howick, and the defendants were the owners of the steamship Westbourne. On the 2nd of November, 1887, The Westbourne broke down in the Mediterranean, about 250 miles from Gibraltar and between 50 and 60 miles from Carthagena. The Howick fell in with her, and the master of The Howick agreed to tow The Westbourne to Gibraltar for £600, The Westbourne to supply the hawsers. Soon after the hawsers had been made fast bad weather sprung up, the wind blowing a hurricane. Next morning, the 3rd of November, the steel hawsers broke, the towage being continued with an ordinary rope. This rope also broke, and a fresh steel hawser and another rope were made fast. This steel hawser also broke, injuring an officer and a seaman of The Howick. The master of The Howick thereupon resolved to tow The Westbourne to Carthagena, signalling, in answer to a protest from the master of The Westbourne, that it was impossible to tow to Gibraltar. The Westbourne was accordingly towed to Carthagena.

The plaintiffs brought this action, claiming salvage apart from the agreement. The defendants paid £600, the agreed sum, into court.

Butt, J., found, on the advice of the Elder Brethren, that it was impossible, owing to wind and weather, to tow direct to Gibraltar, and held that, the agreement having been put an end to by supervening circumstances, he could award salvage apart from the agreement. He accordingly awarded £900.

The defendants appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and Raikes, for the defendants.—The agreement in this case was a salvage agreement, and supervening circumstances could not affect it. It is not like a towage agreement. The going to Carthagena was merely in substitution for Gibraltar in the agreement.

They referred to The True Blue, 2 W. Rob. 176; The Minnehaha, 9 W. R. 925, 15 Moo. P. C. 133; Lush. 335; The Betsy, 2 W. Rob. 167; The Waverley, L. R. 3 A. & E. 369, 20 W. R. Adm. Dig. 19.

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this was a towage agreement entered into while The Westbourne was in such danger that she might require salvage assistance, and in that sense might be called a towage agreement in the nature of salvage. The fulfilment of the agreement becoming more difficult by reason of supervening circumstances would not of itself enable the Court of Admiralty to alter it. It would be binding. But if, owing to circumstances over which the salvors had no control, the agreed service was so far altered as to become in reality a wholly different kind of service, or a service of a wholly different class, the Court of Admiralty would have a right to deal with the case as if the original agreement had not been made. If, therefore, new circumstances supervened to the extent I have described, the court would have authority to deal with the case as one of salvage pure and simple, and to award such a sum as, under all the circumstances, it might think proper. In the present case when the agreement was made the weather was only moderately bad. The Westbourne, however, was so damaged that though she could sail she could not steer. She could only, therefore, be placed in safety by being towed. An agreement was therefore made to tow her to Gibraltar. Whether that was a pure towage agreement, or a towage agreement partly in the nature of salvage, it was an agreement to tow direct to Gibraltar, and not by way of Carthagena or any other place. The contract having been made, the evidence as to the supervening circumstances conclusively supports the finding of the Trinity Brethren. After the ship had been taken in tow, without any fault or without any wrong manœuvre, the ropes broke, in consequence of the wind having increased to a hurricane. Owing to the increase of the weather the circumstances were wholly altered, so that the ship, which was not in imminent danger before, must have been placed in a position of imminent danger. The Howick was bound to stay by her, but the nature of the service was so altered that she would have to tow a ship in imminent danger with only one rope. It would have involved imminent danger to both vessels to tow to Gibraltar. She could not attempt to tow to Gibraltar with any safety. It had therefore become practically impossible to fulfil the contract. The service rendered was altogether altered. The Westbourne was in fact saved by the services of The Howick. The Court of Admiralty therefore had power to deal with the contract, and award salvage apart from it. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract was to tow The Westbourne to Gibraltar by the ordinary route, and not round by the coast. The finding of the learned judge, acting on the advice of his assessors, disposes of the case.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is, What was the contract between the parties? I am of opinion that it was to tow The Westbourne direct to Gibraltar. It may be that if The Westbourne had been towed round by the coast, her owners could not afterwards object that the contract had not been performed. There was this further element in the contract, that it was to be performed in a particular way, The Westbourne finding the roper. It was a contract for a particular kind of service to be performed upon the high seas and to be paid for in a particular way. The Westbourne was in a position of danger, but if circumstances supervened and rendered it impossible to carry out the contract, the contract would be at an end, and if the ship was then towed into a place of safety, the rules as to salvage services would apply. Here the judge found that it became impossible to perform the contract in the way in which it was to have been performed, and for which the payment was to be made. The weather had changed. Circumstances had supervened which rendered it practically impossible to perform the contract. The court was, therefore, quite right in dealing with the case as it did.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, H. C. Coote & Ball.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Bubb, & Johnson.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } Aug. 6, 1889.

In re Waters, Waters v. Boxer. (a.)

Will—Direction to set aside specific sums, with interest, together with simple interest, from specified dates—Time from which the interest payable.

A testator gave property to trustees upon trust after his wife's death to sell and retain two sums of £1,000, with interest, together with simple interest thereon at four per cent. from certain dates to the date of retainer, upon certain trusts. He empowered his trustees to postpone the sale of the real estate after his wife's death for any period not exceeding three years, and declared that the net rents and profits of such of his real estate as should not have been sold should be applied as the proceeds of sale would have been. After the widow's death in 1887 the real estate was not sold.

Held, that interest on the two sums of £1,000 was payable at four per cent. from the death of the widow.

Turner v. Buck, 22 W. R. 748, L. R. 18 Eq. 301, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, dated the 7th of March, 1882, Azariah Waters appointed his wife, Mary Ann Waters, sole executrix, and gave her all his personal estate, and he devised to her all his real estate for life, and after her decease he devised the real estate to trustees upon trust to sell and retain thereout two sums of £1,000, with interest thereon respectively, and to stand possessed thereof, together with simple interest thereon, at four per cent. per annum from certain dates up to the date of such retainer, upon certain trusts in favour of his daughters, and their child or children, as therein mentioned. And he empowered his trustees to postpone the sale of the whole or any part of his real estate for so long after the death of his wife as they should think proper, but not exceeding three years. And he declared that the net rents and profits of such of his said real estate as should not for the time being have been sold should be applied as the annual income of the proceeds of sale thereof would be applied if the same premises had been actually sold and the proceeds of sale invested under the trusts therein contained. The testator died on the 16th of February, 1885, and his will was proved on the 21st of April following.

Mary Ann Waters died on the 12th of December, 1887. The real estate was not sold, and in 1889 this summons was taken out by one of the trustees of the will to determine the question from what date interest became payable on the two sums of £1,000.

Martelli, for the plaintiffs.

Christopher James, for two of the defendants' legatees.

Dunning, for persons interested in the residue, cited Turner v. Buck, 22 W. R. 748, L. R. 18 Eq. 301.

Kay, J.—This is a primary charge on the proceeds of sale, and so a primary charge on the real estate. [His lordship stated the effect of the will, and continued:—] No doubt the testator's meaning was that from the time when these legacies became payable—that is, from the death of the tenant for life, the time when it became an actual charge on the real estate and was raisable—the rents of the real estate were to be applied as if the £1,000 had been raised and invested, and the income were payable to the tenant for life.

In the case of Turner v. Buck legacies were given from the death of the testator, and the will directed one year in which the realization should take place. The learned judge who decided that case applied the rule as to personal estate, and held that one year from the testator's death must be allowed to the trustees to give them time to realize, and that the legacies did not bear interest till a year from the death of the testator. This is an attempt to apply that decision, which, so far as I know, is quite unique, to this case, where the direction is to sell, not at the death of the testator, but after the death of the tenant for life, and to say that one year must be given to realize the estate of the tenant for life, and that the income is charged, not on the proceeds of sale, but on the residuary estate. I am of opinion that that is quite wrong. There is a discretion in the trustees to postpone the sale and a direction as to the income as if the sale had taken place. That is a distinct direction to pay the income out of the charge on the real estate.

I therefore hold that interest is payable at four per cent. on the two sums of £1,000 from the death of the tenant for life.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Martelli, for Burton & Son, Great Yarmouth.

Solicitors for the defendants, Whites & Co.

Solicitors for persons interested in the residue, Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael.

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Christie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. } July 30, 1889.
Chitty, J. }

In re SOVEREIGN LIFE ASSURANCE CO. (a.)

Life assurance company—Winding up—Policy-holders—Scheme of arrangement—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), ss. 2, 14.

Where annuities are secured by the guarantee, under seal, of a life assurance company, to trustees for the annuitants, such trustees are policy-holders within the meaning of sections 2 and 14 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870; and if a life assurance company has, under its deed of settlement, no power to sell or transfer its life assurance business, it cannot, under section 14 of that Act, enter into any arrangement for the sale or transfer of its life assurance business.

This was a petition for the compulsory winding up of the Sovereign Life Assurance Co., and a scheme for the transfer of part of the company's business to another company having been prepared by a large number of the policy-holders with the concurrence of the directors, an application was made asking the court to order the petition to stand over, and in the meantime to allow the directors to present a petition under section 14 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, for the sanction of the court to the scheme.

Objections were taken to the scheme, and two question were raised:—First, whether section 14 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, conferred upon a company power to transfer its life assurance business, notwithstanding the company's deed of settlement contained no such provision; and, secondly, whether the trustees with whom the Sovereign Life Assurance Co. had covenanted to guarantee certain annuitants were policy-holders within the meaning of section 2 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870.*

The company was incorporated in 1845 by a deed of settlement which contained no power for the sale or transfer of the company's business to another company, but a power was contained for a majority of two-thirds of the shareholders to alter, vary, and add to the provisions of the deed of settlement. It appeared at the hearing, that 80 per cent. of the shareholders were against any alteration being made in the deed of settlement for the purpose of inserting a power of sale or transfer.

Subsequently to 1862 the company was registered as a joint-stock company.

In 1865 the company acquired by purchase the business of the General Annuity Endowment Association, and by a deed dated the 22nd of June, 1866, certain funds were vested in trustees for the benefit of the annuitants of the association, and the company covenanted with the trustees to guarantee to them such amount, if any, as might be required to make good any deficiency in the said funds.

This petition was presented by a policy-holder in August, 1887, and after the appointment of a provisional liquidator the further hearing of the petition, with the consent of all parties interested, from time to time stood over in order to see if the disaster of a winding-up order could be averted. It appeared that the company's assets were valued at £235,000, and the liabilities at £460,000, the latter including a claim for £70,000 made against the company by the trustees for the annuitants of the General Annuity Endowment Association under the above-mentioned deed of the 22nd of June, 1866.

On the 11th of January, 1889, a committee of policy-holders was appointed to prepare, with the assistance of the provisional liquidator and actuaries, a scheme to save the company from being wound up. This scheme was completed in the middle of July, 1889, and it was thereby proposed to transfer the life assurance business of the company and all its assets to another life assurance company, and to provide that the policy-holders of the company should become policy-holders in the purchasing company without undergoing any further medical examination, and that the premiums payable by them should remain unaltered, but that the amounts of the policies should be reduced according to the age of the insured at the date of the transfer. No provision was made in the proposed scheme for the claims of the annuitants of the General Annuity Endowment Association.

The Sun Office was willing to negotiate with the company upon the footing of the above scheme, and the directors, at the request of the policy-holders, took out a summons for leave to present a petition under section 14 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, or to take such other steps as they might be advised for the purpose of endeavouring to carry out the proposed scheme of transfer, and that the costs, charges, and expenses of all such proceedings might be allowed and paid out of the estate of the company, and that they might also be indemnified against the costs of all parties appearing on this proposed petition. This summons was directed to be heard with the winding-up petition, and they came on together.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Boome, for the petition.

Latham, Q.C., and Whinney, for the directors.

Swinfen Eady, for the committee of policy-holders, contended that the annuitants of the General Annuity Endowment Association were not policy-holders within the meaning of that term in the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870.

Dauney, for the representatives of a deceased policy-holder, supported the application.

Maclean, Q.C., and Devonshire, for the trustees for the annuitants.

Sir Arthur Watson, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for eighty per cent. of the shareholders.

---

* The material parts of sections 2 and 14 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, are as follows:—Section 2.—"The term 'policy-holder' means the person who for the time being is the legal holder of the policy for securing the life assurance, endowment, annuity, or other contract with the company."

Section 14.—"Where it is intended to amalgamate two or more companies, or to transfer the life assurance business of one company to another, the directors of any one or more of such companies may apply to the court by petition to sanction the proposed arrangement, notice of such application being published in the Gazette, and the court, after hearing the directors and other persons whom it considers entitled to be heard upon the petition, may confirm the same if it is satisfied that no sufficient objection to the arrangement has been established." . . .

"The court shall not sanction, any amalgamation or transfer in any case in which it appears to the court that policy-holders representing one-tenth or more of the total amount assured in any company which it is proposed to amalgamate or in any company, the business of which it is proposed to tranfer, dissent from such amalgamation or transfer."

"No company shall amalgamate with another, or transfer its business to another, unless such amalgamation or transfer is confirmed by the court in accordance with this section."

"Provided always that this section shall not apply in any case in which the business of any company which is sought to be amalgamated or transferred does not comprise the business of life assurance."

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ribton, for another shareholder; and

J. Trustram, for a policy-holder, opposed the application.

Romer, Q.C., and Hull, for the provisional liquidator, referred to In re London and Southwark Insurance Corporation (Limited), 28 W. R. 565, and to In re Argus Life Assurance Co., 37 W. R. 215, 39 Ch. D. 571, and approved the application, but feared it would be difficult to work out.

Whitehorne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J., after stating the above-mentioned facts, continued as follows:—Numerous objections have been raised to the proposed scheme. The first is, that it is quite clear that section 14 is not an enabling section, and of itself confers no power on a life assurance company to transfer its life assurance business to another company. The scope of this section is, in fact, simply negative, and its operation is best seen by reading the paragraph towards the end which says, "No company shall amalgamate with another, or transfer its business to another, unless such amalgamation or transfer be confirmed by the court in accordance with this section." Now the position of the Sovereign Life Assurance Co. is this. It has, at the present moment, no power to transfer its assets to another company, though there is a provision in the deed of settlement enabling a majority of two-thirds of the shareholders to vary or add to the provisions of that deed; but eighty per cent. are adverse to the proposed scheme; what chance is there, then, that the two-thirds of the shareholders will agree to alter their deed of constitution so as to confer the power on the company itself of making this transfer. The chances are so small that I think that ground alone would be sufficient for me to dispose of the application.

But there are other objections which I will not pass by. The principal argument for the scheme proposed comes from the committee of policy-holders. The proposition embodied in the scheme is, putting it shortly, to transfer a portion only of the insurance business of the company to an existing company, the Sun Office. The 14th section is so framed as to show that what must be done under this section, where the power already exists in the company, is to transfer what the section itself terms "the business of life assurance," and Mr. Swinfen Eady was compelled to say that this would justify the transfer of a part of that business; he was compelled to say that because, if the term "policy-holder" in the section includes the annuitants claiming under the deed of June, 1866, it is plain that there would be a dissent exceeding the one-tenth which is sufficient, according to the subsequent part of this section, to prevent the court giving its sanction to this scheme. I do not propose to go through all the objections taken to the proposed scheme, some of which I have already dealt with in the course of the agreement with reference to the construction of this section. It will be sufficient for me now merely to state the short result of my conclusions. The term "policy-holder" is used in the body of the 14th section, and it is said that this term would not include the annuitants or the trustees under the deed of 1866. But the trustees have a covenant from the Sovereign Life Assurance Co. guaranteeing the amounts, if any, that are required to make good any deficiency in the fund. The fund that the trustees of this deed hold being insufficient for payment in full of the annuities at the present time, the trustees, by virtue of that guarantee, have a demand against the Sovereign Life Assurance Co., and that demand makes them, in my opinion, policy-holders within section 2 of the Act, which declares that "policy-holder" means "the person who for the time being is the legal holder of the policy for securing the life assurance, endowment, annuity, or other contract with the company." The trustees are the covenantees; they have the legal right to sue on the covenant, and the covenant is the contract for securing the annuities. That is sufficient, therefore, to show that the trustees are policy-holders within the 14th section, and then when the question of dissent of the one-tenth comes to be considered, their dissent, which is plainly expressed now, would be sufficient to prevent any order being made adverse to it. [His lordship then dealt with some other questions which do not call for a report, and made the winding-up order in the usual form.]

Solicitors, James Robinson; Witham, Lambert, & Roskell; R. C. Devonshire & Monkland; Hepburn, Son, & Cutliffe; Eardley-Holt, & Hulbert; Linklater & Co.; W. H. Mason & Son.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Oct. 30.

In re BARRATT.

WHITAKER v. BARRATT. (a.)

Administration action—Order for accounts—Executor—Trustee—Retainer—Set-off—Payment of debts—Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 15, r. 1; ord. 55, r. 10a.

An order for accounts under ord. 15, r. 1, without a decree for administration, made in an administration action, does not prevent a creditor of the estate from suing the executor, or the executor from paying a debt due from the estate.

Where, in a marriage settlement, a husband covenanted to pay to a trustee certain sums of money upon trust to pay the income to the wife for life, with an ultimate trust for himself absolutely, and died without performing his covenant, having appointed his wife sole executrix; and his creditors brought an administration action against the executrix and obtained an order for accounts under ord. 15, r. 1, without a decree for administration, and the executrix was afterwards appointed trustee of the marriage settlement, and the testator's estate proved insolvent,

Held, that the executrix, notwithstanding the order for accounts, was entitled to apply the assets in her hands as executrix in payment to herself as trustee of the debt due on the covenant in the marriage settlement.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture dated the 25th of August, 1884, and made between G. Barratt, the testator in the action, of the first part, S. J. Barratt, of the second part, and G. J. Tucker, of the third part, in consideration of the marriage which was solemnized on the 27th of September between G. Barratt and S. J. Barratt, G. Barratt covenanted with G. J. Tucker to pay him within three years of the marriage the sum of £300 upon trust during the joint lives of G. Barratt and S. J. Barratt, to pay the income to S. J. Barratt, and, after the death of either of them, to pay the income to the survivor, and after the death of the survivor, and in default of children of the marriage, upon trust for G. Barratt absolutely. And by another indenture, dated the 23rd of September, 1884, and made between the same parties in consideration of the same marriage, G. Barratt covenanted with G. J. Tucker to pay him within twelve months of the marriage the further sum of £4,000 upon the same trusts as were declared respecting the sum of £300.

G. Barratt died on the 6th of August, 1885, having by his will, dated the 23rd of October, 1884, given all his property to S. J. Barratt, and appointed her sole executrix; and his will was proved by her on the 13th of October, 1885. There were no children of the marriage.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought on the 28th of October, 1887, by creditors of the testator to the amount of £167 13s. 4d. against S. J. Barratt for administration of the testator's estate, and on the 20th of February, 1888, an order was made under ord. 15, r. 1, of the Rules of Court, 1883, for an account of the testator's personal estate not specifically bequeathed, and for an account of the testator's debts; and the judge not requiring any trial of the action other than that application it was ordered that the further consideration of the action be adjourned with liberty for all parties to apply.

By an indenture dated the 16th of March, 1889, the defendant S. J. Barratt was appointed trustee of the indentures of the 25th of August and the 23rd of September, 1884, in the place of G. J. Tucker.

The defendant brought in her accounts of receipts and payments on account of the testator's estate. From such accounts it appeared that the estate was insufficient for the payment in full of the debts and liabilities of the testator, and it further appeared that the defendant had received assets of the testator since his death amounting to £4,370 3s. 8d., and that, after deducting certain amounts, there remained a balance in her hands of £2,633 18s. 8d.

In the course of taking the accounts the defendant claimed that she had either under the general law regulating retainers by legal personal representatives, or by way of set-off under the conjoint operations of the 10th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, and the 38th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a right to retain this balance or some part thereof in or towards payment or satisfaction of the said sums of £300 and £4,000 or of the value of her life interest therein. The plaintiffs resisted this claim by the defendant, and the matter was ultimately adjourned into court for argument upon a statement of the material facts of the case.

F. Thompson, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant has no right of retainer. There was no debt due to her at law and she had no right to receive the £4,000: Cockroft v. Black, 2 P. Wms. 298; Loane v. Casey, 2 W. Bl. 965; Thompson v. Thompson, 9 Price, 464. Her appointment as trustee did not give her any new right because an order for accounts had been made: In re Compton, 33 W. R. 160, 30 Ch. D. 15; Jones v. Evans, 24 W. R. 778, 2 Ch. D. 420; Jones v. Jukes, 2 Ves. jun. 518. The mutual credit clause does not apply in this case as there were no mutual dealings, and the debts must be in the same right: 46 & 47 Vict. c. 52, s. 38; West v. Price, 2 Bing. 455.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and T. Ribton, for the defendant.—The widow is entitled to retain the whole amount: Cockroft v. Black; Loane v. Casey. If not she is entitled to retain the value of her equitable life interest: In re Compton. The order for accounts is not an administration decree so as to prevent creditors from suing and the defendant from paying: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 55, r. 10 (a); Marriott v. Thompson, Willes, 186; In re Mills, W. N., 1884, p. 21; Stedman v. Dunster, 35 W. R. 624, 34 Ch. D. 742. The widest interpretation ought to be given to the mutual credit clause: The Eberles Hotel and Restaurant Co. (Limited) v. Jonas & Bros., 35 W. R. 467, 18 Q. B. D. 459.

F. Thompson replied.

North, J.—There are two questions raised in this case—first, as to the widow's right of retainer, and, secondly, as to her right to pay herself. First, as to her right of retainer. It was said that the widow could have given a receipt for the money. I do not think she could. She was tenant for life of the fund, but, subject to that, it belonged to the testator's estate, of which she was executrix; but as executrix alone she could not call for it. As tenant for life of the fund she could not call for it. If she had chosen to release her life interest she, as executrix, might have given a receipt for the fund, but in that case she would have deprived herself of the benefit she claims. She cannot say that the whole fund so belonged to her as to give her a right of retainer. Secondly, she is trustee of the whole fund, and claims the right to pay herself. She is not beneficially entitled except to a life interest under the settlement. She was, however, appointed trustee of the fund at a date subsequent to the making of the order of the 20th of February, 1888. Before the order she could have paid the trustee, and the order does not prevent her doing so, as it did not put an end to her powers. The order for accounts does not prevent a creditor from suing her as executrix, or prevent her from paying a debt, and this view is supported by ord. 45, r. 10 (a) of the Rules of Court, 1883. The case of Jones v. Jukes is not in point, as there was a decree directing the usual accounts and a distribution. The order does not therefore prevent her from applying the assets in paying the debts due on the covenants in the settlements.

Solicitors, Kemble & Co.; Agate & Garnett.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Aug. 3, 1889.

In re Bithray. (a.)

Judgment creditor—Petition for sale of interest in land—Dispensing with inquiries—Judgment Law Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), ss. 4, 5.

Upon a petition by a judgment creditor who had obtained equitable execution by the appointment of a receiver, an order was made, without directing inquiries, for the immediate sale of the debtor's interest in land which was subject to a legal mortgage, there being evidence that the mortgagee (who consented to the sale) had not received any notice of any incumbrance on the land; that searches had been made by the petitioner's solicitor, who had found that no execution or other process affecting the land had been registered, except the order appointing the receiver, and that no bankruptcy petition had been presented or receiving order made against the debtor.

Petition.

This was a petition by a judgment creditor for the sale of his debtor's interest in land. The petitioner had obtained an order for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of the debtor's land, without prejudice to the rights of prior incumbrancers.

The land was subject to a legal mortgage, and the mortgagee consented to the sale. The order appointing the receiver had been registered in compliance with the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888. The petitioner adduced evidence that the mortgagee had not received notice of any incumbrance affecting the land and that searches had been made by the petitioner's solicitor, who had found that no execution, order, or other process affecting the judgment debtor or his estates had been registered except the order appointing the receiver and that no bankruptcy petition had been presented or receiving order in bankruptcy made against him.

Welby King, for the petitioner, asked that an immediate order for sale might be made without any preliminary inquiries, and referred to In re Calne Railway Co., L. R. 9 Eq. 658, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 116, and In re Cooper, 37 W. R. 330.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

North, J.—I think I can dispense with inquiries in this case. The difficulty I at first felt was that the 5th section of the Judgments Law Amendment Act, 1864, says: "If it shall appear on making such inquiries that any other debt due on any judgment . . . is a charge on such land, the creditor entitled to the benefit of that charge shall be served with notice of the said order for sale." It might not unreasonably be said that that section necessarily involved the making of inquiries. But as inquiries have been dispensed with in the case of railway companies, I think I can dispense with them in the present case, since I do not find that the Act has made any distinction between railway and other companies. On the evidence before me I will, therefore, make an order for immediate sale dispensing with inquiries.

Solicitor, G. Gardner Leader.

Chan. Div. North, J. } July 22, 1889.

In re Prytherch.
Prytherch v. Williams. (a.)

Mortgagor and mortgagee—Legal mortgagee in possession—Appointment of receiver—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 8.

A legal mortgagee who has once gone into possession of the mortgaged property cannot afterwards go out of possession, nor is he entitled, as of right, to have a receiver appointed.

Mason v. Westoby, 34 W. R. 498, 32 Ch. D. 206, discussed.

Action.

This action was brought by a person who was entitled to a share of the real estate of a testator against the trustees of his will, a solicitor named Bishop, and other persons.

The testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust to permit his wife to receive the income thereof during her life, and after her death upon trust thereout and out of the moneys to arise out of his real estate (which he charged for this purpose in aid of the residue of his personal estate, if insufficient) to pay to his younger children a legacy of £14,000, in equal shares, to be absolutely vested at twenty-one, with a clause of accruer in the event of the death of any such child under twenty-one. The plaintiff alleged that the trustees had raised by legal mortgages of the testator's real estate sums largely in excess of the amount which they were entitled to raise by mortgage. The mortgages had been transferred to the defendant Bishop, and he was in possession. The plaintiff claimed (inter alia) an inquiry what amount the trustees were entitled to raise and a declaration that Bishop was not entitled to rank as a mortgagee in respect of the excess. He also asked that the accounts might be taken on the footing of the above declaration, and that Bishop might be charged as a mortgagee in possession. The plaintiff also claimed to redeem the mortgage.

Bishop delivered a counter-claim, by which he claimed an account of what was due to him under the mortgages, and, in default of payment, foreclosure or sale. He also claimed the appointment of a receiver.

One of the questions raised during the hearing of the action was whether Bishop, having gone into possession, could go out of possession again, and whether he could obtain the appointment of a receiver.

Everitt, Q.C., and E. Ford, for Bishop, asked that a receiver might be appointed, and referred to Mason v. Westoby, 34 W. R. 498, 32 Ch. D. 206.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and C. Walker, for the plaintiff, opposed the appointment of a receiver.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and O. Leigh Clare, Upjohn, and Waggett, for other parties.

North, J.—I am not aware of any right of a mortgagee who has taken possession to give up possession again whenever he pleases. A mortgagee has a right to take possession at any time, but, in my opinion, when a mortgagee takes upon himself the burden which is imposed on a mortgagee in possession, he cannot give it up whenever he pleases. I feel sure that if any such right existed, some case on the point, or some passage in a text-book, would have been found. Nothing of the kind has, however, been found. It is said, however, that the mortgagee is entitled to have a receiver appointed. I cannot see that a mortgagee who is in possession is entitled to have a person appointed to assist him. I can understand that a mortgagee who is not in that position may have such a right. No doubt, under sub-section 8 of section 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, a legal mortgagee can now obtain the appointment of a receiver if he makes out a proper case.

Sub-section 8 provides:—[His lordship read sub-section 8 of section 25, and continued:—] The court, no doubt, has the same power at the trial of the action as it would have upon an interlocutory application. But the words of sub-section 8 are "may" be appointed in all cases in which it shall appear "just or convenient." Will it be "just or convenient" in the present case? If there should happen to be a foreclosure, the costs of the receiver will be paid out of the rents, but if the mortgagor redeems he will have to pay them. I can see no reason why the mortgagor should have to bear the costs of a receiver. I think I have a discretion in the matter.

In Mason v. Westoby there was, no doubt, some reason why it was "just or convenient" to appoint a receiver, but I cannot treat that case as an authority that the word "may," in sub-section 8, is to be read "must." I do not think it will be "just or convenient" in the present case to appoint a receiver at the expense of the persons entitled to the equity of redemption. As, however, the persons interested in the equity of redemption do not object, I will appoint the mortgagee himself receiver without salary and without security.

Solicitors, Berkeley & Calcott; Burton, Yeates, & Co.; Crowdy, Son, & Tarry; Clarke, Rawlins, & Co.

Chan. Div. North, J. } April 8, 1889.

Ex parte School Board of London. (a.)

Copyholds — Tenancy in tail — Enfranchisement — Barring the entail.

A tenant in tail of land (forming part of a copyhold manor in which there was a custom to entail) died, having by his will devised his real estate to trustees upon certain trusts, under which his only daughter (who was his heiress in tail) was beneficially entitled to such real estate. The trustees were admitted tenants of the copyhold land upon the trusts of the will, and in 1876 the lord of the manor executed an enfranchisement to the trustees upon the trusts of the will, and the trustees shortly afterwards executed a conveyance to the testator's daughter in fee. The enfranchisement was not made under the Copyhold Acts.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the effect of the enfranchisement and the conveyance was to bar the estate tail in the copyholds.

Challoner v. Murhall, 2 Ves. 524, followed.

Petition.

On the 5th of August, 1887, the School Board for London gave Andrew Hart notice, pursuant to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to treat for the purchase of certain hereditaments in Stoke Newington which the board were authorized to take under the Elementary Education Act, 1870. These lands were formerly copyhold of the manor of Stoke Newington, but at the date of the notice they had been enfranchised, and Hart claimed to be entitled to them in fee simple.

The board refused to accept Hart's title, and paid the purchase-money (amounting to £1,771) into court.

The title shown to the property was as follows:—

On the 27th of May, 1802, Sarah Ann Cotton was admitted tenant to the land, and immediately thereupon she surrendered the same to the use of herself for life, with remainder to the use of her children as she should by deed or will appoint, with remainder in default of such appointment to the use of her first and other sons successively in tail, with remainders over. Sarah Ann Cotton died without having exercised the power of appointment, and William Charles Cotton (who was the only son and heir in tail of her eldest son, T. D. Cotton, deceased) was on the 21st of November, 1843, admitted tenant according to the custom of the manor. W. C. Cotton died on the 20th of June, 1860, having by his will, dated the 10th of January, 1860, devised all the real estate to J. Holme and W. Tattersall, their heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts.

On the 12th of February, 1863, J. Holme and W. Tattersall were admitted tenants to the copyhold hereditaments, to hold the same unto them, their heirs and assigns, upon the trusts of the will. By a deed dated the 10th of July, 1876, the lord of the manor of Stoke Newington granted and enfranchised the said hereditaments unto and to the use of J. Holme and W. Tattersall, their heirs and assigns, to be holden in free and common socage, discharged of the copyhold tenure and all the incidents thereof. W. C. Cotton left an only child—viz., Elizabeth Maria Procter (the wife of Gilbert Procter)—and she became, under the trusts of her father's will, beneficially entitled to all the real estate which passed by the devise contained therein.

By an indenture dated the 21st of September, 1876, and made between J. Holme and W. Tattersall of the first part, Mr. and Mrs. Procter of the second part, and H. A. Gregg of the third part, wherein it was recited that the aforesaid enfranchisement was made by J. Holme and W. Tattersall at the request of Gilbert Procter and Elizabeth Maria, his wife, and the consideration moneys paid out of their moneys, J. Holme and W. Tattersall conveyed the hereditaments to Gregg and his heirs to the use of Elizabeth Maria Procter, her heirs and assigns.

Andrew Hart claimed to have acquired title through Elizabeth Maria Procter, and the board did not dispute that, if the effect of the enfranchisement and the deed of 21st of September, 1876, was to vest the hereditaments in Elizabeth Maria Procter in fee simple, Hart acquired such fee simple through her. Hart contended that E. M. Procter, as the only child of W. C. Cotton, became entitled on his death to be admitted to the said copyhold hereditaments as his heiress in tail, and that although she was never admitted thereto, yet the effect of the enfranchisement and the conveyance of the 21st of September, 1876, was to bar the entail in the land, and to make E. M. Procter absolute owner of it in fee simple as of freehold tenure. The school board disputed the above contention.

On the 27th of December, 1888, the school board paid the purchase-money into court, and executed a deed-poll, under the provisions of section 77 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, vesting the land in themselves absolutely in fee simple in possession free from incumbrances.

Hart now presented this petition for the payment out to him of the £1,771 purchase-money in court.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dauney, for the petitioner.—The petitioner is entitled to the purchase-money in court by virtue of the enfranchisement deed and the subsequent conveyance of the 21st of September, 1876. It is now well settled that an estate tail in copyholds is barred by an enfranchisement deed: Challoner v. Murhall, 2 Ves. 523; Wilson v. Allen, 1 Jac. & W. 611.

P. V. Smith, for the school board.—This is not the case of enfranchisement under the Copyhold Acts. In order to bar the entail something active is required on the part of the tenant in tail: Margaret Podger's case, 9 Rep. 104a, 106b. The case of Challoner v. Murhall goes too far, for if it is correct an estate for life would be capable of being defeated by an enfranchisement. With the exception of that case and Dunn v. Green, 3 P. Wms. 8, the authorities are against the petitioner.

He referred to Parker v. Turner, 1 Vern. 392; Taylor v. Shaw, Cases in Reports, 22; Bernard v. Simpson, Clayton, 138; and Wynne v. Cookes, 1 Bro. C. C. 515.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—Whatever the case might be, if the person taking the enfranchisement had been tenant for life, I think it is clear that the effect of an enfranchisement is to bar a tenancy in tail. It seems to me that the cases of Challoner v. Murhall and Dunn v. Green are clear authorities on the point, especially as they agree with the statement as to the law in Scriven on Copyholds, 4th ed., p. 558, and Watkins on Copyholds, and the only doubt which has been thrown upon it is in the notes by Mr. Coventry to Watkins on Copyholds, 4th ed., pp. 236, 438. Mr. Coventry was a conveyancer, and his remarks are more particularly addressed to conveyancing matters, and I cannot, on the strength of the doubt expressed by him, decline to follow Challoner v. Murhall and Dunn v. Green. The former case appears to me to decide the actual point now before me, and I, therefore, hold that the enfranchisement barred the entail.

Solicitors, W. Beck; Gedge, Kirby, & Millett.

Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, and Day, JJ.) July 22, 1889.

DUBOUT & CO. v. MACPHERSON. (a.)

Practice—Third party—Procedure—Service of notice out of jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (e); ord. 16, r. 48.

A third-party notice may be served out of the jurisdiction in any action founded on a breach, committed within the jurisdiction, of a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless such third party is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland.

This was an application for leave to serve a third-party notice on one Boisduval, residing in France.

The defendant, who made the application, claimed an indemnity against Boisduval in respect of a portion of the liability alleged to have been incurred by the former as acceptor of two bills of exchange payable in London upon which the plaintiff sued as indorsee.

(a.) Reported by G. K. PALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wills, J., at chambers, doubting whether he had power to give leave to serve such a notice out of the jurisdiction, referred the question to the court.

J. E. Raven, for the defendant, relied on Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan, 1 Q. B. D. 644, 24 W. R. Dig. 205, and distinguished the cases of Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., 32 W. R. 670, 13 Q. B. D. 96, and In re Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123.

A. L. SMITH, J.—Primâ facie the rules are applicable only to persons within the jurisdiction, and the question is whether there is anything in those relating to third-party notices which specially permits of service upon persons out of the jurisdiction. This question arose in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan under the rules of 1875, and the Court of Appeal there held that the provision in ord. 16, r. 18, of those rules, to the effect that such a notice should be served "according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summons," empowered the court to allow service of such a notice out of the jurisdiction. That provision, as to the service of third-party notices, is reproduced in terms in ord. 16, r. 48, of the rules of 1883. The third party in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan was a company carrying on business in Scotland, but there was no exception in the rules of 1875 to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction in favour of persons ordinarily resident in Scotland corresponding to that which is to be found in the rules of 1883.

A similar point arose after the rules of 1883 came into force in the case of Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co., where leave was sought to serve a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction on a person ordinarily resident in Scotland, on the suggested ground that he was a "proper party" to the action within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (g). The court there held that they had no power to give such leave, and that sub-section (g) of that rule did not apply to third-party notices. That decision is not in any way in conflict with the decision in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan, and is no authority against the present application. Nor is the case of In re Busfield any authority against it. It was there decided that the court cannot order service of an originating summons out of the jurisdiction, and with that decision I quite agree, because there is no rule applicable to the service of an originating summons corresponding to the provision as to the service of third-party notices in ord. 16, r. 48.

The principle, then, of the Swansea case still applies, and the effect of the decision in that case, when read along with ord. 11, r. 1 (o), amounts to this, that wherever the action is founded on a breach, within the jurisdiction, of a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, the court may allow service of a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction, unless the third party is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland.

The application must be granted, but the case must go back to Wills, J., to ascertain whether there was, in fact, a contract of indemnity, and whether, consequently, a third-party notice should issue at all.

DAY, J., concurred.

Application granted.

Solicitor for the defendant, C. J. Cole.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) July 2, 1889.

WALKER v. HOBBS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 72), s. 12—House unfit for habitation—Breach of implied condition—Damages.

A tenant residing in premises which came under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, was injured by the fall of a ceiling.

Held, that he was entitled to sue the landlord for damages for breach of the implied condition that the premises were reasonably fit for habitation as provided for by section 12 of the Act (48 & 49 Vict. c. 72).

Appeal from the county court of Lambeth.

The plaintiffs were tenants of the defendant in a block of buildings provided for the working classes in Bermondsey. At the time of the letting some plaster had fallen from the ceiling in the plaintiffs' room, and the ceiling had been repaired by the landlord. Shortly afterwards a second fall of plaster took place, and finally a third fall took place, which injured the female plaintiff.

The plaintiffs sued the landlord upon three grounds—(1) for breach of warranty that the ceiling was sound; (2) for wrongfully leaving the ceiling in an unsafe condition; and (3) under section 12 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, for breach of the implied condition that the premises were reasonably fit for human habitation.

The county court judge nonsuited the plaintiffs upon the first two grounds, but upon the third left the question to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiffs, with £50 damages.

The defendant appealed.

A. Clavell Salter, for the appellant.—The only question is whether the defendant is liable under section 12 of 48 & 49 Vict. c. 72. The words are, "In any contract for letting for habitation by persons of the working classes a house or part of a house, there shall be implied a condition that the house is, at the commencement of the holding, in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation." That simply makes the tenant's promise to pay rent conditional upon the premises being habitable; it creates no new promise on the part of the landlord. At common law there is no implied covenant on the part of the landlord that the premises are reasonably fit for human habitation or occupation: Hart v. Windsor, 12 M. & W. 61, and the landlord is not liable to his tenant for any injury arising from the condition of the premises. To imply a new duty on the part of the landlord is to alter the law in a way which was never intended. Further, the Act is purely a sanitary Act, and does not refer to matters of general repair. This is shewn by section 5, which speaks of "premises in a condition or state dangerous to health, so as to be unfit for human habitation."

Lambert, for the plaintiffs, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The learned county court judge was perfectly right in his construction of this Act. The facts of this case are, shortly, that the plaintiffs went into these rooms as tenants. The ceilings were in a ruinous and dangerous condition, and fell down and seriously injured the female plaintiff. It is admitted that the ceilings were in a dangerous condition, and therefore that the rooms were not, speaking in a broad sense, fit for human habitation.

The question is, whether this action will lie—that is, whether the landlord is liable to an action for damages under section 12 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 72). That section provides that, "in any contract made after the passing of the Act for letting for habitation by persons of the working classes a house or part of a house, there shall be implied a condition that the house is in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation." It is admitted that this part of a house was not reasonably fit for habitation, and that the condition was not fulfilled. It is contended by the defendant that the word "condition" in this Act is to be construed according to the strict common law meaning of the term, and that it only means that the tenant may, at his option, repudiate the contract of tenancy if the condition is not fulfilled; but that it does not imply any promise by the landlord to the tenant. The term "condition" might have that limited meaning in some Acts, but it would be utterly irrational so to construe it in this Act. The object of the Act was to provide the working classes with reasonably fit and proper dwellings, and therefore to bind the landlords to provide such dwellings. It would not afford much protection to the tenant if his only remedy was to give up his tenancy and turn out after he had been injured by the improper condition of the dwelling. The reasonable interpretation of the Act is that it imports a promise by the landlord to the tenant that the dwelling is reasonably fit for habitation, upon which promise, if it is broken, the tenant can sue.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The judge was quite right in leaving it to the jury to say whether the dwelling was reasonably fit for habitation, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion. The term "condition" in this section does not mean simply a condition precedent affecting the whole consideration for the contract of tenancy; but even if it did, it would, in my opinion, upon the most technical construction, imply a promise by the landlord to the tenant.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Worsfold.

Solicitors for the defendant, Bonner, Wright, Thompson, & Co.

Q. B. Div. (Denman and Charles, JJ.) June 24, 1889.

Lowden v. Blakey. (a.)

Practice—Production of documents for inspection—Privileged communication.

L. brought an action of libel against B. in respect of an advertisement in a newspaper containing an account of certain chancery proceedings in which B. had successfully sued L. and others for infringement of his rights in a trade-mark. In an affidavit by B. mention was made of a draft advertisement prepared by him and settled by counsel before the publication complained of.

Held, that L. was not entitled to an order for the production of the draft advertisement for inspection.

Minet v. Morgan, 21 W. R. 467, L. R. 8 Ch. 361, followed.

Appeal from an order of a master referred by Wills, J., at chambers to the court.

In an action brought in the Chancery Division by the present defendant against the present plaintiff and others to restrain an infringement of his rights in certain trade-marks, Chitty, J., granted an injunction, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The present defendant, considering that the injunction had been disobeyed, caused an advertisement of the proceedings in the chancery action and the decision therein to be published in a trade journal. The present plaintiff then brought this action, in which he complained of the advertisement as being a libel.

A summons having been taken out to restrain the continued publication of the advertisement, an affidavit was made by the defendant, in which he said that he had himself prepared a draft advertisement which had been settled by the counsel who appeared for him in the chancery action, the form in which it was so settled being that in which it was published in the journal.

The plaintiff then took out a summons under ord. 31, r. 18, asking that the draft advertisement might be produced for inspection. The master made an order for production, but Wills, J., on appeal, referred the matter to the court.

The defendant appealed.

Rosenthal, for the defendant.—The draft advertisement is privileged from production, having been originally drawn by the defendant in reference to the chancery action, and for the purpose of being submitted to his legal adviser. The definition of "privileged communication" laid down in Minet v. Morgan, 21 W. R. 467, L. R. 8 Ch. 361, includes documents prepared and used ante litem motam.

He also cited Pearse v. Pearse, 1 De G. & Sm. 12, and Manser v. Dix, 3 W. R. 313, 1 K. & J. 451.

Cracroft, for the plaintiff.—There is no good objection to this application for discovery. The case of Wheeler v. Le Marchant, 17 Ch. D. 675, 29 W. R. Dig. 72, shows that professional privilege is of a very limited character, and is restricted to the obtaining the assistance of lawyers as regards the conduct of litigation or the rights of property: see judgment of Jessel, M.R. This draft does not come within that rule, for it was prepared, not for the purpose of submitting to counsel, but for the purposes of publication.

He referred to ord. 31, rr. 15—18.

Denman, J.—I am of opinion that this order ought not to have been made. The defendant brought an action against certain persons, including the plaintiff, for infringement of his rights in a trade-mark, and succeeded in obtaining an injunction. He thought he had reason to complain of the plaintiff's conduct, and, after the action was concluded, he consulted his counsel as to the extent of his success. I assume that the defendant had it in his mind that any publication about the litigation might be dangerous if it stated anything with the least incorrectness. I assume also that he had a valid and honest complaint against the plaintiff, because he was successful. That being the state of things, he drafted an advertisement and sent it to his counsel, in order that he might see whether the statements were accurate. This draft advertisement, or something like it, was subsequently published. There is no doubt that the defendant so acted partly with a view of preventing some sale by the plaintiff of goods with the trade-mark in question. I am not sure that this was not privileged as being a communication with regard to the rights of property, within the limited definition of privilege laid down by Jessel, M.R., in Wheeler v. Le Marchant, but I prefer to rely on the general and broad words used by Kindersley, V.C., in Lawrence v. Campbell, 7 W. R. 33[illegible], 4 Drew. 485, and approved of in Minet v. Morgan. I think it was a confidential communication to counsel for the purpose of obtaining his advice, and that it was privileged, although it did not relate to existing litigation.

As to the rules, I do not think they apply to this case. The effect of a notice under ord. 31, r. 15, is that a document, if not produced, cannot be given in evidence at the trial. But it is not suggested that the defendant could himself give this draft in evidence.

I think the appeal must be allowed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this case is governed by Minet v. Morgan.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, A. V. Green.

Solicitor for the defendant, Ernest Salaman.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Oct. 30; Nov. 12.

In re Frisby.

Allison v. Frisby. (a.)

Statutes of Limitations—Principal and surety—Joint and several covenant to pay mortgage debt—Co-contractor—Payment of interest within period of limitation by mortgagor—Surety's liability, whether kept alive—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, ss. 3, 5—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

If section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act 1874, applies at all to actions brought against one who, covenanting expressly as surety, has, jointly and severally with a mortgagor, covenanted for payment of the mortgage debt, then payments made by the principal debtor keep alive the remedy against the surety.

Decision of Kay, J. (37 W. R. 603), affirmed.

Whether section 8 does apply at all to actions brought against a surety on such a covenant, quære.

Per Cotton, L.J.—The section does so apply.

Per Bowen, L.J.—It does not apply.

Appeal from Kay, J.

By a deed, dated December 10, 1872, Edward Frisby covenanted to surrender copyhold property to Mary Ann Scotney to secure £800. The deed contained the following covenant to pay the mortgage-money:—"And they, the said Edward Frisby and Matthew Frisby (as surety for the said Edward Frisby), do and each of them doth hereby for himself and themselves, and each of their heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said Mary Ann Scotney, her heirs, executors, and administrators, in manner following (that is to say), that they, the said Edward Frisby and Matthew Frisby, their heirs, executors, or administrators, shall and will, on the 10th day of June next, well and truly pay or cause to be paid, unto the said Mary Ann Scotney, her executors, administrators, or assigns, the aforesaid sum of £800 of lawful money aforesaid, with interest thereon at the rate of £4 5s. per cent. per annum, to be computed from the day of the date of these presents without any deduction or abatement whatsoever." The proviso for redemption was on payment by Edward Frisby (the mortgagor), his heirs, executors, or administrators. He duly paid the interest up to December, 1880. There was no express covenant to pay interest after the 10th of June, 1873, in case the principal or part of it remained unpaid. On the 21st of November, 1882, the mortgaged estate was taken in execution by debt under a judgment obtained by a prior mortgagee. In January, 1889, a judgment was obtained against the mortgagor for the mortgage-money due under the present mortgage, but he had not the means of satisfying it. In 1888 Matthew Frisby, the surety, died, and this claim for principal and interest was made in April of the present year by the mortgagee's executrix against Matthew Frisby's estate upon his several covenant. The executrix took out an originating summons (afterwards adjourned into court), asking for a declaration that she was entitled to rank as a creditor against Matthew Frisby's estate for £800 and interest since December 10, 1880, and an order for the administration of his estate if his executor did not admit assets.

The question was whether, Matthew Frisby having paid nothing under his covenant, his liability had not now ceased by virtue of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. The last-mentioned section is as follows:—"In reference to the provisions of the Acts of the twenty-first year of the reign of King James the First, chapter sixteen, section three, and of the Act of the third and fourth years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter forty-two, section three, and of the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of the reign of her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and thirteen, section twenty, when there shall be two or more co-contractors or co-debtors, whether bound or liable jointly only or jointly and severally, or executors or administrators of any contractor, no such co-contractor or co-debtor, executor or administrator, shall lose the benefit of the said enactments or any of them, so as to be chargeable in respect or by reason only of payment of any principal, interest, or other money, by any other or others of such co-contractors or co-debtors, executors or administrators."

Section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, is as follows:—"No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon, or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto, or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought, but within twelve years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one, was given." The case is reported below, 37 W. R. 603.

Kay, J., held that section 8 did not operate to bar the remedy of the mortgagee against the surety, but only against the mortgagor, and that even if he were wrong in that, the payment of interest by the mortgagor kept alive the surety's liability; also that section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act only applied to the enactments expressly mentioned in it.

Matthew Frisby's executor appealed.

Marten, Q.C., and H. Percival, for the appellant.—The case comes within the very words of section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. [Bowen, L.J.—It is not the same sum of money that the mortgagor and surety here covenanted to pay; but only an equivalent sum.] It was the same sum—that is, it was not the sum advanced, but "the aforesaid sum of £800," mentioned just previously in the proviso for redemption. On the construction of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, the payment must have been made by the person himself who is to be bound thereby. It would be hard that payment by another should keep up the liability. In In re Powers, Lindsell v. Phillips, 30 Ch. D. 291, 34 W. R. Dig. 108, payment by the mortgagor was held sufficient on the peculiar form of the bond in that case. Here there is only a simple covenant for payment by two persons. The argument as to there being two different debts would apply just as well if there were only one covenantor, there being the debt on the covenant, and that charged on the land. But it is really the same debt—it could not be demanded twice over.

(a.) Reported by R. H. Deane, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511; Fearnside v. Flint, 31 W. R. 318, 22 Ch. D. 579; Cockrill v. Sparkes, 11 W. R. 428, 1 H. & C. 699; Chinnery v. Evans, 11 H. L. Cas. 115, 12 W. R. H. L. Dig. 7; and Dickenson v. Teasdale, 1 De G. J. & S. 52, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 55.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Townsend, for the respondent.—Sutton v. Sutton merely decides that as between mortgagor and mortgagee the remedy on covenant is barred in twelve years. That does not affect the present case, which is one of surety. There was nothing on the face of the mortgage to show that this was only a third mortgage, as was the case. The second mortgage was for £4,000 and interest to one Perkins, who took possession in November, 1882. The twelve years had not expired when he was put into possession. Section 42 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, provides that where prior mortgagees are in possession subsequent incumbrancers may recover arrears of interest accrued due during such possession if they bring their actions within a year of the prior mortgagees going out of possession. So that, as regards the interest, time never has run at all. Here, as there was no express covenant to pay interest after the six months, "damages in respect of" arrears of interest are payable, and the section specifies and applies to such. [FRY, L.J.—But the proviso at the end of the section does not.] The damages are commensurate with the rate of interest. The debts are not the same debts where one covenanting party covenants on behalf of the other. The debt of the principal is for a sum secured on the land; but the debt of the surety is only in the event of default by the principal. "In fact, the one debt is not a part of the other—they are different debts": In re Powers, 30 Ch. D., at p. 295. As to damages in respect of interest, Goodchap v. Roberts, 28 W. R. 870, 14 Ch. D. 49, is in point. There, as here, there was no covenant for payment of interest after the day named for repayment of the principal. Here one of the covenantors is described on the face of the document as a surety. A surety only joins to indemnify. Our claim is that he shall indemnify us, the principal debtor having made default. Even if section 8 would otherwise apply to the case of a surety, it is qualified by the latter part of the section relating to the person by whom the payment must be made—i.e., "the person by whom the same shall be payable." The Mercantile Law Amendment Act does not help the appellant at all, as section 14 does not apply to the Real Property Limitation Act of 1833, nor to that of 1874. Here the mortgagor has paid, so that the liability of the surety never arose.

Marten, Q.C., in reply. [COTTON, L.J.—Does the Act of 1874 apply except where the action is brought against the person liable on the mortgage; and if it does, does not payment by the mortgagor take the case out of the statute?]—There are many cases where the surety is discharged without the principal being discharged. This case cannot be distinguished from Sutton v. Sutton. The surety ought not to be in a worse position than the principal debtor. The words "by whom the same shall be payable," in section 8, include the surety. That payment must have been made by some person against whom the action is brought. [COTTON, L.J.—Was not the chief object of the Act to prevent a personal liability remaining when there was no charge left on the land?]

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 12.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., deciding that section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, has no operation in barring the remedy of a mortgagee against a surety who, with the mortgagor, has entered into a joint and several covenant to pay the mortgage debt and interest, and that, even if it had such operation, payment of interest by the mortgagor would keep alive the mortgagee's remedy against the surety. This court has already decided in the case of Sutton v. Sutton that section 8 applies not only to actions brought to enforce a mortgage against the land subject to it, but also to personal actions on covenants contained in a mortgage of land. It has been argued that the section only applies to an action brought against the person who has given the security, but I fail to find any such limitation expressed or implied in the words of the Act, and that being so, the court has now no right to put such a construction upon it. It is true that at a time when there were two Acts in force, one of which related to actions for the recovery of land, and the other to personal actions, a decision was given (Hunter v. Nockolds, 1 Mac. & G. 640) which was not in accordance with what this court has decided upon the present Act. But in my opinion it would not be reasonable to hold that that Act only applies to the person who has given the mortgage when another person has made himself liable for the debt. Then it was contended on the other side that the remedy is not kept alive against the surety when a payment has been made by the principal debtor within the period of limitation. But in my opinion the remedy is kept alive by such a payment, because the section says nothing as to the person by whom the payment is to be made. If the surety is to get the benefit of the section where no payment has been made, I think it is only reasonable to suppose that he was intended to bear the burden of the exception where payment has been made within the period of limitation. In my opinion it would be unreasonable to hold that the action is covered by the section, and yet that the clause relating to payment in the meanwhile does not apply when the action is brought, not against the mortgagor, who has paid, but against the surety, who has not. It has been already held that the 14th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which section expressly refers to special Acts, of which the Real Property Limitation Act of 1874 is not one, does not apply to that Act. There seem to be no cases which exactly cover the point in dispute, but the case of Chinnery v. Evans, though it is not exactly in point, tends in some degree to confirm the view which I have expressed. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, though I have come to it on somewhat different grounds. I should myself have concurred with Kay, J., not only in the result at which he arrived, but also in the reasons which he assigned for arriving at it. In my opinion, section 8 was only intended to apply to actions brought against the mortgagor, but if I am wrong in that, and the section does apply to actions against a surety, then I am of opinion that payments made by the principal debtor have the effect of keeping alive the remedy against the surety.

FRY, L.J.—Whether section 8 does or does not apply, I must express my concurrence in the conclusion arrived at by my learned brethren. If the section does not apply, cadit quæstio. If it does apply, the question we have to consider is under what circumstances and by what person must payment be made in order to prevent the right of action from being barred. The words are, "unless in the meantime some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid." In my opinion, a payment satisfying those words is made whenever there is a render of money to a person entitled to receive it by any person liable to pay it. I quite agree that a voluntary payment by a stranger who is under no liability to pay, will not be sufficient to satisfy the terms of the section. But, on the other hand, if the words are to be confined to payments made by the person sought to be charged, I think it would lead to great injustice; because, to take the common case, where there is a surety, as here, for the mortgagor, if payments of interest, as is usually the case, are made punctually by the mortgagor himself, it would, in my opinion, be contrary both to good sense and to the ordinary understanding as to the nature and effect of these arrangements, if it were held that the remedy against the surety was not kept alive by those payments, but that in order to keep it alive, part of the payments must be made by the surety, though the mortgagor is able and willing to pay the whole.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Clarke, Rawlins, & Co., for Percival & Son, Peterborough; Beaumont, Son, & Rigden, for Maurice Brown, Peterborough.

From Chan. Div. Oct. 28.

In re COMBINED WEIGHING AND ADVERTISING MACHINE CO. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Garnishee — "Creditor" — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 82, sub-section (2)—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 45, r. 2.

A person who has obtained a garnishee order against a company as garnishee, is not thereby constituted a creditor of the company, and, therefore, cannot present a petition, as a creditor, to wind up the company.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

This was a petition to wind up the above-mentioned company. The petitioner had recovered judgment for £57 against one Wright, to whom the company were indebted in the sum of £38. The petitioner subsequently obtained a garnishee order absolute directing the company to pay to him £38, and in default that execution should issue against the company for the same. The petitioner issued execution against the company, and the sheriff made a return of nulla bona. He thereupon presented this present petition to wind up the company.

The petition was heard by North, J., on the 1st of June, when his lordship held that the petitioner was not an assignee of the debt, and was not a creditor of the company within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862. The petitioner appealed from that decision.

Eve, for the appellant.—The petitioner is entitled to present a petition under section 80, sub-section (2), of the Companies Act, 1862. The fact that the petitioner obtained the garnishee order showed that he is entitled to be placed in the position of creditor of the company. The effect of garnishee proceedings was not to confer a new right, but to declare a pre-existing right. But even if the petitioner were not entitled under sub-section (2) of section 80 the evidence is sufficient to show that the company is insolvent. [COTTON, L.J.—Then are you a creditor within section 82 of the Act?]

He cited Ex parte Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342; Chatterton v. Watney, 29 W. R. 373, 573, 16 Ch. D. 378, 17 Ch. D. 259; Ex parte Moore, 33 W. R. 438, 14 Q. B. D. 627; Ex parte Blanchette, 34 W. R. 538, 17 Q. B. D. 303.

Firminger, for the company, cited In re Connan, 20 Q. B. D. 690, 36 W. R. Dig. 16.

Geo. White, for shareholders, cited Butler v. Wearing, 17 Q. B. D. 182, 34 W. R. Dig. 17; Wood v. Dunn, 14 W. R. 84, L. R. 1 Q. B. 77, 15 W. R. 180, L. R. 2 Q. B. 23; Ex parte Baylis, L. R. 2 Eq. 521, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 62.

COTTON, L.J.—From the way in which this case was opened to us, we thought it turned on the question whether the petitioner had a case under section 80, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act, 1862. That, however, is not the point we have really to consider. The question is not only whether the petitioner has made out a case for winding up the company, which I very much doubt, but whether he is a person entitled to present a petition. The latter point turns upon the construction of section 82. The appellant says: "I am entitled to present a petition; I am not a contributory, but I am a creditor." Is he a creditor? He is no creditor of the company except in so far as the garnishee order which he obtained, made him so. Mr. Wright owed him money for which he obtained a judgment. Having done that, he attached a debt due from the company to Wright, and the order has been made absolute. What does a garnishee order do? It is not an assignment of the debt due by the garnishee to the debtor of the garnishor, it merely gives the garnishor a lien upon that debt. That was laid down by Sir George Jessel, M.R., confirming the view taken by myself in the case of Chatterton v. Watney, 17 Ch. D. 262, where he says, "I quite agree with the view of Cotton, L.J., that a garnishee order does not operate as a transfer of the debt." Transfer does not necessarily mean absolute transfer, but a transfer of the debt by way of assignment, security, or otherwise. In this case, even if there were a transfer or assignment of the debt so as to constitute the petitioner an assignee either in law or equity of this debt so that he could claim to be a creditor under section 82, and entitled to present a petition, we should still have to consider the question whether he had made out a case for winding up this company. But on the ground that he is not entitled to present the petition, I think it unnecessary to go into the case on the merits. I am of opinion that this gentleman is not in any way a creditor of the company, and not in any way one of the persons entitled to present a petition.

I ought to refer to the question whether this is an equitable assignment of the debt. Of course if there had been an order by the person to whom the debt was owing to pay to the petitioner that would have been a good equitable assignment. But in my opinion a mere order in the nature of a garnishee order made by a competent authority attaching the fund, and enabling the person who has obtained the order to give a good discharge for it, is not an equitable assignment. The petitioner, therefore, cannot under the doctrine of equitable assignment claim to be a creditor in this case.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The real point is whether the appellant is a creditor within section 82 of the Companies Act, 1862. I think, in all probability, having regard to the language of the preceding section, that a creditor under section 82 includes a creditor in equity as well as in law. It is not necessary to decide it; I believe the point has been expressly left undecided in a previous case, and I desire to keep it open, but I should think it would include a creditor in equity. In any case I cannot see that this statutory position (which was created originally by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and has been perpetuated by the rules under the Judicature Act)—namely, the relation which exists between a judgment creditor and the garnishee—is a position which involves the relation of debtor and creditor. There cannot be said to be any equitable debt. There is no assignment in equity, and I cannot see that there is any legal debt. There is an order of a court of common law that the original debt shall be paid by the garnishee to the judgment creditor, or as an alternative that execution may issue; but I think that the relation which is created by that section, and the orders made under it, does not create a debt at all; it creates an attachment of the debt, or of a portion of the debt, and in case of non-payment confers the right of issuing execution, and nothing more. One must remember that these winding-up sections cannot be extended lightly or loosely, because they relate to procedure in the nature of execution against the company, and involve considerable results against property.

(a.) Reported by L. S. BRISTOWE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The 2nd rule of order 45 of the Rules of Court provides that the service of the garnishee order on the garnishee "shall bind such debts in his hands." The question, I take it, is what is the meaning of the words "bind such debts in his hands"? Now it has been argued that it amounts to a transfer of the debt. It is remarkable if that were the meaning of the words that those words were not used, and that the order does not say "transfer" the debt. But, further than that, the whole scheme of the order is inconsistent with its being a transfer, and in fact the question has been settled by the court. It is plain, to my mind, that there is no transfer of the debt. It is equally plain, to my mind, that the garnishee order does not make the garnishor a creditor of the garnishee. What the order does is this: it gives the garnishor certain statutory rights. It enables the garnishor to say to the garnishee, "You shall not pay the money which you owe to your creditor. I can give a valid receipt for it." It enables him, in the event of the money not being paid, to obtain execution. He has all these rights, but there is no transfer of the debt, and he is not created a creditor. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

White.—Will your lordships give the shareholders any costs? We were not served, but we appeared in the court below.

COTTON, L.J.—No, we cannot give you any costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Norris, Allens, & Chapman; Perkins & Sawyer.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 6.

HOLTBY v. HODGSON.
BATESON (Garnishee). (a.)

Husband and wife—Married woman—Judgment debt—Garnishee order—Separate property—Entry of judgment—Relation back—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 41, r. 3; ord. 45, r. 1—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1.

The plaintiff, in 1887, recovered judgment against the defendant, a married woman, in the form laid down in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. On July 23*rd,* 1889, the defendant obtained a verdict for £150 against a third person for malicious prosecution, and the judge at the trial gave judgment, but judgment was not entered till October. On July 31*st,* 1889, the plaintiff, whose judgment remained unsatisfied, obtained an order attaching the £150 to answer his judgment.

Held, affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, that the order was rightly made, as the plaintiff had obtained a "judgment" against the defendant within the meaning of ord. 45, r. 1, and the £150 was a "debt owing" to the defendant within that order.

Held also, that, by ord. 41, r. 3, the judgment, when entered, related back to the day on which it was pronounced, and that, therefore, there was a debt at the date of the garnishee proceedings.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

In 1887 the plaintiff recovered judgment for a sum of money against the defendant, a married woman, in default of appearance, the judgment being in the form laid down in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.*

On July 23rd, 1889, the defendant obtained a verdict for £150 against Bateson, the garnishee, for malicious prosecution, and the judge at the trial gave judgment for this amount. Judgment, however, was not entered until October, 1889.

On July 31st, 1889, upon the application of the plaintiff, whose judgment remained unsatisfied, the master made an order attaching the £150 to answer his judgment. Upon appeal the judge referred the matter to the court.

The court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.) affirmed the order.

The defendant appealed.

Crump, Q.C., and Cyril Dodd, for the defendant.—The judgment against the defendant was not a personal judgment; it was only a judgment against her separate estate, and therefore did not constitute a "judgment" and the plaintiff was not made a judgment creditor within ord. 45, r. 1. It created only a "proprietary liability": per Bowen, L.J., in Scott v. Morley. [They referred to Chapman v. Biggs, 11 Q. B. D. 27, 31 W. R. Dig. 8; In re Gardiner, 36 W. R. 142, 20 Q. B. D. 249.] Secondly, the £150 cannot be attached. Section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, makes this sum her separate property. It does not make it a "debt" due to her. It is not therefore attachable within ord. 45, r. 1, as that order only refers to "debts owing or accruing." Thirdly, there was no "debt" due to the defendant in respect of the £150 until judgment was signed. Therefore there was no debt at the time when the garnishee order was made. [LOPES, L.J., referred to ord. 41, r. 3.] That applies to actions tried without juries; rule 4 applies to cases tri e with juries. [They also contended that, as they coul prove that the defendant had no separate property at the date of the contract in respect of which the plaintiff obtained judgment against her, the decision in Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 761, 19 Q. B. D. 519, applied, and the defendant was not liable on the judgment. The COURT, however, said that the judgment was conclusive, and could not be reopened, the defendant having allowed judgment to go by default.]

T. Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The first objection taken in this case is that the plaintiff has not obtained such a judgment against the defendant, a married woman, as comes within ord. 45, r. 1, so as to entitle him to obtain a garnishee order. The ground of this contention is that the judgment is not a personal judgment against the married woman, but merely a judgment against her separate estate. The judgment was in the form laid down in Scott v. Morley. It was a judgment obtained by default, and it followed the writ, which was framed so as to obtain a judgment in the form laid down in that case. By the judgment the plaintiff was to recover a certain sum and costs to be taxed, such sum and costs to be payable out of her separate property and not otherwise, and execution to be limited to her separate property not subject to any restriction against anticipation. The married woman is only liable on certain conditions, all those conditions being stated in the writ. Allowing judgment to go by default was an admission that all those conditions existed. That being so, the judgment was against her, though execution could only issue against her separate property. Such a judgment comes within ord. 45, r. 1. The judgment was for the payment of money, and the judgment debtor was liable under the judgment, though the money could only be realised in a particular way. All conditions existed which entitled the plaintiff to an attachment order, the married woman being "a debtor liable under the judgment." A phrase of Bowen, L.J., in Scott v. Morley was relied upon—viz., that section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, only subjected the married woman to a "proprietary liability." That was only a short way of saying that the judgment must be realized out of her property, and that she could not be made liable to any personal consequences, such as bankruptcy proceedings or attachment under the Debtors Act, 1869.

* The form in Scott v. Morley is as follows:—"It is adjudged that the plaintiff do recover £ and costs (to be taxed) against the defendant (the married woman), such sum and costs to be payable out of her separate property, as hereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise. And it is ordered that execution hereon be limited to the separate property of the defendant (the married woman) not subject to any restriction against anticipation, unless, by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property shall be liable to execution notwithstanding such restriction."

It was then said that the married woman had not obtained a judgment against a third person so as to make her a judgment creditor, but that it was only a judgment which gave her something as her separate property, and that, therefore, there was no "debt owing or accruing" to her. She has, however, a judgment, and the judgment debtor, the present garnishee, owes her the money. It is a play upon words to say that she has not obtained a judgment within the meaning of ord. 45, r. 1.

The last point taken was that there was no debt at the time the garnishee proceedings were taken, inasmuch as the judgment for £150 had not then been signed. The law before the Judicature Act was that the verdict was entered by the officer of the court at Nisi Prius. The Nisi Prius record was then made up. Upon that record the costs were taxed and the allocatur given. Judgment was then signed upon the allocatur. Under the Judicature Act there might be judgment without a verdict, as in the old chancery courts. Therefore in such a case there was no occasion for a Nisi Prius record, and so, to assimilate the procedure throughout, the Nisi Prius record was abolished. The judge at the trial has the power to pronounce judgment according to the verdict. The officer enters the verdict and gives his certificate. Judgment has then to be signed or entered. That brings me to ord. 41, r. 3, which provides that "where any judgment is pronounced by the court or a judge in court, the entry of the judgment shall be dated as of the day on which such judgment is pronounced, unless the court or judge shall otherwise order, and the judgment shall take effect from that date." The judgment becomes effective from the day on which it is pronounced in court by the judge at the trial. It was argued that that only applied to a judgment pronounced in a case tried without a jury, and that rule 4 applied to a case tried with a jury. There is, however, nothing to support that contention. Therefore this judgment took effect from the day on which it was pronounced in court. Accordingly there was a judgment in existence at the time when the application for the garnishee order was made. I agree with the judgment of the Divisional Court, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised in this case is whether a judgment for a sum of money recovered by a married woman can be attached. I feel no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it can. The order dealing with attachment of debts is order 45. The applicant must prove that he has obtained a judgment, and that the judgment is unsatisfied. He must show that someone within the jurisdiction owes money to the judgment debtor. Thereupon he gets a garnishee order attaching the debt. It is first said that a judgment against a married woman is not such a judgment as can be made the foundation for garnishee proceedings, on the ground that it does not bind her personally, but only binds her separate estate. The judgment, however, is that the plaintiff do recover against the married woman a certain sum and costs, such sum and costs to be realisable out of her separate estate and not otherwise. The judgment is against her, and if her husband were to die the judgment would bind her, and execution could issue against her property in the ordinary way. The judgment, as long as she is married, is not to be executed in every way, but only against her separate property not subject to a restriction against anticipation. It is a mistake, therefore, to say that the judgment is not against her. It is true that she cannot be made bankrupt under it, or imprisoned under the Debtors Act, but it does not follow that it is not a judgment against her within ord. 45, r. 1.

The next point is that the judgment for £150 which the married woman has recovered cannot be attached as a "debt." I fail to see any ground for this contention. The judgment constitutes a debt due to her. The fact that it is part of her separate estate does not prevent it being attached. It seems to me to come within the words of ord. 45, r. 1. The last point is that the attachment was premature because no judgment for £150 had then been entered. I do not propose to add to what the Master of the Rolls has said upon this point. The words of ord. 45, r. 1, seem to me to dispose of this contention.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The conditions precedent to a debt being attachable are that it must be a debt owing by the garnishee, and it must be a debt which the judgment debtor can compel payment of when he wishes. In the present case there was a debt owing by the garnishee which the judgment debtor of the garnishor could enforce payment of. That being so, there was an attachable debt within ord. 45, r. 1. With regard to the judgment against the married woman, it is a judgment against a married woman enforceable only against her separate property. There can be no personal remedy against her under the Debtors Act, nor can the judgment be made the foundation of bankruptcy proceedings against her. Those are the only distinctions between a judgment against a married woman payable out of her separate property not subject to a restriction against anticipation and a judgment against an unmarried woman. It was then said that there was no attachable debt until final judgment was signed. It seems to me that ord. 41, r. 3, is a complete answer to that point.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Emmet, Son, & Stubbs.

Solicitors for the defendant, Clinton & Buckby.

From Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. July 8, 1889.

"THE VINDOMORA." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Duty of vessel in fog.

There is no rule of navigation that a vessel is not to alter her helm in a fog.

Appeal from the decision of Butt, J., holding The

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, first, that the £50 constituted the fruits of the action, and that W. was entitled to a lien upon it for his costs.

Held, secondly, that the defendant's solicitors were liable to pay the £50, or so much thereof as would satisfy the lien, to W.

Held, thirdly, that the plaintiff was also liable, but not the defendant, who had received no notice of the lien.

Motion.

This was a motion on behalf of E. T. Ratcliff, the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of E. J. Ward, formerly the solicitor to the plaintiff in this action, for an order that it might be referred to the taxing master to tax Ward's bill of costs against the plaintiff in this action, and to ascertain the balance due to Ratcliff as such trustee in respect of such costs and the amount of the lien or charge of Ward, or Ratcliff in his right, for the same over the sum of £56 paid to the plaintiff in compromise of the action, and that, upon such balance being ascertained, the plaintiff, the defendant, and Messrs. Clapham & Fitch, the defendant's solicitors, might pay to Ratcliff the sum of £56, or such less sum as should be sufficient to satisfy the lien. The writ in the action was issued on the 15th of July, 1887, claiming specific performance of an agreement for a lease, damages for breach of the agreement, and an injunction.

On the 29th of July, 1887, the statement of claim was delivered, and the claim was to the same effect as set forth in the writ.

On the 3rd of December, 1887, the defendant put in a defence and counter-claim. The defendant, by his defence, denied liability, and paid into court £50 in satisfaction of all damages, if any, to which the plaintiff might be entitled.

By the counter-claim the defendant sought to recover from the plaintiff a quarter of the year's rent of the premises and damages for alleged breaches of the agreement by the plaintiff.

On the 12th of January, 1888, on the motion of the plaintiff, an ex parte injunction was granted, and on the 28th of the same month a reply was delivered.

On the 24th of February, 1888, the ex parte injunction was dissolved, and an inquiry was directed as to the damages caused by the injunction, the defendant having liberty to apply for payment of his costs of that application in case the action should not be further proceeded with.

On the 22nd of March, 1888, notice of trial was given.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, dated the 3rd of November, 1888, certified the sum of £40 6s. 9d. to be the damages sustained by the defendant in consequence of the injunction, and that was subsequently confirmed by the judge.

At the time the action was brought Ward was solicitor for the plaintiff, but on the 25th of January, 1888, the plaintiff appointed Messrs. Boxall & Boxall to act as his solicitors instead of Ward.

On the 18th of May, 1888, another change took place, and the firm of Messrs. Ward & Rees, of which Ward was a member, became solicitors for the plaintiff.

Towards the end of October and at the beginning of November, 1888, negotiations took place between the defendant and his solicitors and the plaintiff, which resulted in the following agreement, dated the 2nd of November, 1888:—"It is agreed that this action shall be settled on the following terms: Plaintiff to receive the £50 paid into court in full discharge of all claims by him. Defendant to do whatever may be necessary to enable the plaintiff to obtain payment out of court of the £50. Each party to pay his own costs of the action." That agreement was signed by Ross as plaintiff in person and by Messrs. Clapham & Fitch, the defendant's solicitors. At the date of this agreement the plaintiff was impecunious. There was no evidence to show that this compromise was entered into to deprive the plaintiff's solicitor of his costs, and the applicant did not complain of the compromise, but of what took place afterwards. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff called at the office of Messrs. Clapham & Fitch on the 3rd of November, 1888, for the purpose of carrying out the terms which had been arranged. Mr. Fitch then told the plaintiff that he should go to his own solicitor and instruct him to carry out the terms. The plaintiff declined to do so, and Mr. Fitch then told him that he could either appoint other solicitors to act for him in the action or file a notice of appearance in person. The plaintiff adopted the latter course, and signed a notice of intention to appear in person which was served upon E. J. Ward, the firm of Ward & Rees having apparently then ceased to exist.

Ward, after having received this notice on the 9th of November, 1888, wrote to Messrs. Clapham & Fitch as follows:—"As I have received a notice from Mr. Ross that he intends to act in person in this action, I shall be glad to know if you have arrived at a settlement with him in the matter, and I give you notice not to pay him any money until my costs in the action have been paid." To that letter he received no reply, and then he wrote to the plaintiff in the action complaining of the notice and of the neglect to pay his costs. No notice was given by Ward to the defendant.

On the 10th of November, 1888, Messrs. Clapham & Fitch obtained payment to themselves out of court of the £50, and on the 13th of November they paid it over to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was also paid by the defendant an additional sum of £6 to recoup him for certain payments which he had made in respect of the house, the subject of the action. These two sums of £50 and £6 made up the £56 mentioned in the notice of motion.

C. Johnston Edwards, for the applicant.—Notice was given by Ward to Messrs. Clapham & Fitch of his lien before they paid this money over to the plaintiff. The evidence shows that there was collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant's solicitors to deprive Ward of his costs. The applicant is therefore entitled to have his lien satisfied out of the money so paid over.

He referred to Welsh v. Hole, 1 Doug. 237; Ormerod v. Tate, 1 East, 464; White v. Pearce, 7 Hare, 276; Ex parte Bryant, 1 Madd. 49: Slater v. Mayor, &c., of Sunderland, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 9; The Hope, 8 P. D. 144, 31 W. R. Dig. 50.

Pearson, Q.C., and Beddall, for the defendant and his solicitors.—The cases cited on behalf of the applicant are distinguishable. In each case there was a judgment or verdict. There is nothing in the present case equivalent to either, nor has any collusion been proved.

They referred to Nelson v. Wilson, 6 Bing. 568; Ex parte Hart, In re Tovery v. Payne, 1 B. & Ad. 660; Quested v. Callis, 10 M. & W. 18; In re Sullivan v. Pearson, Ex parte Morrison, L. R. 4 Q. B. 153, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 5; Brunsdon v. Allard, 7 W. R. 581, 2 E. & E. 19.

Haldenstein, for the plaintiff.

Edwards, in reply.—The £50 paid to the defendant in compromise of the action was property recovered or preserved by the solicitor: Twynam v. Porter, 19 W. R. 151, L. R. 11 Eq. 181; Townsend v. Reade, 4 L. J. N. S. Ch. 233.

April 17.—STIRLING, J. [after stating the facts, and holding that the £6 was not part of the money mentioned in the compromise, but an additional sum, and therefore distinct from the £50, continued:—].—Upon these facts, I think the £50 was handed to the plaintiff as the result of the action, and constituted the fruits of it. Now the question is, what is the law with reference to this case? and, first of all, does a solicitor's lien for his costs attach to money received by way of compromise? It has been repeatedly held that it does. Thus, in Davies v. Lowndes, 3 C. B. 808, 823, there was a writ of right, which came on for trial at bar on the 17th of December, 1846, when, by consent of counsel for the respective parties, a verdict was taken, and judgment thereupon entered up for the tenant, the tenant by the like consent entering into a rule for payment to Mr. G. W. F. Cook, the demandant's attorney on the record, of the sum of £5,000 within a month. A rule had been obtained on behalf of Henry Clarke, one of the former attorneys in the action, calling upon the demandant and the tenant respectively to show cause why it should not be referred to one of the masters to ascertain the amount of the lien, if any, of Clarke upon the sum of £5,000 agreed by the rule of court of the 17th of December, 1846, to be paid by the tenant to Cook, the demandant's then attorney, for the compromise of the action, and why the tenant, or his attorneys, should not pay to Clarke the amount of such lien when so ascertained. Upon cause being shown, the court made the rule absolute, and ordered that such a sum should be paid into court to abide the taxation of Clarke's bill as should be sufficient to pay him. Wilde, C.J., said, "We feel no doubt that Clarke's lien attaches upon the fund in question, and we think it is not extinguished by the taking of securities that have turned out to be worthless." Again, in the case of Slater v. Mayor of Sunderland, 33 L. J. Q. B. 37, this had happened. At the trial of the action a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for £100, subject to a point reserved. Then negotiations were entered into, and it was agreed between the defendants and the plaintiff by their respective attorneys that the action should be compromised, the point reserved given up, and that the £100 should be taken for debts and costs. Then the plaintiff, having equitably assigned the £100 to another person, the plaintiff's solicitor gave notice of his lien to the defendants' solicitor, and required the £100 to be paid to him. The defendants thereupon refrained from paying the money to anyone, but were ready and willing to pay the money as the court should order; and Crompton, J., in giving judgment, says, "The rule is, I think, that the court will not interfere to set aside any arrangement which has been come to between the plaintiff and the defendant, in favour of the attorney, except where there has been fraud or collusion between the parties. That is decided in Brunsdon v. Allard." Then he goes on to say, "Ormerod v. Tate goes to the length that, after the defendant has had notice of the plaintiff's attorney's lien, the court will make him pay the money over again. I certainly could not go contrary to that case without great consideration. But here there is no attempt to interfere with any arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendants. I cannot refrain from acting upon the doctrine that, where no attempt is made to interfere with a compromise arranged between the plaintiff and the defendant, the court may lay hold of the fruits of the judgment for the benefit of the attorney." Then he refers to Davies v. Lowndes, and points out the distinction between that case and the cases which fall under the rule of Brunsdon v. Allard. In both those cases to which I have referred the fund was still in medio when the order was made, but the cases appear to me to go further than that.

I will next refer to the case of White v. Pearce. That was a suit for foreclosure, and at the hearing an order was made for payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of principal, interest, and costs within six months' after the master's report; and by consent, in default of such payment, that the mortgaged estate should be sold with the approbation of the master, and the purchase-money paid into court. Default was made, and the particulars and conditions of sale were carried in and approved by the master, and the sale appointed and advertised to take place on the 2nd of June, 1849. The solicitor of the plaintiff, having reason to suppose that an intention to compromise the suit was entertained by the plaintiff and defendant, gave notice to the defendant, and also to his solicitors, of his claim, as solicitor for the plaintiff in the cause, for the costs of the suit. The plaintiff and the solicitors of the defendant, acting on behalf of the latter, afterwards agreed to settle the mortgage debt and the suit for a sum of £300, to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, £200 of which was then paid, and £100 retained in the hands of the defendant's solicitors, and the sale was countermanded. The solicitor for the plaintiff by petition prayed that the plaintiff or the defendant might be ordered to pay the petitioner his costs out of any moneys paid, or to be paid, to the plaintiff in respect of the debt and costs, the subject of the suit; and if it should appear that the defendant's solicitors had received from, or on behalf of, the defendant any moneys in respect of the amount of the debt and costs for the purpose of settling the plaintiff's claim, that the defendant's solicitors might be ordered to pay the petitioner his costs thereout, so far as such moneys would extend. The Vice-Chancellor says this:—"The petitioner has undoubtedly a lien for his costs upon whatever has been received or paid for compromising the suit. The court does not, however, allow the lien to stand in the way of an amicable arrangement. There is nothing improper in the compromise; but if the defendant, not being under any pressure, except that which was the consequence of the decree, pays the debt of the plaintiff, with notice of his solicitor's lien, the question then is whether the payment is or not made by the defendant in his own wrong. In Welsh v. Hole Lord Mansfield puts the case of the assignment of a chose in action, which in legal strictness is not effectual, but still he says, as against the right of the assignee, the debtor, after notice, could not in equity discharge himself by a payment to the principal. The present is certainly not a weaker case. The defendant was asked to pay the money to the petitioner, and notice was given to him of the petitioner's lien for the costs of the suit. The estate would have been sold, and the money paid into court, if it had not been for this agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The agreement come to appears to be a very proper one, and I have no doubt that it was made bonâ fide, but I think the defendant, in the circumstances of the case, has paid the money in his own wrong, and that the petitioner has a right to proceed either against the plaintiff or defendant."

Now that is a very strong case, and it decides two things—first, that where money is received or paid as a compromise of a suit, and that money is in truth and in substance the fruit of the action, the solicitor's lien for costs extends to that; and further, upon the authority of the case of Welsh v. Hole, before Lord Mansfield, that if a valid compromise is made, and after the compromise has been made the solicitor gives notice that he has a lien for costs, it will be at the defendant's own peril if in the face of that notice he pays the money over which has been agreed to be paid to the plaintiff by way of compromise.

Now the authority cited by the Vice-Chancellor in that case is Welsh v. Hole; but that is not the only case which exists on the subject. Another and very remarkable case is that of Read v. Dupper, 6 T. R. 361. There the principal cause of action, which was for business done by the plaintiff for the defendant, was agreed to be referred to the master, who awarded a certain sum to be paid to the plaintiff, together with costs. The plaintiff afterwards threatened to take the defendant in execution unless the money due to him was immediately paid; whereupon the defendant's attorney, after a notice from the plaintiff's attorneys not to pay it to the plaintiff himself, because their bill was not satisfied, paid the whole sum to the plaintiff himself. In consequence of that the plaintiff's attorneys obtained a rule calling on the defendant's attorney to show cause why it should not be referred to the master to see what lien the plaintiff's attorneys had upon the debt and costs recovered in the action as against the plaintiff himself, and why the defendant's attorney should not pay over that sum to the plaintiff's attorneys. Lord Kenyon says this: "The principle by which this application is to be decided was settled long ago—namely, that the party should not run away with the fruits of the cause without satisfying the legal demands of his attorney, by whose industry, and in many instances at whose expense, those fruits are obtained. If, indeed, the money had been paid over bonâ fide to the plaintiff before notice from his attorney of his lien, such payment would have been good; but here the payment was made in violation of the notice, which cannot be suffered." And then he refers to the case, which the Vice-Chancellor cited, of Welsh v. Hole, before Lord Mansfield. The rule, which was for payment by the defendant's attorney, was made absolute. Again, in the case of Ormerod v. Tate, the cause being at issue at the York Spring Assizes, 1800, the parties entered into bonds to refer it to arbitration, and the arbitrator awarded the defendant to pay the plaintiff £26 by two instalments—£10 on the 24th of May, 1800, and the remaining £16 on a certain future day. On the 16th of May the plaintiff's attorney, having been informed that the parties intended to settle the matter between themselves for the purpose of ousting him from his lien for costs, served the defendant with notice to pay the amount of the damages and costs to him, and not to settle the same with the plaintiff or any other person, as he had a lien upon the damages for his fees, &c.; notwithstanding which the defendant, on demand of the first instalment by the plaintiff's attorney when it became due, refused to pay it to him, but paid it over to the plaintiff himself. Thereupon a rule was applied for and obtained, and Lord Kenyon said: "The convenience, good sense, and justice of the thing require that an attorney should have the same lien on damages awarded as if they were recovered by the judgment of the court in the ordinary course of the cause. The public have an interest that it should be so; for otherwise no attorney will be forward to advise a reference. As to the right of the plaintiff to release any of the damages, it is out of the question here; for this appears to be no other than a mere shuffle between the plaintiff and the defendant to cheat the attorney of his lien."

Now it was said that those cases had been overruled or questioned; but I cannot find any ground for coming to that conclusion. Certainly none of the cases to which I have referred are inconsistent with those two which were chiefly relied upon by the respondents upon this application—namely, Ex parte Morrison and The Hope. In fact, the cases divide themselves into two classes. In the last case, of The Hope, Lindley, L.J., referred to a passage in Chitty's Archbold's Practice as correctly stating the law upon the subject. I will refer to that first. It is there stated (14th ed., p. 164) that the solicitor's lien is merely, in truth, a claim for the equitable interference of the court on behalf of the solicitor, and then follows this passage:—"The court will exercise this equitable interference where the solicitor has given the opposite party, or his solicitor, notice of his lien, and that he claims the amount payable to his client, to be paid to him in the first instance; in which case the opposite party will, at his peril, pay the client or release the claim, or compromise it without the assent of the solicitor." In support of that proposition the cases to which I have referred are cited, and they appear to me to bear out the principle which is laid down in the text-book. That is the first class of cases. Then with regard to the other class of cases he says:—"So the court will exercise it, though no such notice"—that is, of his lien—"has been given, in cases where it is clearly made out that there has been some collusion or fraudulent conspiracy between the parties to cheat the solicitor of his costs. But, unless such notice has been given, or there has been such collusion or fraudulent conspiracy, the client, although he sues in formâ pauperis, may compromise with the other party, and give him a release, without the intervention of his solicitor; and the solicitor, in such a case, can afterwards look to him only for payment, and cannot proceed in the action." There is one sentence more which I ought to read, because it seems at first sight to point in the respondent's favour. "Even after such notice, the parties may, it seems, compromise before verdict or judgment without regard to the solicitor's claim for costs." But that is not to be understood, I think, as in any manner inconsistent with the prior part of the paragraph. It means, as I read it, simply this—and that is the law as I take it— that a bonâ fide compromise entered into before verdict or judgment, and even after notice of the solicitor's claim for costs, is good, and will not be set aside or affected at the instance of the solicitor, unless collusion or fraudulent conspiracy exists between the parties.

The cases of Ex parte Morrison and The Hope are authorities that the compromise of the 2nd of November is valid, and they would also be authorities that if the money had been paid over on the 3rd of November, before Ward gave notice of his claim, the court could not interfere. But they do not seem to me to conflict with this proposition, that where a valid compromise has been entered into under which a sum of money, the fruit of the action, is coming to the plaintiff, the defendant or his solicitor is not at liberty, after express notice by the plaintiff's solicitor of his claim to a lien, to pay that sum over to the plaintiff in disregard of the notice. That being the law, how do the facts stand here? In the first place, is the sum of £50, which is the subject-matter of the agreement of the 2nd of November, to be treated as the fruits of the action? It seems to me it must be. It was plainly paid under pressure of the action in order to settle it. It was a fund which was paid into court, and which, in the ordinary course, could not have been got out without notice to the plaintiff's solicitor had it not been for the notice which was given of the plaintiff appearing in person. Then, secondly, was notice given of the plaintiff's solicitor's claim for costs? It plainly was given to Messrs. Clapham & Fitch. They had distinct notice of it on the 9th of November, and after that they got the fund into their own hands and paid the fund over to the plaintiff in disregard of the notice. Accordingly, I think, subject to one further remark, that an order against them ought to go. I do not, however, upon the materials before me, see that the defendant Buxton is liable. No notice is shown to have been given to him, and the fund did not come into his hands; neither did he, as I think, authorize his own solicitors to receive payment of the money and hand it over to the plaintiff. All that he agreed to do was to do what was necessary to enable the plaintiff to obtain payment out of court of the £50. That payment out of court could not have been obtained without an order of the court. But it was not necessary for the purpose of getting it out of court that an application should be made either by the defendant or his solicitors. It might have been made by the plaintiff, and all the defendant would have had to do would have been to consent. I do not see, therefore, that the money came into the hands of the defendant or that he had notice given to him, and therefore I think there should be no order made against him.

Only one remark remains to be made, and that is that the solicitors on the record were Messrs. Ward & Rees, and not Ward alone. I have no explanation before me at the present moment as to how Mr. Rees ceased to have an interest in the fund; that defect must be supplied, or else Mr. Rees must in some way be made a party to the application. The plaintiff, who has received the fund, is liable as well as Messrs. Clapham & Fitch.

Johnston Edwards.—I will produce evidence that Rees handed over his interest in the fund to Ward.

Solicitors, E. T. Ratcliff; Clapham & Fitch; J. E. Coxwell.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } April 2, 3, 1889.

HARRIS v. TUBB. (a.)

Leaseholds—Assignment—Consideration—Vendor's lien.

An assignment of leaseholds in consideration of natural love and affection is not voluntary.

Leaseholds, on which there was a vendor's lien, were assigned by the purchaser to his son in consideration of natural love and affection. The son had no notice of the vendor's lien.

Held, following Price v. Jenkins, 5 Ch. D. 619, 25 W. R. Dig. 253, that there was sufficient consideration in the assignment to make the son a purchaser for value instead of a volunteer, and, therefore, that the vendor's lien did not hold against the son as assignee of the leaseholds.

Trial of action.

One William Tubb was, at the date of the indenture next hereinafter mentioned, owner of certain leaseholds for a term of eighty-six years and three-quarters, subject to a peppercorn rent and lessee's covenants, and, in the view taken by the court of the evidence, to a vendor's lien for £148.

By an indenture dated the 24th of March, 1880, and made between William Tubb of the one part, and his son Alfred John Tubb of the other part, in consideration of the paternal love and affection which the said William Tubb had towards the said Alfred John Tubb, he the said William Tubb assigned the same hereditaments and premises unto the said Alfred John Tubb for the residue of the said term of eighty-six years and three-quarters, subject to the peppercorn rent and to the lessee's covenants.

It was not alleged that Alfred John Tubb had notice of the vendor's lien.

Alfred John Tubb subsequently mortgaged the same hereditaments and premises, with other property, to the plaintiff, Emma Harris, and died. She brought this action against Amelia Bayley Tubb, the administratrix of Alfred John Tubb, and against the vendors to William Tubb, claiming, inter alia, a declaration that any charge or lien to which the vendors might be entitled ought to be postponed to the plaintiff's mortgage.

Warmington, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiff.

Hall, Q.C., and P. V. Smith, for the defendants, the vendors.—There is a vendor's lien for £148, which can be enforced, as the deed of 1880 was a voluntary deed.

Powell, for another defendant.

Oswald, for Amelia B. Tubb.—The deed of 1880 relieved William Tubb from liabilities under the lease, and therefore was for valuable consideration: Price v. Jenkins, 5 Ch. D. 619. There was moreover no notice of any lien.

Hall, Q.C., in reply.—A conveyance of leaseholds is not necessarily for value. If there is a real bargain and sale, and some inducement to get rid of property, the consideration may be valuable: In re Lulham, 32 W. R. 1013. But that was not the case here, as the property was valuable and was at once mortgaged. Price v. Jenkins has not been approved of and will not be extended, and was under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4.

He referred also to the following cases: Green v. Paterson, 34 W. R. 724, 32 Ch. D. 95; Hamilton v. Molloy, 5 L. R. Ir. 339, 28 W. R. Dig. 197; Gardiner v. Gardiner, 12 Ir. C. L. R. 565; Ex parte Hillman, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622; In re Ridler, 31 W. R. 93, 22 Ch. D. 74; In re Marsh and Earl Granville, 31 W. R. 845, 24 Ch. D. 11; Lee v. Mathews, 6 L. R. Ir. 530, 29 W. R. Dig. 71.

KEKEWICH, J., having decided on the facts that the vendors had a lien on the property for £148 unpaid purchase-money as against William Tubb, continued as follows: If Alfred John Tubb was a mere voluntary assignee of William Tubb, he was in no better position than his father, nor can his legal personal representative be in any better position. Now on the face of it the deed of the 24th of March, 1880, is a voluntary deed—i.e., there is a good consideration, which is natural love and affection, as distinguished from a valuable consideration. That this was so appears from the fact that the property was valuable and money was raised upon it soon afterwards. If it were not for the decision in Price v. Jenkins I should regard that deed as a voluntary deed and declare the vendor's lien good as against the representatives of Alfred John Tubb. But that case was decided twelve years ago, and though it has been very much canvassed, and probably it is not too much to say that it has not received the unqualified approval of the profession, yet it has not been overruled. That case arose, it is true, under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4; and there was everything to make the court uphold the assignment, which was for value, because there can be no question that to set aside such an assignment is to countenance a fraud. But James, L.J., though in his judgment he decided the question which he had to consider, arising as I have said, under the statute of Elizabeth, used language in that case which, as I must not forget, has passed under his eye and been allowed to stand as part of the case after revision by him. He says: "Can an assignment of leasehold property ever be, properly speaking, voluntary? I remember a case in my own practice at the bar, which is not reported, in which the owner of three leasehold houses made a promise on his deathbed to give one of them to his widow; and the executor accordingly signed a written agreement to assign one of the houses to the widow, she undertaking to pay an apportioned rent of one guinea to the ground landlord and performing the covenants of the lease. I advised that this was a nudum pactum; but it was held by Shadwell, V.C., to be an agreement for valuable consideration." It may be that Shadwell, V.C.'s decision was wrong. It may be that the question which James, L.J., there puts ought to be answered in the affirmative, that an assignment of leasehold property can, strictly speaking, be voluntary. But that is not consistent with the way in which it is put in the case, or, as I understand it, with the decision in the case, which seems to be founded on that general proposition. It is not for me to canvass that, and to say how far it ought to go. Mr. Hall presses me not to extend Price v. Jenkins; but, if my view of the case is right, I should not be extending it, but following it exactly.

A more difficult argument to deal with is this: that that decision is limited to cases under 27 Eliz. c. 4. I cannot myself see that, on the face of the report. It was, it is true, a case under that statute; and no doubt there have been cases decided since—e.g., Ex parte Hillman, In re Ridler, and, I think, also Green v. Paterson—in which the court seems to have treated Price v. Jenkins as applicable only to cases arising under that statute; but my difficulty is, that I nowhere find any judgment of the Court of Appeal saying that that is so. What has been said is no doubt consistent with that view; and it may be that when the Court of Appeal is called upon to consider the matter it may hold that view. But when I find, for instance, Cotton, L.J., in Green v. Paterson, referring to Price v. Jenkins, not at great length, but still at sufficient length for the purposes of the case then before him, and referring to it as decided under the statute of Elizabeth, but not saying in so many words that it is applicable to cases under that statute and to none other, I do not think that I am competent to supply those words and to say that it is applicable to no other cases. In Irish cases, where the judges are apparently not bound by the decisions of the Court of Appeal here, they have gone the other way, and thought themselves at liberty to decide differently. It would not be right for me to listen to those cases, because they have no authority here against the decisions of our own Court of Appeal. I am told that there are text-books which point to a review of Price v. Jenkins when the opportunity occurs; and if the amount in dispute in this case were larger I might express the hope that it would go to the Court of Appeal, and that this question which has agitated the professional mind would be set at rest. I should not of course apply the decision in Price v. Jenkins to any of those cases to which the Court of Appeal says that it is not applicable; but that seems to me to come to this: that it is not applicable to cases where, according to the statute or the practice of the court, you do look into the consideration to see whether it is sufficient or not. In ordinary cases that is not the rule; and so long as there is some consideration, and in the absence of fraud, the court does not inquire—does not "weigh in golden scales," as the phrase is—the consideration which has passed. I think that there was, according to Price v. Jenkins, some consideration sufficient to make Alfred John Tubb a purchaser for value instead of a volunteer, and that therefore the vendors' lien will not hold as against him and those claiming under him.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, A. H. Crowther; F. Bradley.

Q. B. Div. (Huddleston, B., and Stephen, J.) Oct. 31; Nov. 1.

GERHARD v. MONTAGUE & CO.

LOW, SONS, & CO., Claimants. (a.)

Interpleader — Jurisdiction to order issue — Claimant substituted as defendant "in lieu of" applicant— Limitation of claimant to applicant's defences — R. S. C., 1883, ord. 57, rr. 1 (a), 7.

M. & Co. were sued by G. as acceptors on a bill of exchange. M. & Co. had handed the bill to L. & Co. for full value received. L. & Co. had really obtained the bill for one H. in consideration of the value of a cargo sent by G. to England from Russia, which H. instructed L. & Co. to sell on commission. H. obtained possession of the cargo on handing over the bill to G.'s agents in England. The bill was then forwarded to G. in Russia, and, being duly presented, was dishonoured, whereupon G. sued M. & Co. as acceptors. L. & Co. meantime give M. & Co. notice not to pay the bill, on the ground that they, L. & Co., had parted with the bill through the fraud of H., and that, the cargo being deteriorated, they had not received full value for the bill, and claimed to be recouped for their loss on its sale from the moneys handed to M. & Co. for the bill. M. & Co. apply for an interpleader issue to be ordered, which the master granted, and on which he substituted L. & Co. as defendants in lieu of M. & Co. On appeal to the judge at chambers the order for interpleader was affirmed, but a condition imposed limiting L. & Co., as defendants, to such defences only as M. & Co. could have raised.

Held, that, M. & Co. being "persons seeking relief who were under liability for a debt in which they were, or expected to be, sued by two or more parties making adverse claims" within the terms of R. S. C., ord. 57, r. 1 (a), there was jurisdiction for the court or judge to exercise their discretion in ordering an interpleader issue, and that such discretion had been rightly exercised; but that there was no jurisdiction under ord. 57, r. 7, to limit the defences of the claimant, who is substituted as defendant, to such defences as the original defendant could raise, since the words of ord. 57, r. 7, empowering the court or judge to substitute any claimant as defendant "in lieu of" the applicant, the original defendant, did not mean that such claimant should stand "in the actual place of," but instead of, such defendant.

Cross-motions against an order for an interpleader issue made by Wills, J., at chambers.

Upon the hearing of an application for an interpleader issue to be granted the master made such order, substituting the claimants as defendants, and upon appeal to the judge at chambers Wills, J., made the following order:—

Defendant to pay into court the sum of £588 18s. 7d. within a week, Low, Sons, & Co. (the claimants) to be substituted as defendants in the action brought by the plaintiffs against Montague & Co., but such substituted defendants to be confined to such defences and such grounds of counter-claim as the present defendants (Montague & Co.) might have set up.

The claimants (Low, & Sons, Co.) now moved against the above order in so far as it limited their defence to that available to Montague & Co., on the ground that the judge had no power to impose any such limitation.

The plaintiffs, Gerhard and Hey, moved that the whole order should be discharged, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make an interpleader order at all, or, if there was, that the discretion of the judge had been wrongly exercised.

Both orders were heard together, and the facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Pike, for the claimants.—The sole authority for interpleader orders is now contained in order 57 of R. S. C., 1883. By rule 7 of that order the judge may substitute a claimant as defendant "in lieu of or in addition to the applicant," but he has no jurisdiction to impose limitations on the defence of such substituted defendant.

J. E. Banks, for the plaintiffs.—This is not a case for an interpleader order because the two claimants are not claiming for the same subject-matter. An interpleader cannot be granted when, in the issue between the parties, either claimant would not be in the same position or could not assert the same rights of property. The plaintiffs' claim against Montague & Co. is on a bill of exchange, for the value of which the whole assets of Montague & Co. are liable. The claimants, Low & Co., can only claim against Montague & Co. for a specific sum of money, the price for which they bought the bill of exchange from them. No issue can be framed which would give the plaintiffs the same rights against Low & Co. as against Montague & Co; and if so, no interpleader will lie:—Baker v. Australasian Bank, 5 W. R. 258, 1 C. B. N. S. 515; Farr v. Ward, 2 M. & W. 844; Dalton v. Midland Railway Co., 12 C. B. 458. If there is jurisdiction the discretion of the judge has been rightly exercised in imposing a limitation on the defence to be raised by Low & Co. Since ord. 57, r. 7, the claimant can be substituted "in lieu of" the first defendant—i.e., "in the place of" that defendant. The claimant, being exactly in the place of the first defendant, is limited to that defendant's right of defence.

---

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. Bray, for the defendants, Montague & Co.—The defendants are entitled to the relief of an interpleader order, and are not concerned as to any conditions imposed on the other two parties. They are persons "seeking relief under liability for a debt in respect of which they are sued, or expect to be sued, by two or more parties": ord. 57, r. 1 (a). They have been sued by the plaintiffs on the bill, and they can also be sued by Low & Co., who allege that they parted with the bill by fraud, and who, if so, remain the true holders of the bill: Regan v. Serle, 9 Dowling's P. Cas. 193; Attenborough v. St. Katherine's Docks Co., 26 W. R. 583, 3 C. P. D. 450.

Pike, in reply.—Ord. 57, r. 1, clearly gives the judge discretionary power in granting an interpleader application. Rule 7 gives power to order an issue to be stated where advisable, but also a power to substitute or add a claimant as defendant, who, when so substituted, becomes a defendant in every respect instead of, and not in the shoes of, the former defendant. The discretion of both master and judge has been practically exercised in favour of an interpleader, and ought not to be reversed.

Huddleston, B.—We have to deal with two cross-motions. The claimants, Low & Co., move that the interpleader order may so far stand, but that the conditions imposed by my brother Wills be struck out from it. The plaintiffs seek to set aside the interpleader order altogether, though, if it is allowed to stand, they are willing it should remain, provided the conditions imposed on the claimants be maintained. The applicants for the order, the present defendants, Montague & Co., are content to have the interpleader order, whether with or without conditions, imposed on the other parties.

What are the real facts? The subject-matter of the litigation is really a cargo of game to be sent from Russia. The plaintiffs are Russian merchants consigning this cargo to London. Their agents are Shenker & Co., in London. Their instructions to their agents are that the cargo is to be consigned to one Hasfeld, but that they are not to part with the bill of lading until payment, or its equivalent, is received from a responsible person. Hasfeld, knowing this, sees Low & Co., and by representing to them, as is alleged, that the cargo was about to arrive, and that they (Low & Co.) were to act as agents for its sale with a payment on commission, induces them to find him means to pay for the goods. Low & Co. for that purpose propose to purchase the bill of exchange in question from Montague & Co. Hasfeld thereupon goes to Montague & Co. and gets the draft prepared by which the plaintiffs in Russia can obtain there the value of their consignment. Low & Co. take cash, £500 odd, to Montague & Co., and obtain from them the bill of exchange, under which they (Montague & Co.) are made liable at maturity for its amount. Low & Co. hand the bill to Hasfeld, who obtains from Shenker & Co. the bill of lading by handing to them the bill of exchange. This is sent out to the plaintiffs in Russia, and on being presented by them when due is dishonoured. Low & Co. allege that they parted with the bill to Hasfeld through a fraud on his part, because he represented the cargo as on the point of starting when it was really in harbour, and being composed of perishable articles was becoming deteriorated. The cargo being detained, was eventually sold by Low & Co. at a loss—namely, for £300 odd instead of £500 odd, the amount of the bill. They now allege their right to recover the bill or its value, because they only parted with it through the fraud of Hasfeld, whom they further allege to have been in reality the agent of the plaintiffs, who would therefore be answerable for his fraud. The plaintiffs sue Montague & Co. upon the bill as its acceptors. Low & Co., however, have given notice to Montague & Co. not to pay the bill, alleging that they have a cause of action against Montague & Co. for the same, and intend to maintain it. Montague & Co. being sued, or threatened to be sued, by these two parties, claim the benefit of an interpleader issue.

The master orders it, and Wills, J., confirms his order so far, but he incorporates into the master's order certain terms.

The questions for us are whether, under such circumstances, there is a right of interpleader at all; and, secondly, whether, if so, the judge has power to insert such conditions upon the claimants, who are substituted as defendants. When may relief by way of interpleader be granted? By ord. 57, r. 1 (a), "where the person seeking relief is under liability for any debt . . . . for or in respect of which he is, or expects to be, sued by two or more parties making adverse claims thereto." Clearly Montague & Co. were persons seeking relief as being "under a liability for a debt for or in respect of which two parties were making adverse claims." They had been, in fact, sued by the plaintiffs, and had notice from Low & Co. of their claim, in respect of which they might expect to be sued. The guiding words of the rule are, relief "may be granted" under such circumstances. A discretion is given to the judge to refuse or to grant the relief so applied for. Therefore the master and judge had jurisdiction to make this interpleader order. Ought that discretion to have been exercised in granting the relief? I should be quite ready to exercise my discretion here in ordering this relief, even if it had not been already so exercised by the judge and master, and I see no reason to overrule their discretion so far. It is hard upon the plaintiffs, who have parted with their cargo, to have to go from one person to another to recover its value. But Low & Co. have equally a grievance in having been, as they say, imposed upon by a person alleged to be an agent of the plaintiffs. Montague & Co. are certainly in a very hard position, since they are absolutely innocent parties, who have parted with a bill of exchange for value received, and are now called upon to meet that bill which they had reason to believe would be met elsewhere. Low & Co., again, have paid cash to obtain the bill, and have lost the full value of the cargo as well. Montague and Co. are clearly liable as acceptors of the bill, and, if so, have practically no defence. Low & Co. are equally clearly entitled to recover from someone their loss on the depreciated cargo, for which they had paid full value in the purchase of the bill. If they can show fraud in their parting with the bill, they have a good defence to the action by the plaintiffs, which, if sustained, would make Low & Co. the true holders of the bill, on which they could recover from Montague & Co. the difference between the value paid for it and the less amount realized for the sale of the cargo. Clearly, under such circumstances, Montague & Co. are entitled to be relieved from being made parties to this action. I hold, therefore, that the discretion was rightly exercised, and that the interpleader order ought to be granted.

The question remains whether the terms imposed by Wills, J., on the claimants, Low & Co., can be maintained—that is to say, whether he had jurisdiction to attach any such conditions to an interpleader order, limiting Low & Co. to those defences only which Montague & Co. could set up. I am of opinion that the judge had no power to grant an interpleader order and yet impose conditions on the claimants other than security for costs. By rule 7 of order 57 the judge "may order any claimant to be made a defendant in lieu of or in addition to the applicant," or "may order that an issue between the claimants be stated and tried." It is said that the claimant being substituted "in lieu of" the original defendant, means that he must stand exactly in that defendant's shoes, but the words do not admit of such a narrow interpretation. The claimant may be made an additional defendant, in which case clearly he would be at liberty to raise any additional defences open to him, or he may be substituted altogether as defendant for the original defendant, in which case the same liberty must be left to him. The words mean "instead of" rather than in the actual place of the original defendant. I think, therefore, the limitation of Low & Co. to the defences only which Montague & Co. might have set up, is not warranted under the rules as to interpleader now in force. The order of the master, therefore, for an interpleader issue and for the substitution of the claimants as defendants will stand, and the order of Wills, J., will be varied so far as the limitation to particular defences is concerned.

STEPHEN, J.—I agree. If there is anything in the plaintiff's contention that the words "in lieu of" in rule 7, order 57, ought to have the narrow interpretation he wishes to impose on them, there is nothing to prevent him raising that contention at the trial, so as to prevent Low & Co. going into other defences than those open to Montague & Co., but I find no jurisdiction to make such an interpretation a condition of the grant of an interpleader order as has been done here.

Cross-motion of the plaintiffs dismissed.

Motion of the defendants granted.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bird & Moore.

Solicitors for Low & Co., Ingledew & Co.

Solicitors for Montague & Co., Hill, Son, & Richards.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Field, J.) } June 26, 27, 28, 1889.

THARSIS SULPHUR AND COPPER CO. v. SOCIETE INDUSTRIELLE ET COMMERCIALE DES METAUX. (a.)

Practice—Service of writ—Contract with foreign corporation—Appointment by foreign corporation of agent to accept service—Power of parties to contract themselves out of the rules—Bankruptcy of foreign corporation—Effect of on authority of agent—Ord. 9, r. 8.

It is competent for parties to a contract, to contract themselves out of the rules as to the mode of service of writs, and to appoint a particular person to accept such service: hence, where, in a contract made by an English company with a foreign corporation, the foreign corporation appoint a person within the jurisdiction of the English courts their agent to accept service of any writ or other legal process arising out of the contract, and where such appointment is to be irrevocable until some other agent is appointed, and no other agent is appointed, service of a writ upon such person is a good and effective service, although not in accordance with the rule as to service upon corporations, even though the foreign corporation has become bankrupt before the date of such service, as such bankruptcy does not operate as a revocation of the authority of the agent to accept service.

Appeal from an order of Pollock, B., at chambers, affirming an order of a master, refusing an application to set aside a writ on the ground that the defendants reside and carry on business in France out of the jurisdiction of the court, and that the writ was not properly served.

The plaintiffs are a company who carry on business in England, the defendants are a company incorporated under articles of association carrying on their business in Paris, and they never have had, and had not at the date of the service of this writ, any office or place of business in the United Kingdom.

The plaintiffs, in April, 1888, entered into a contract with the defendants for the sale and delivery to the defendants of certain quantities of copper, which the defendants were to accept from time to time.

This contract contained the following clause:—"This contract shall be construed according to English law, and for the purposes thereof the defendants hereby submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice in England, and they hereby appoint A. H. Berthoud and John Reeves, of No. 41, Threadneedle-street, in the City of London, and every member for the time being of the firm of Coulon & Berthoud, of No. 41, Threadneedle-street aforesaid, or of any firm succeeding them in business, and every clerk for the time being of such firms, their agents on whom any writ or other legal process in respect of any matter arising out of this contract may be served, and such appointment shall not be revocable unless and until the defendants shall have appointed other agents carrying on business in London . . . and service of any writ or other legal process upon the agents hereby appointed shall be deemed to be good service on the defendants, and for the purposes of this clause the defendants elect domicile at the office of A. H. Berthoud and John Reeves aforesaid."

In April, 1889, the defendants were declared by a French court to be in judicial liquidation, and a judicial liquidator was appointed, and the business was being wound up under the French bankruptcy laws.

The defendants thereupon refused to accept any more deliveries of copper, and an action for breach of the contract to accept the copper was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants.

The writ was personally served upon Mr. John Reeves, a member of the firm of Coulon & Berthoud, at 41, Threadneedle-street. The defendants did not appear to the writ, but made an application to set aside the service, on the ground that it had not been properly served according to the provisions of ord. 9, r. 8. The defendants had not revoked the authority of Mr. John Reeves to accept service on their behalf.

The master and judge at chambers held that the service was good, and refused to set aside the writ; the defendants appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, for the appellants.—The service here is bad, as it is not in accordance with the terms of the rule, and it is not competent for parties to contract themselves out of the rule. The contract to accept service at a particular place is a contract which can be revoked at any time; it is not binding upon the liquidator, and the bankruptcy revokes the power.

Barnes, Q.C., and Houghton, for the respondents.—The parties can contract as to the mode of service as they have done in this case, and such contract is good. The power to accept service is irrevocable unless and until another person is appointed, and no other agent has been appointed here. The contract to accept service in London is good, and the bankruptcy of the defendants does not revoke the authority of Mr. John Reeves to accept service.

The following cases were cited:—Nutter v. Messageries Maritimes de France, 54 L. J. Q. B. 527, 34 W. R. Dig. 150; Copin v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 85, 1 Ex. D. 17; Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 333; Smith v. Buchanan, 1 East, 6; Lewis v. Owen, 4 B. & Ald. 654; Phillips v. Allan, 8 B. & C. 477; Bartley v. Hodges, 9 W. R. 693; Ellis v. McHenry, 19 W. R. 503, L. R. C. P. 228; Gardiner v. Houghton, 2 B. & S. 743.

FIELD, J.—This is an action brought by an English corporation against a foreign corporation, and the question now before us is whether the service of a writ which has been effected is a good service, and the defendants come, quia timet, and say, "Declare this to be a bad service, and do not let any judgment follow upon it unless we appear." The question therefore is, whether the writ has been effectually served.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Now, the principle of the rules of practice is that in all cases, where possible, personal service should be effected, and if prompt personal service cannot be effected, then that there may be a service in such manner as a judge may direct. In the case of a corporation service is effected according to the rule declaring what the terms of that service and the mode of service shall be; but that mode has not been adopted in the present case, therefore the case does not fall within that rule.

The service has been effected by delivering a copy of the writ to Mr. John Reeves at his place of business in London, and Mr. Reeves is a partner in a firm known as Berthond & Reeves, who acted sometimes as agents for the defendant corporation, and not merely as agents, because the service would be bad in accordance with the decision (Nutter v. Messageries Maritimes de France) to which my lord was party some years ago, which says that any person to be served must be an officer at the head office of the defendant company; but then the service is alleged to be good shortly by contract. Now, by the clause in question in the contract there is not a mere power of attorney given to Reeves; there is not a power given to him to do anything whatever; but there is a contract, whereby, for good consideration, the defendants contract that they attorn to the jurisdiction of this court, and further, that they have appointed certain persons to be their agents, on whom any writ for the purpose of this contract may be served. Had the matter rested there, it seems to me that that is an irrevocable appointment of those people; but it is clear that that is so by the clause itself, for the clause goes on to say that such appointment shall not be revocable unless and until the defendants shall have appointed other agents carrying on business in London. Therefore it was clearly within the power of the defendants to have, first of all, appointed other agents, and then they might have revoked the authority of Berthond & Reeves, but that they have not done. There is no suggestion anywhere that this appointment has been revoked, nor, indeed, would it have been possible to revoke it unless or until some other persons had been appointed.

The question, therefore, is raised whether or not, under the circumstances, this service is an effective service. Now it is clearly not a service in the manner provided by the rules, but then is it to be competent to anybody to contract themselves out of the rules, at all events to agree to a particular mode of service, and not only that, but to appoint a particular person to accept service for him. It is quite clear, on principle, that a person may appoint another for consideration as agent to accept service, and may contract with someone else that that person shall be the person, until revocation, to accept service. Not only is that so on principle, but there is an authority to that effect. North, J., has very recently held that view in the case of this very company, where he held that a foreign person can contract to have a domicile for the purpose of being sued within the jurisdiction (Societe Industrielle des Metaux v. Companhia Portuguesa dos Minas de Huelva, 33 S. J. 253). Therefore a person may so contract, and it seems to me that the defendants here have so contracted. It seems to me that if the matter had rested simply without bankruptcy or liquidation, there could be no question at all but that that would be good service.

The next point is, does the bankruptcy of the defendants render the service bad. The way in which it was argued for the defendants was this: It was said this was a personal contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that is not binding upon the judicial liquidator, but is like the case of the revocation of a power of attorney by death or otherwise. That does not seem to me to apply here. What is the effect of the bankruptcy? We have a statement of the French law with reference to it, but I do not rely on that, because I assume that in French law cessio bonorum is very much the same as it is in this country—namely, that if a man has given up his property to be divided among his creditors, then the Legislature has said that a contract shall not be dissolved, but that there shall be simply a remedy against the property of the person who has made the contract. It is quite clear that it has long been the law that this country does not recognize the dissolution of a contract made in this country and declared to be the law by the legislation of a foreign State.

Under these circumstances, what effect can be given to the fact that the company has been put into judicial liquidation? The limits of the rule have been very well fixed in the case cited of Phillips v. Allan, which was the case of the discharge of an insolvent debtor by cessio bonorum in the Court of Session in Scotland, and it was held—in accordance with a previous case of Smith v. Buchanan—that such discharge is no answer to an action brought by an English subject in a court in this country to recover a debt contracted in England; and it was held in that case that the foreign law of Scotland did not affect the contract. It was sought for the defendants to distinguish these cases by saying that may be true with regard to the construction of the contract. It must be true also with regard to the remedy provided by the contract, because that was the very point there—whether a man could still sue upon a debt although, by the cessio bonorum of Scotland, the Legislature there had discharged him. However, I fail to see what distinction can be drawn between the construction of the contract or remedy, and this provision which is to give this mode of service, and it is a very important matter, generally as well as in this particular case, as this is a contract which the plaintiff company would not have entered into but for that provision.

I think it would be a very dangerous precedent to decide that such a contract should be void for the purpose for which it was entered into—namely, for the service, and that a man should be relegated to somebody somewhere else. I am certain the parties never intended that state of things to exist.

The motion, therefore, must be refused, with costs.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I will only say that I concur in the judgment of my learned brother, because it appears to me quite clear that any judge would give substituted service in a case of this sort, and that would be the same practically.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Upton, Athey, & Upton.

Solicitors for the defendants, Murray, Hutchins, & Stirling.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } October 29

In the Goods of Samuel Covell (a.)

Probate—Practice—Administrator absconding—Revocation of grant—New grant.

Where an administrator could not be found, having absconded, after threatening to commit suicide, and the only estate remaining unadministered was a claim for debt against a bankrupt's estate, the court without citation revoked the grant and made a new grant to one of the next of kin.

(a.) Reported by J. Gerard Laing, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application to revoke the grant to Samuel Henry Smyth Covell of letters of administration de bonis non of the personal estate and effects of Samuel Smythe, and to make the grant to Mrs. Welsh.

Samuel Covell, the testator, died on September 1, 1875, leaving, by his will, his residuary estate to the four children of his son Samuel Henry Covell.

Samuel Henry Covell proved the will on the 15th of September, 1875, and died on the 13th of January, 1880, leaving part of the personal estate and effects of the said Samuel Covell unadministered, and after making his will, by which he left all his property to his wife, who predeceased him, and appointed her sole executrix.

On the 17th of March, 1880, letters of administration de bonis non to the personal estate and effects of the said Samuel Covell were granted to Samuel Henry Smyth Covell, one of four children of the said Samuel Henry Covell.

Samuel Henry Smyth Covell partly administered the estate of Samuel Covell, and on the 9th of December, 1884, he left his home, and had never since been heard of by his relations or friends. He left behind him a letter to his sister which pointed to suicide, and three days before, he had attempted to commit suicide by taking laudanum. A detective was employed and advertisements issued for several months, but without his friends being able to discover if he was alive or dead.

The only unadministered personal estate of the said Samuel Covell was a claim for about £1,084 against a bankrupt's estate expected to pay about 5s. in the pound, and it was desired to obtain representation to the deceased's estate for the purpose of proving against the bankrupt's estate and receiving the dividend. The applicant, Mrs. Welsh, was a married woman, one of the four children of the said Samuel Henry Covell.

Bargrave Deane, in support of the application, referred to In the Goods of Bradshaw, 36 W. R. 848, 13 P. D. 18. [BUTT, J.—In that case the administrator was abroad; here, if alive, it is not shown that he is abroad. Must he not be cited ?]

He also referred to In re Jenkins, 3 Phill. Eccl. Cas. 33; In re Hoare, 2 Sw. & Tr. 361n.

BUTT, J.—I think the precedents cited show that I have the power to do what is asked, and on the facts I am satisfied that the applicant is entitled to the grant.

Solicitors, F. Venn & Co.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } June 25, 1889.
Probate. }

In the Goods of MINSHULL (a.)

Administration—Special circumstances—Uncertainty as to next of kin—Agreement between parties alternatively entitled—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.

A doubt, depending on the validity of a marriage of the grandmother of one of two persons, having arisen as to which of them was the sole next of kin of the deceased, who died intestate, an agreement was made between them that one of them should apply for a grant of letters of administration to the deceased's estate, and, after payment of all expenses and costs, divide the residue between them.

Held, that there were special circumstances in the case which authorized the court to grant such letters of administration to the applicant under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857.

In the Goods of Hopkins, L. R. 3 P. & D. 235, 23 W. R. Dig. 7, followed.

Application on behalf of Mary Frances Hall, for a grant to her of letters of administration of the personal estate and effects of Harriet Minshull, deceased, under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857.

Harriet Minshull died on the 20th of November, 1883, in the Marylebone Workhouse, in the county of Middlesex, a spinster, and intestate. She was entitled to £200 Consols under the will of Samuel Minshull, deceased, which became payable to her estate on the death of Harriet Lalliment, who died on the 20th of March, 1888. This sum was believed to be subject to a mortgage, on which about £150 was due. She was also entitled, as sole next of kin of her sister, Elizabeth Grindley, to a legacy of the same amount under the same will, which also became payable on the death of Harriet Lalliment.

Mary Frances Hall, the wife of William Henry John Hall, was the greatniece and sole next of kin of Harriet Minshull, and the only person entitled in distribution to her personal estate and effects, if Mary Minshull, a sister of the said Harriet Minshull, was lawfully married to Edward Francis Finden, the grandfather of Mary Frances Hall. If Mary Minshull was not lawfully married to Edward Francis Finden, the sole next of kin of Harriet Minshull, and the only person entitled in distribution to her personal estate and effects, was Harriet Louisa Minshull Demarest, the first cousin twice removed of Harriet Minshull.

A doubt having been raised whether Mary Minshull and Edward Francis Finden were lawfully married, Mary Frances Hall and Harriet Louisa Minshull Demarest, in order to avoid litigation, agreed that Mary Frances Hall should apply for the grant of letters of administration, and that she should, as such administratrix, collect and receive the estate, and after payment thereout of the charges thereon and of the costs of administration and of the costs, charges, and expenses of both parties of and in relation to the grant and the administration of the estate, should divide the residue equally between Harriet Louisa Minshull Demarest and herself.

The trustees of the will of Samuel Minshull had paid into the Chancery Division of the High Court the amount of the legacies due to the estates of Harriet Minshull and Elizabeth Grindley.

Searle, in support of the motion, referred to the case of In the Goods of Hopkins, L. R. 3 P. & D. 235, 23 W. R. Dig. 7.

Middleton, for Mrs. Demarest, consented.

BUTT, J.—That case seems stronger than the present; I shall therefore follow it.

Application allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, E. W. & R. Oliver.

Solicitors for Mrs. Demarest, Gush, Phillips, & Co.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. Nov. 7, 19.

LISTER v. LISTER. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Dissolution of marriage—Discretion of judge — Permanent maintenance — "Dum sola" clause—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 32.

It is within the discretion of the judge, under the 32nd section of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, upon a decree for dissolution of marriage being made, to order the husband to secure to the wife, by way of maintenance, an annual sum for her life absolutely, without limiting the payment of it by a "dum sola" clause." This discretion ought to be exercised in each case with regard to the facts thereof and the conduct and circumstances of the parties, as prescribed in the section, and no primâ facie rule ought to be laid down with reference to the insertion or omission of the above words limiting the payment of the annual sum to the wife with respect to the contingency of her marrying again.

Appeal from Butt, J.

This was an appeal by a husband from an order of Butt, J., directing him to secure the payment of an annual sum by way of permanent maintenance to his wife, who had obtained a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his adultery and cruelty.

The decree was made absolute on February 12, 1889, and on March 1 the lady presented a petition for permanent alimony.

The question was whether a "dum sola" clause ought not to have been inserted in the order.

Section 32 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 is as follows:—"The court may, if it shall think fit, on any such decree, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable, and for that purpose may refer it to any one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court of Chancery to settle and approve of a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all necessary parties; and the said court may, in such case, if it shall see fit, suspend the pronouncing of its decree until such deed shall have been duly executed; and upon any petition for dissolution of marriage the court shall have the same power to make interim orders for payment of money, by way of alimony or otherwise, to the wife, as it would have in a suit instituted for judicial separation."

The registrar's report recommended that an annual sum of £195 out of the husband's income should be secured to the wife for life, or until she marry again.

Butt, J., made an order omitting the words "or until she marry again."

The husband appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Henry Stokes, for the appellant.—The words omitted ought to have been inserted. It is not reasonable that the husband should have to go on paying the maintenance money if the wife remarries. It was not intended to enable her to indulge in the luxury of maintaining another husband. The purpose of the section was to provide for the maintenance of the wife, and not for the punishment of the husband. [FRY, L.J.—At the time the Act was passed it was the practice to insert the "dum casta" clause.] [They referred to Fisher v. Fisher, 10 W. R. 122, 2 Sw. & Tr. 410; Chetwynd v. Chetwynd, 14 W. R. 184, L. R. 1 P. & D. 39, 44; Sidney v. Sidney, 13 W. R. Div. Dig. 16, 4 Sw. & Tr. 178; Gladstone v. Gladstone, 24 W. R. 739, 1 P. D. 442; Medley v. Medley, 30 W. R. 937, 7 P. D. 122; Hart v. Hart, 18 Ch. D. 670, 29 W. R. Dig. 100; Harrison v. Harrison, 35 W. R. 703, 12 P. D. 130.] In Gladstone v. Gladstone the wife had brought money into settlement. Here she brought nothing.

Inderwick, Q.C., and Searle, for the wife.—The opinions of the divorce judges have been modified since Sir C. Cresswell's time in the direction of greater liberality to the wife where the husband is the guilty party. Sir C. Cresswell's practice was to give a bare maintenance because the wife need not have obtained the divorce. In Fisher v. Fisher the money was the husband's, so the dum sola et casta clause was inserted. In Gladstone v. Gladstone it was held that the wife's own property ought to be given back to her unconditionally, but that the condition should be imposed on what was to be paid her out of the husband's property. In Medley v. Medley longer experience had altered Sir J. Hannen's opinion, and he would not make any restriction. In Harrison v. Harrison Butt, J., gave a portion of the income of the husband to the wife during her life ("joint lives" was a mistake in the report), and after postponing the question to the drawing up of the order refused to direct the restriction to be inserted. In an unreported case the judge thought that under the circumstances the provision should be for life, the woman being young, and the case a gross one. We ask your lordships to affirm the similar order in the present case. In Corbett v. Corbett, 13 P. D. 136, 36 W. R. Dig. 72, the maintenance was ordered to be paid to the wife for her life, her husband having a pension. In the present case Butt, J., tried the case and heard the evidence, and considered the case a very aggravated one, both as to the cruelty and the adultery.

Stokes, in reply.—Corbett v. Corbett had nothing to do with a dum sola et casta clause. [COTTON, L.J.—Is there any practice in the Divorce Court as to the insertion of these clauses?] The practice was to insert them till Butt, J., set his face against it. It is contrary to public policy to omit them.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—COTTON, L.J.—This was an appeal against an order of Butt, J., directing payment of an annual sum as permanent alimony to a wife after she had obtained a decree absolute for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery. The ground of the appeal was that the judge excluded from the order for the wife's maintenance that which is usually inserted in these orders—that is to say, the words "as long as she shall remain unmarried," or words to that effect.

Now, if he had laid down that, as a general rule, the payment should be for the life of the wife absolutely, I should have desired to have the case re-argued before the full Court of Appeal. But he did nothing of the sort, he merely expressed his opinion that the judge had a discretion, which was to be exercised in each case according to the particular facts of that case, and he did not consider the circumstances of the present case were such as to call for the introduction of the limitation. He puts it as a mere matter of exercising his discretion, under the circumstances of the particular case, and under the 32nd section of the Act of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85 he has, in my opinion, such a discretion. The section says "the court may, if it shall think fit, on any such decree, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife . . . such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable." That leaves it to the judge's discretion absolutely. I do not say that it is a discretion the exercise of which cannot be appealed from, but I can see no reason in the present case for interfering with the manner in which the judge has exercised his discretion. He knows much more of the circumstances of the case, and of the conduct of the husband, than we can do. I think, therefore, that it would be wrong here for us to interfere with the exercise of his discretion, and that this appeal should accordingly be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FRY, L.J.—The discretion exercised by the judge in this case is given by the Act to which Cotton, L.J., has referred. By section 32 of that Act the court may order the husband to secure to the wife either such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable. Now, it was said here that Butt, J., had laid down a general rule that primâ facie any alimony should be for the life of the wife who had obtained the divorce; but a reference to his actual judgment shows that he did nothing of the sort. It was contended, on the other hand, that primâ facie the rule ought to be to give the wife the annual sum allowed as alimony only till she marries again. But that does not appear to me to be any more correct than the other contention. The Act empowers the judge to give the wife an annual sum for any period not exceeding her life, or in the alternative to give her a gross sum of money, and it could not be said that the enjoyment of the latter would be taken from her on her second marriage. The Legislature, therefore, is not, it may be inferred, unfavourable to the principle of granting an annuity for the whole life of an innocent wife. Therefore, it seems to me that the effect of the statute is to leave an unfettered discretion to the judge in each case, and I think we should be doing wrong if we attempted to lay down any primâ facie rule on the subject. The duty of the judge is to exercise his discretion in each case according to its circumstances. The only question for us, therefore, is whether, in the present case, he exercised it in a manner which we ought to reverse. The facts of the case are these:—The wife was married at the age of seventeen; she had no property of her own; but the husband had property producing an income of between five and six hundred a year. The husband turned out to be an intemperate and cruel man, and an unfaithful husband, and he made the life of his wife unbearable, drove her from his house, and compelled her to seek the aid of the Divorce Court against him. That is as great a wrong as it is possible for a man to inflict on his wife. Under those circumstances the judge has given her an annuity of £195 for life (about a third of her husband's income), which I think is not at all an unreasonable compensation to be made by a man who has acted as the husband in this case has been shown to have done, and violated all his marital duties.

I think this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was refused.

Solicitors for the appellant, Smith, Fawdon, & Low, for Wright, Williams, & Wright, Leicester.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Roche & Son.

From Chan. Div. June 3, 4, 1889.

WHITE v. CITY OF LONDON BREWERY CO. (a.)

Mortgage — Public-house — Mortgagee in possession — Premises let by mortgagee, with stipulation that tenants should take beer from mortgagee—Account—Trade profits—Proviso limiting sum to be recovered by mortgagee.

In an action for account by a mortgagor against a mortgagee, a brewer, who had gone into possession and had afterwards sold the mortgaged premises—a public-house—a decree had been made directing (inter alia) "an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received," by the mortgagee, and also directing an inquiry as to "the profits made by the mortgagee in carrying on the business in the pleadings mentioned," since he took possession of the mortgaged premises;

Held, upon further consideration of the action, that the profits arising from the supply of beer by the mortgagee to persons to whom the mortgagee had let the public-house, with a stipulation that they were to take all beer from him, were not "profits of the mortgaged premises," but were profits of the mortgagee's brewery business, which was not in any way carried on on the mortgaged premises, and that the mortgagee was not bound to account for such profits;

But held, also, that if it could be shown that the mortgagee could have got a higher rent for the mortgaged premises if they had been let free from the stipulation that the tenants should take all beer from the mortgagee, then the mortgagor would be entitled to relief in respect of the difference of the rents.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

This action had been brought by the mortgagor of a leasehold public-house against the first mortgagees, who had been in possession of and had sold the mortgaged premises, and by it the plaintiff sought an account of what was due to the defendants on their mortgage; an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises which the defendants had received, or, but for their wilful default, might have received; and that the defendants might be charged with an occupation rent for the period during which they were in occupation of the premises; an account of the profits of the business carried on upon the mortgaged property by the defendants or their agents; an account of the proceeds of sale; and payment of what should be found due by the defendants.

Judgment had been given in the action, and the following accounts were thereby directed:—(1) An account of what was due to the defendants under the mortgage; (2) an account of all sums of money laid out by the defendants in necessary repairs and improvements; (3) an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged hereditaments received by the defendants, or by their order, or for their use, or which, without their wilful default, might have been so received; (4) an inquiry (without prejudice to any question in the action) as to what profits were made by the defendants in carrying on "the business in the pleadings mentioned" since they took possession of the mortgaged premises, and what sums might properly be allowed to the defendants for expenses in carrying on such business.

The chief clerk certified (inter alia):—(1) That there was due to the defendants at the date of the sale of the mortgaged premises £1,415 17s., principal moneys; that the property had been sold for £2,650, out of which the defendants had paid a second mortgagee the sum of £377 7s. 3d.; (2) that the defendants had, or, without their wilful default, might have, received rents and profits to the amount of £396 9s. 10d.; (3) that he disallowed a surcharge brought in by the plaintiff for £1,991 18s. 10d., the profits on beer supplied by the defendants to the premises from December, 1869 (shortly after the date when they had entered into possession of the premises), to September, 1879 (shortly before the date of the sale); (4) that no profits had been made by the defendants in carrying on the business, but that their carrying it on resulted in a loss.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action then came on again before North, J., for further consideration, and on summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and his lordship held that the defendants could not be charged with the profits made by them on beer supplied to their tenants of the premises, but that the defendants were chargeable with such rent as might have been obtained if the premises had been let by them free from any restriction to take the beer from a particular firm; and he charged the defendants with £20 a year extra rent in this respect.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, the mortgagor, from this decision of North, J.

The material facts are as follows:—

The plaintiff was the lessee of a public-house and carried on the business of a publican, and in 1868 he mortgaged the public-house to the defendants, who were brewers; the mortgage was to secure repayment of £700 and such further sums as might become due to the mortgagees for money advanced, goods sold, or otherwise, with interest. The mortgage contained a power of sale by the defendants if any default in payment should be made, and it was declared that the sale moneys should, after payment of all costs and expenses incidental to such sale, and the reimbursement to the mortgagees of all moneys they might have paid, or be liable to pay, for the repairs, insurance, or otherwise, or for keeping on foot the lease of the premises, be applied in payment of the principal and interest moneys then due on the security, and, subject thereto, in payment of the moneys then due to a second mortgagee, and the residue (if any) paid to the mortgagor; and then followed a proviso that "the total amount to be recovered by the mortgagees"—the defendants—"under these presents shall not exceed £900."

The defendants entered into possession of the mortgaged premises in September, 1869, from which date until March, 1871, they carried on on the premises the public-house business through a manager. The business was during that time carried on at a loss.

In March, 1871, the defendants let the premises to Moulton, as tenant, at a rent of £30 the first year (half of which sum was for furniture and fixtures put in by the defendants), and £40 a year afterwards, but the £40 was subsequently reduced to £30.

In August, 1873, the defendants let the premises to Hake at a rent of £60 a year.

Both Moulton and Hake, by the terms of their agreements, were bound to take beer from the defendants.

In September, 1879, the defendants sold the mortgaged premises, and the purchase-money, £2,650, was paid on the 24th of November, 1879.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and A. a'B. Terrell, for the appellant, the plaintiff.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and J. D. Fitzgerald, for the respondents, the defendants.

The arguments are fully dealt with in the judgments.

Lord ESHER, M.R. [His lordship referred shortly to the facts as above stated, and continued:—].—Proceedings have been taken in the plaintiff's name calling upon the defendants, the brewery company, to account for the purchase-money which they had received on the sale, and for the rents and profits during the time of their being in possession. That the proceedings are in reality taken in favour of the second mortgagee can hardly be doubted.

Disregarding, however, the form of the proceedings, let us see what must be the rights of the parties. The defendants are bound to account to the plaintiff, after the sale—for the proceeds of the sale—for any rents which they have received, or but for their wilful default or neglect might have received, from the property while they were in possession, and for any profits which, during that period, they made out of and by the mortgaged property. They have not to account for anything more, and as against that they are entitled to set the expenses which they have fairly incurred in consequence of having been obliged to take possession, and keep possession, and to sell. They have a right to set off against the sale the expenses of the sale. They have a right to set off against the rents and profits they have received any rents they have been obliged to pay (inasmuch as this was leasehold property), and any insurance they were obliged to pay, and anything else which was an expense put upon them by reason of their being obliged to take and keep possession, expenses which they were obliged to incur in order to receive the rents and profits which they are to account for.

But the nominal plaintiff says, "No, you must account to me for the profits which you have made upon beer which you have supplied to the house, as being part of the rent and profits which you have got out of the mortgaged property." Can these profits on beer supplied to the house be said to be profits by and out of the premises? Such an idea seems to me simply preposterous, and we cannot entertain it. Mortgages of beer-houses are of everyday occurrence, and the failure of the mortgagor to repay the brewer is a matter of every other day occurrence. Have the publicans who have fallen by the way in such numbers ever thought of raising this question? Not one. Neither did this man. It is the second mortgagee who thought of this. I suppose somebody has put this experiment into his head; it is an experiment which failed in the court below, and which fails here.

The question as to the profits on beer was the real fighting part of the case, and if the learned judge below had refused to consider anything else in the matter nobody could have objected. The plaintiff was playing for high stakes. He did not care about the difference of rent, he wanted £1,990 to be brought in, and then his surplus of a little less than £400 would have been nearly £2,400.

If a man plays for such high stakes and utterly fails, I feel inclined to say, "You cannot turn round when you have failed on that, and say you are entitled to a trifling advantage on another view of the matter." But the learned judge took a more indulgent view, and said to the mortgagees, "You took possession of the property, and you let the property; you were bound to the mortgagor to let it at a fair rent—you had no right, for instance, to let those premises for nothing, and then make a profit out of supplying beer to them. If you did not let the property for as good a rent as you could reasonably get, you ought to account for the difference between what you did let it for, and what you ought to have let it for."

The learned judge dealt with the matter upon that footing, and if he was to deal with it at all, that was the right footing. What the fair rent was is a matter of evidence, and the evidence here is as bad as the pleading; it goes to every point except the real point in the case. Now does the evidence show that the mortgagees let this house at any time for a less rent than they ought to have got? For the first two years they kept it in their own hands. There is no question but that they had a right to do that, and the evidence is that if they had tried to let it at the time when they took possession they could not have got a tenant. The defendants then put Moulton in as their servant, and the value of the business is carried from nothing at all, by their money and by their servants, to something. After this, Moulton takes the house at a rent of £30 for the first year, and £40 for the next, and he was to take his beer from the defendants. He found that he could not make anything of it and asked them to reduce his rent to £30, and half of that was for furniture belonging to the defendants. The evidence is clear that nobody at that time would have given more.

In 1873 Hake came in at a rent of £60, and the evidence is that nobody at that time would have given more than he gave. The learned judge came to the conclusion that from the year 1874 to the year 1879 the property was let for a less rent than might have been got if there had been no stipulation to take beer from the defendants, and there being no evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff what amount of rent ought to have been got, the learned judge was obliged to make a guess, and he allowed £20 a year. If he had given only £10, the plaintiff could not have complained. He has got £100, which will go perhaps to assist the second mortgagee to pay the costs, for which I have no doubt he is liable, and with that he must be content. The appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—This case came on upon further consideration, and a motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate. The action was brought by a mortgagor against the mortgagees, who had been in possession and had sold the mortgaged property, to take an account of what the mortgagees ought to hand over to the second mortgagee or to the plaintiff out of the moneys which had arisen by the sale. The sale is not in any way impeached, but on various grounds it is contended that the certificate ought to be varied so as to be less favourable to the mortgagees. The great contention was, that the mortgagor was entitled to the profits made by the mortgagees as brewers in supplying the mortgaged property, which was a public-house, with their own beer. Now, first, is that question open on this decree?

There are two clauses on the decree under which it is said to be open. The first is an account, "of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the defendant company, or which, without the wilful default of the defendant company, might have been so received." In my opinion the profits of the brewers from supplying beer do not come within that. They are not the profits of the mortgaged hereditaments; they are the profits of the brewer's business, which is not in any way carried on upon the mortgaged premises. I know of no authority, and Mr. Cozens-Hardy can give me none, that a mortgagee is bound to account for any profits thus made. There was a suggestion that a mortgagee was, in some respects, in the same position as a trustee; but that was not pressed. As regards certain matters no doubt a mortgagee is liable to the same obligations and restrictions as a trustee; but he is not a trustee; and there is no authority to show that if a mortgagee of a public-house, who is a brewer, supplies the public-house with his beer, he is liable to account for the profits he makes by so supplying it.

The other clause of the decree, under which it is said that this point is open, is that directing, without prejudice to any question, an inquiry what profits were made by the defendant company in carrying on the business in the pleadings mentioned since they took possession. In my opinion that does not in any way touch the question. The business there referred to is not the brewery business, but the business of the public-house, and this inquiry is directed to such profits (if any) as were made by the defendant company in the business carried on in the public-house during the period they were in possession by their manager or servant, and in no way gave the plaintiff any opportunity of raising this question, nor entitled him to make the defendant company account for any profits they made as brewers, not in carrying on the business of the public-house, but in carrying on their own business. That was the main contention. The plaintiff's claim was disallowed in chambers before the chief clerk, and then was disallowed by the judge, and I think it was rightly disallowed.

There is then another point to be considered. A mortgagee in possession must account for the rents which, but for his wilful default, he would have received. The plaintiff says that if he fails as to the brewer's profits, yet he ought to have a larger sum in respect of the rents which the mortgagees would, but for their wilful default, have received. I think the learned judge was a little indulgent to the plaintiff, but in these days, if there is a question to be decided on the evidence before the court, we are not inclined to restrict the suitor very closely to the pleadings.

The learned judge has allowed the plaintiff an addition of £20 a year from the 19th of August, 1874, to the date of the sale, in addition to the rent obtained by the mortgagees. Before 1873 there had been a period during which the brewers had been in occupation by their servant, then a period during which they let nominally at £30, but really at £15 a year, since half the £30 was paid by the tenant for the furniture and fixtures which belonged to the brewers, and then a period of letting at £60 a year. I was rather struck at first at there being no occupation rent charged against the brewers while they were in possession by their servant; it does not appear to have been asked for; but if it had been, is there any case made for giving it? I think the evidence is the other way. At the time the brewers took possession the trade in the neighbourhood was in a bad state. We know that when trade is in a bad state workmen have not money to spend in beer, so the custom would fall off, and when a public-house has got into a low state there is a difficulty in re-establishing its business.

This house, at the time when the brewers took possession of it, could not be let, because nobody could carry it on without a loss, as the brewers found by experience. As soon as they could let it at all, they let it to Moulton, who found a rent of £40 too high and was allowed to remain at a rent of £30. On the evidence before us there is nothing which satisfies my mind that the defendants could by any possibility have obtained a larger rent than that, during the tenancy of Moulton. Then, I think, the learned judge was right in saying —when there was a change in the tenancy—that there was no ground for charging the defendants with more than the £60 rent which they received from Hake during the first year of his occupation; but after that time, when he had established himself, the learned judge thought that something more ought to have been allowed. The evidence on that point is of a somewhat doubtful character, but I think the plaintiff has not established that more should be given him than what the learned judge has allowed—viz., £20 a year, which comes altogether to £100, as the Master of the Rolls has said.

There is one other point to be considered. The mortgage contained a proviso limiting the amount to be recovered under it by the defendant company to £900. The mortgage is a mortgage for £700, and for such other sums as might be due from the mortgagor for money advanced or goods sold and delivered or upon any other account whatsoever, and in a mortgage of that kind there must be some limit to the amount to be secured to the mortgagees. I think the certificate is framed in a somewhat awkward way in finding that there was due £1,415 17s. principal, without mentioning how it was made up. It consisted of principal moneys of some sort, but only £788 5s. 9d. was due in respect of the £700 originally advanced and goods supplied, and, as I understand the proviso, it only applied to the £700, sums afterwards advanced, and money due for goods supplied, and as the amount of these did not exceed £900 the limit was not exceeded. Let us look at the declaration in the mortgage as to the application of the moneys arising from the sale. "All moneys to arise from any such sale shall, after payment of all costs and expenses incidental to such sale, or in anywise consequent on such default" (i.e., default in payment of the money)—"and the reimbursement to the said company of all moneys they may have paid or be liable to pay for the insurance, repairs, or otherwise, or for keeping on foot the said lease and the licences belonging to the said premises"—these moneys, then, were first to be paid out of the money arising from the sale—and after this the money is to be "applied in or towards the payment of the principal and interest moneys then due on the security hereof." That is entirely distinct from reimbursing the mortgagees what they paid for insurance or for repairs, or in any other way for keeping the security on foot. In my opinion the proviso limiting the amount to be recovered does not apply to the moneys which the mortgagees can claim for their reimbursement, but simply to the principal moneys due on the mortgage, which are to be paid out of the sale moneys after the sums directed to be reimbursed have been paid, and does not prevent payment beyond the £900 either for interest or in respect of anything which is directed to be reimbursed. The objection on this ground, therefore, is not a good one. The appeal, therefore, fails.

FRY, L.J. — The main contention in the present case is a claim on the part of the appellant to receive a share of the profits made by the defendants in brewing beer supplied to a public-house. In my judgment the question does not arise here. The statement of claim asks for "an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received by the defendant company"; but it does not claim any portion of the profits made by them in brewing beer supplied to the tenant of the house. The decree follows the same lines. It directs an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged hereditaments. It also directs an account of the profits made by the defendants whilst actually carrying on business on the mortgaged premises; but it does not direct any account of the profits made by them in brewing the beer. I think, therefore, it is entirely out of the question to raise that point in the present case. Whether, if it were raised, it would have any chance of success is very doubtful. I do not doubt that, if the mortgagee be a brewer, and let the house with a covenant to take all the beer from himself, and it can be shown that he could have got a larger amount of rent if the house had been free from that covenant, the mortgagor, either under the wilful default clause or otherwise, must have some relief in respect of the difference between the two rents. And some relief has been given him in this case; but I think the claim for a share of the profits made by the brewers in supplying beer is entirely outside this order.

As to the rest of the case, I shall content myself with saying that I entirely concur in the judgments which have been pronounced by the Master of the Rolls and Cotton, L.J.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Carr & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant company, Western & Sons.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 2, 7.

HORNSEY LOCAL BOARD v. MONARCH BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Local government—Recovery of expenses—Charge on premises—Apportionment—Limitation of actions—Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 62—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.

A local authority who had incurred, in 1875, expenses which, by section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1858, were made a charge upon the premises in respect of which they were incurred, did not apportion the expenses till 1885, and in 1889 brought an action against the then owner of the premises to effectuate the charge.

Held, affirming the Queen's Bench Division (37 W. R. 556, 23 Q. B. D. 149), that the expenses became a charge upon the premises at the date at which they were incurred; that the period of twelve years limited by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 8, commenced to run from then, and therefore that the action was brought too late.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and Grantham, JJ.) reported 37 W. R. 556, 23 Q. B. D. 149.

In 1875 the local board, in pursuance of section 69 of the Public Health Act, 1848, after notices having been duly served, and default made by the owners, completed certain paving works in respect (inter alia) of premises of which the defendants subsequently became owners.

In 1885 these expenses were apportioned, and in 1886 notice of the apportionment was served on the defendants, and a demand made for payment. In 1889 this action was commenced in the Clerkenwell County Court for a declaration that the expenses were a charge on the premises, and for a sale of the premises to give effect to the charge. The county court judge gave judgment for the local board, but this was set aside by the Divisional Court on the ground that the expenses became a charge on the premises at the date at which they were incurred, and therefore that the action was barred by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Shiress Will, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the appellants.—A present right to receive cannot arise until the expenses have been apportioned. Until then there is a charge for an unascertained amount, and there can be no right to receive.

Henn-Collins, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the respondents.—The charge is imposed on the land the moment that the expenses are incurred: Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 15 Ch. D. 392, 28 W. R. Dig. 138, and In re Bettesworth and Richer, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535. The right to receive accrues at the same time, and is a present right to receive, although incapable of being enforced until after apportionment. Secondly, on the evidence the defendants were purchasers without notice of the charge, which, therefore, cannot be imposed against them.

They cited Bassett v. Nosworthy, 2 White & Tudor L. C. 1; Ind, Coope, & Co. v. Emmerson, 36 W. R. 243, 12 App. Cas. 300; Westbury Rural Sanitary Authority v. Meredith, 30 Ch. D. 387, 33 W. R. Dig. 109; In re Poole's Estate, 25 W. R. 862, 6 Ch. D. 739; Corporation of Sunderland v. Alcock, 30 W. R. 655; Farnworth Local Board v. Compton, 34 W. R. 334; Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas. 215, 25 W. R. Dig. 341; Rothery v. Munnings, 1 B. & Ad. 15; Batle v. Batle, 20 W. R. 534, L. R. 13 Eq. 497.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Shiress Will, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 7.—Lord EBHER, M.R.—This was an action brought by a local board to enforce a charge imposed on certain land by reason of the local board having done certain works in the street in front of such land. The defence set up by the owners of the land is, that the local board are too late, and that their action is barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 8. The first question which arises—namely, as to when the charge attaches to the land—has already been settled by the Court of Appeal in the Tottenham case, which has been followed by In re Betteswoth and Richer. The charge attaches from the moment that the works have been completed—that is to say, in this case, that the charge was imposed on the land in 1875, more than twelve years after which the present action is brought. Then comes the question as to the construction which we must put on section 8 of the Statute of Limitations. This is clearly a proceeding to recover a sum of money charged upon, and payable out of, land within the meaning of that section, and so far the case is within the words of the section. But it is said the section does not apply, because in 1875 there was no one who had a present right to receive the money, and that right did not arise until the expenses had been apportioned. So to construe the section would, I think, be to say that the words "to receive" meant to enforce payment, which certainly, in the ordinary use of language, they do not. Until the expenses were apportioned the local board could not enforce payment, but they had a perfect right to receive the money, and were—being able to receive it—capable of giving a discharge for, or release of, it. To construe the section otherwise would land us in insuperable difficulties, and would give the local board the power of indefinitely postponing their action by postponing the apportionment. It has been, no doubt, argued that if they postpone the apportionment beyond a reasonable time a mandamus would lie to compel them to apportion; but why should we consider such difficulties when, according to the plain and ordinary meaning of the section, they will not arise. Then it was said that, in 1875, because the expenses had not been apportioned, the local board were not capable of giving a discharge for them. But I have already said that I think they had then a present right to receive the money, and, if so, they were capable of giving a discharge for it, because the receipt includes a discharge. The local board were not under any incapacity, which is, I think, what the words refer to. Therefore, in my opinion, the case falls within the section if the section is to be read according to its ordinary grammatical meaning. There is no reason why we should construe it otherwise, and, that being so, the plaintiffs' action is too late, and the appeal must be dismissed.

A point was taken as to the defendants having purchased without notice, and therefore it was said that the charge could not be enforced against them. According to the view we take of the Statute of Limitations, that point becomes immaterial; but I will only say that I should hesitate before acceding to such a proposition.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case turns upon the true construction of the Public Health Act and of the Statute of Limitations. The present action was brought to raise a charge on land on which an apportioned sum was chargeable. If a present right to receive the sum chargeable accrued in 1875 the Statute of Limitations is a bar to the action. The charge is created by the Local Government Act, 1858. A distinction is drawn between the summary remedy for the money against the person and the charge upon the land, and a special limitation is given in the case of the summary remedy for the personal action (Greece v. Hunt, 25 W. R. 543, 2 Q. B. D. 339). The question now arises as to what limitation is to be imposed with regard to the charge on the land. That appears to be given by section 8 of the Statute of Limitations. That section is a mere repetition of the similar enactment in the old statute (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 7), and I therefore have looked to see whether our decision is in any way inconsistent with the cases on that statute. The language used in section 8 and section 2 differs; in section 2 the time is said to run from the period when a right of action accrues, section 8 speaks of a present right to receive. The phrase is perhaps a little ambiguous, and therefore it is necessary to look at the object of the Act and the consequences of the different suggested constructions. If one of those constructions would give rise to an anomaly no lawyer would adopt it if the other construction would not have such an effect. If the right to receive is to be read as equivalent to the right to sue the anomaly is produced that the creditor can by his own act postpone practically for ever the operation of the Statute of Limitations. No doubt it is the duty of the local board to ascertain the precise sum due by apportionment, but no time is fixed for that apportionment, and if we were to hold that the operation of the Statute of Limitations only begins on the apportionment we should be giving the local board an indefinite time within which to bring their action, which, as I have said, would, I think, be anomalous. But I do not think we are driven to such a construction. If we take the right to receive in its ordinary meaning, and not as meaning a right to sue, then the moment that the charge attaches to the land the Statute of Limitations begins to run. Looking closely at section 8 we see that it refers to charges both present and future. A "present" right to receive, therefore, refers to a reversionary charge falling in, and becoming an actual charge. Then what do the words "a person capable of giving a discharge" mean? I think that they were inserted to exclude persons labouring under any incapacity such as infancy or insanity.

The case of the Tottenham Local Board shows that the charge is a present existing charge from the moment of the completion of the works, and the present right to receive the money then arises, although the amount may not have been reduced to pounds, shillings, and pence. It is not necessary that the amount should be ascertained before there can be a right to receive. Take for instance the case of a dissolution of partnership: each partner has at once a right to receive the amount which may be found due to him on partnership accounts being taken, and the Statute of Limitations begins to run although the amount due to each partner has not been ascertained. There is no real difficulty about the question, and none of the cases decided under the old Act are in opposition to the view which we take. I have therefore no hesitation in saying that the Divisional Court were right in holding that this action was too late. As to the other question, it becomes unnecessary to consider it, and I will only say that I am not at all captivated by Mr. Henn Collins' argument.

LOPES, L.J.—The case raises an important question, and therefore, although I entirely agree with the judgments which have been delivered, I think I ought to add a few words of my own. It is said that a present right to receive means an effective right which can be enforced by action. In my opinion the words should be given their plain and ordinary meaning. The Tottenham case says that the expenses become a charge on the land the moment that they are incurred. Various things may have to be done after that before the right to receive them can be enforced, but, in my opinion, the right to receive them arises concurrently with the imposition of the charge. It is a present right to receive, although the amount is not yet ascertained. So in a case where notice of action is necessary, a right of action exists although it cannot be enforced until the notice has been given. In my opinion the words "capable of giving a discharge" were only intended to exclude people labouring under an incapacity. This construction of the Statute of Limitations is consistent with the intention of the statute, and the opposite construction would, in my opinion, be anomalous, and would encourage the very uncertainty which the Act was intended to discourage.

On the other question raised, I say nothing. It is unnecessary to do so.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Tatham & Hardy.

Solicitors for the respondents, W. H. Withall & Co.

From Q. B. Div. July 30, 1889.

CANADA SHIPPING CO. v. BRITISH SHIPOWNERS' MUTUAL PROTECTION ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Marine insurance — Mutual insurance association — Damage caused by "improper navigation" — Improper condition of ship to receive cargo.

By the rules of a mutual insurance association, the plaintiffs, who had entered their ship on the books of the association, were entitled to protection in respect of loss of, or damage to, any goods or merchandise on board the ship caused by the "improper navigation" of the ship.

A cargo of wheat was loaded on board the ship, and on arrival at its destination it was found that the wheat was tainted with the smell of paraffin, and it was rejected by the consignee. The smell arose from a cargo of liquid composition, carried on the previous voyage, which had leaked into the hold and saturated the limber boards and ceiling of the ship.

Held, that the damage to the cargo was not caused by "improper navigation" of the ship within the meaning of the rules, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the loss.

Appeal from the judgment of Charles, J., in favour of the defendants (22 Q. B. D. 727).

The plaintiffs were the owners of a ship called The Lake Ontario, which was entered on the books of the defendants, an association of shipowners, for the whole amount of her tonnage. Among the risks, events, and occurrences in respect of which, according to the defendants' rules, the plaintiffs were by reason of such entry entitled to protection were the following:—"4 (d). Loss of or damage to any goods, or merchandise, or other property, or things on board, or in charge of any ship entered for protection under these rules (not being the ship herself, or her tackle, furniture, or stores) when such loss or damage has been caused by the improper navigation of such ship, or by collision with any substance other than water. . . . Damage to or loss of goods or things on any pier, or jetty, or like structure caused by like improper navigation shall be deemed covered by this clause." "12. No member shall have any claim under these rules for costs or charges of repairing any ship entered for protection under these rules, nor for any damage to, or loss of cargo, or other things where the same shall have been caused by improper stowage."

It was proved at the trial that in November, 1884, The Lake Ontario carried a general cargo from Middlesborough to Adelaide, part consisting of seventy casks of patent liquid coating composition, to be used as paint for machine castings.

The ship arrived at Adelaide in May, 1885, and it was found that a quantity of the composition had leaked from the casks into the hold, and had saturated a portion of the dunnage, and the ceiling, and limber-boards of the ship. The whole ship was pervaded with a strong smell of creosote or paraffin. When she was empty the ceiling and limber-boards were scraped in the usual way, but no special measures were adopted to get rid of the smell.

In June she was loaded with a cargo of wheat in bags for Dublin. On her arrival in Dublin, after a few bags had been discharged, a complaint was made by the consignee that they smelt of paraffin. The discharge was stopped in consequence, and the plaintiffs bought in the cargo at the market price of undamaged wheat. The cargo was taken to Liverpool, where the whole was found to be more or less tainted with the smell of paraffin, and the plaintiffs sold the cargo for the best price they could get, and were losers to the extent of about £2,400. The present action was brought to recover this amount.

Charles, J., held that the damage was not caused by "improper navigation"; and secondly, even assuming that it was, that the case was one of "improper stowage." He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and Carver, for the plaintiffs.—"Improper navigation" in this clause, as applied to a cargo-carrying ship, includes taking the ship to sea in a condition unfit for carrying her cargo: Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association, 35 W. R. 793, 19 Q. B. D. 242. The ship was fit to go to sea as far as her safety was concerned, but she was not fit to carry the cargo. It was therefore "improper navigation" to take her to sea in such a condition. This was not "improper stowage." Improper stowage has nothing to do with the state of the ship; it relates to the mode in which the cargo is loaded.

They also cited The Warkworth, 33 W. R. 112, 9 P. D. 145; Tattersall v. National Steamship Co., 32 W. R. 567, 12 Q. B. D. 297; Stanton v. Richardson, L. R. 9 C. P. 390, 22 W. R. Dig. 223; and Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association, 20 W. R. 33, L. R. 6 C. P. 563.

Cohen, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not agree that this court, in Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association, placed upon the words "improper navigation" a meaning other than their ordinary meaning. If the court had done so, I should think that the decision could not be a right one. The court paraphrased the meaning of the word "navigation," so as to enable it to apply that word to the facts of the case. In my opinion the case was rightly decided, and the phraseology used was perfectly accurate. In my judgment in that case I said:—"I think, therefore, that if there be negligence before the navigation of the ship commences—negligence of the owner or his servants—which has the effect of causing the ship to be unsafely navigated during the navigation with regard to the safety of the goods, that makes the navigation, under those circumstances, improper navigation by the shipowner or those for whom he is liable. . . . Here the negligence commenced before the navigation of the ship commenced, but it was negligence of the shipowner and of those for whom he was responsible, and it had the effect that it rendered impossible, unless that matter were found out and put right, to navigate that ship, after her navigation had begun, safely with regard to the safety of the goods."

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That seems to me to be a correct statement as to safe or unsafe navigation with regard to a cargo-carrying ship. It is not, of course, exhaustive. If that is the true meaning of the term "navigation" in an instrument like this, the question arises whether there was improper navigation in this case. The ship, with regard to her sailing qualities, was in perfect order. But there was a bad smell in her hold. I cannot call that "improper navigation." I agree with the reasoning and judgment of the learned judge upon that point. With regard to the question of "improper stowage" it is not material to consider it.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see how the smell of the creosote in the hold of the ship can be called improper navigation. It had nothing to do with the safe sailing of the ship. There was, no doubt, something improper done, but I cannot bring it within the meaning of the term "improper navigation." It was said that Carmichael's case compelled us so to hold. The facts were wholly different. The judgment in Carmichael's case is perfectly consistent with our present decision.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the damage here was caused by "improper navigation," and what is the meaning of those words in the instrument before us. It is clear that damage caused by improper navigation must be caused by navigation of an improper kind, and that damage not caused by navigation cannot be caused by improper navigation. Navigation means the sailing of the ship, having regard necessarily to whether it is a passenger or a cargo-carrying ship.

It is said that Carmichael's case is contrary to this, and that it decided that the damage was caused by "improper navigation" when it was not caused by anything to do with navigation in the ordinary sense at all. It seems to me to decide nothing of the sort. I think that the language used by the Master of the Rolls in that case, assuming that the instrument was in the same words as this, was perfectly accurate. The language used by the other members of the court must be construed with reference to the facts before them. Instead of that their language has been taken out and pressed upon us without the context and the surrounding circumstances. Damage caused by improper navigation must be damage caused by navigation of an improper kind, and according to Carmichael's case the navigation is not the less improper navigation because it arises from something which was done before the voyage commenced for which the owner is responsible.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, & Co., Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, W. A. Crump & Son.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Chitty, J. } July 10, 11, 1889.

In re READ AND GRESWELL'S DESIGN. (a.)

Patent—Patents, &c., Act, 1883, ss. 47, 58, 60, 90—Similar designs—Different classes—Designs Rules, 1883.

Where a person has registered a design in one of the classes specified in schedule 3 to the Designs Rules, 1883, another person cannot register a similar design in another class for similar articles made of different material.

This was an application by a Miss J. Taylor, who had in January, 1886, registered a design in class 5 in schedule 3 of the Designs Rules, 1883, that the entry of a design registered by the respondents in November, 1886, in class 12 of the above schedule might be expunged from the register.

Class 5 is for "articles composed wholly or partly of paper (except hangings)," and class 12 is for "goods not included in the other classes." The designs were substantially identical.

Morton Daniel, for the applicant.—The respondents' design is not new and original at the date of registration as required by section 47: Le May v. Welch, 33 W. R. 33, 28 Ch. D. 24, 35.

G. White, for the respondents.—The applicant has no rights in her design outside the class in which it is registered: Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 30 W. R. Dig. 197; In re Lyndon's Trade-Mark, 34 W. R. 403, 32 Ch. D. 109; Jay v. Ladler, 37 W. R. 505, 40 Ch. D. 649.

CHITTY, J.—The applicant's design is registered in class 5, which is for articles composed wholly or partially of paper, except hangings, which are included in another class. The respondents' design is registered in class 12, which is for goods not included in the other classes, and it is argued on their behalf that, although their design may not by itself be new and original, yet that it is so within the meaning of section 47 of the Act. That argument comes to this, that where a new and original design is registered in one class, a rival designer is at liberty to take the design and transfer it bodily to another class, and register it in that class, or, if it be on the register, may maintain it there. I do not think this argument can be sustained. No doubt the copyright in a design conferred by section 60 of the Act is limited to the goods in the class or classes in which the design is registered, and this is clearly the case, for under section 58, which gives a special remedy by penalty for the infringement of a registered design, the registered proprietor cannot proceed against the infringer in respect of goods outside the class in which the design is registered, and for this reason, that the person registering, having knowingly confined the registration to one class of goods, has, by so doing, impliedly given notice to all the world that they are at liberty to use the design for goods not included in the class or classes, for a person may register a design in more than one class. It is on this that the respondents' argument is based. But can the Legislature have had this intention? I suggested the case of a design registered for jewellery, and another trader, finding this to be so, and that articles marked with such design were being put on the market, and people were becoming generally acquainted with the design, taking this design and registering it in some other class of goods, such as glass (class 4) or lace (class 9), a thing which in the case of many designs might easily be done. I am satisfied that it was not the intention of the Legislature to allow this to be done. The answer to the argument is to be found really in section 47 of the Act, where the words used are, "Any new original design not previously published in the United Kingdom." To be capable of being registered a design must be "new or original" in fact, and not, as is suggested, "new or original" as to some particular class of goods. It cannot be said to be new and original if it has already been applied to articles of an analogous character.

This application must, therefore, be granted, and with costs.

Solicitors, Reader & Hicks; Tyrrell, Lewis, & Co.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. July 5, 1889.

Burland v. Broxburn Oil Co.
In re Burland's Trade-Mark. (a.)

Trade-mark—Fancy word—"Distinctive"—"Common to the trade"—Rectification—Patents, &c., Act, 1883, ss. 64, (1), (c), and (2), 74, (1), (b), (2), (3), 90.

The word "distinctive" used in section 74 (1), (b), of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, means primâ facie distinctive, and any word which, though primâ facie distinctive, is, in fact, common to the trade, must be disclaimed when registered as part of a combination.

The words "common to the trade," in section 74 (1), (b), are equivalent to "open to the trade."

Motion.

This was a motion by the defendant company under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, that the register of trade-marks might be rectified by expunging the word "Washerine" (which word had already been decided by Chitty, J., to be descriptive only) from the Mark No. 77,935, or in the alternative for the entry of a disclaimer of any exclusive right to the use of such word.

The mark was for a label to be put round bottles in which laundry preparations were sold. The mark contained the word "Washerine" in large letters at the top, middle, and bottom of the label, and again some seven times in smaller letters; secondly, the written signature of "F. A. Burland & Co."; and thirdly, a quantity of printed matter, part of which was laudatory of "Washerine," and part of which consisted of directions for use. The defendants (the present applicants) also manufactured and sold for laundry purposes a preparation which they advertised as "Washerine."

Romer, Q.C., and Carpmael, for the motion, cited Sebastian on Trade-Marks, p. 316, note b., 2nd ed.; In re Van Duzer's Trade-Mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623; Humphries v. Taylor Drug Co., 37 W. R. 192; In re Hudson's Trade-Marks, 34 W. R. 616, 3 Rep. Pat. Cas. 155, 162; In re Kuhn & Co.'s Trade-Marks, 53 L. J. Ch. 238; Patents, &c., Act, 1888, ss. 10, 16.

Byrne, Q.C., and John Cutler, for the respondents (the plaintiffs), cited In re Horsburgh & Co.'s Application, 32 W. R. 530n, and Thompson v. Montgomery, 37 W. R. 637, 41 Ch. D. 49.

Romer, Q.C., replied.

Chitty, J.—I have to consider sections 64 and 74 of the Act of 1883, which have both been repealed by the Act of 1888, and new sections have been substituted for them. I am not at liberty to interpret the Act of 1883 by the Act of 1888, because the Act of 1888 comes after the Act of 1883, and because the language of the new sections—viz., 10 and 16 of the Act of 1888—when compared with sections 64 and 74 of the Act of 1883, varies, and I am not able judicially to say to what extent the Legislature was only making a variation in its language, and to what extent it was making substantially a new enactment. I refer to those two sections 10 and 16 merely for the purpose of saying that much that is obscure on the sections as they stood in the Act of 1883 has been now made clear, and that the substitution of the new enactments is to distinguish the essentials from the non-essentials when anything that is a trade-mark is registered, and to compel the person who seeks for registration to distinguish upon the face of the register itself that which is essential and that which is not. Now undoubtedly the respondents have a good trade-mark with reference to the written signature of the firm, and they say that they are entitled to register with that, without any disclaimer, the term "Washerine," as being a mere simple addition to the trade-mark, and a word in respect of which they can claim no rights.

Without going through the arguments at length, I will take the 74th section, which runs thus:—"Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the Comptroller entering on the register . . . as an addition to any trade-mark," and then comes the two sub-sections. It is not clear on the face of this Act, looking at the words "as an addition to any trade-mark," whether that which is registered, is registered as part of the trade-mark, or is registered as an addition to the trade-mark; the language as it stands would appear, until I read what comes afterwards, to denote that it is an addition to the trade-mark, and not a part of the trade-mark itself. It is clear from some portions of the subsequent part of this section that something which can be registered as an addition to the trade-mark is not part of the trade-mark, because sub-section 2 of this section contains a provision for a disclaimer of some of this additional matter, and if on the face of the register the person registering disclaim a part of the addition, it is plain that that part of the addition so disclaimed is not part of the trade-mark. Now the two sub-sections are (a) and (b), and I may, for the purposes of this case, lay aside the sub-section (a), because that relates to a trade-mark used before the 13th of August, 1875, and this trade-mark was not used before that date. Sub-section (b) runs thus: "In the case of an application for registration of a trade-mark not used before" the date I have mentioned, "any distinctive word or combination of words, though the same is common to the trade"—that is to say, nothing in the Act shall preclude the Comptroller from entering on the register as an addition to any trade-mark any distinctive word or combination of words, though the same is common to the trade in the goods with respect to which his application is made. Now, staying there for one moment, the term "distinctive," as has been pointed out by Mr. Sebastian, is not consistent with the rest of the section, because if the word is common to the trade it is not distinctive. Therefore I take it, it means any word which is primâ facie distinctive, or which might be otherwise distinctive. Of course, directly it is really found to be common to the trade it ceases to be distinctive, but I think the meaning of it must be a word which is primâ facie distinctive.

In the case before me the word "Washerine" clearly was inserted on the register, as is shown by the evidence, as a distinctive word, and I take it that this part of the enactment, "any distinctive word," relates back to the 64th section, where the term "fancy word or words not in common use" occur, and as I read that section, and in conformity with what I understand to be Cotton, L.J.'s opinion upon it, the word "distinctive" runs through the whole of the sub-section (c), so that the latter portion of that sub-section in effect stands "a distinctive fancy word or words not in common use." The same section 64, in sub-section (3), uses other phraseology—namely, "any special and distinctive word." I think, therefore, that the phrase "any distinctive word" in sub-section (1) (b) of the 74th section has a reference to the language of the 64th section, but it now appears, and it is made part of the argument for the respondents, that in the result, though the respondents considered that the word "Washerine" was a distinctive word, it is not.

Then I have to ascertain what is the meaning of the phrase "common to the trade," and the respondents' argument is that those words are not used in their grammatical signification, but that they mean in common use in the trade, and their object in asking me to vary the language of the Legislature in that sub-section is apparent, because then they think they can escape from sub-section (2) of the 74th section, which requires them to enter a disclaimer where there is any such common particular or particulars to be found on the register, or proposed to be entered on the register. They were bound to disclaim any right to the exclusive use of the same. The argument in support of the interpretation of the words "common to the trade" being equivalent to "commonly used in the trade" is founded on the third proviso of the 74th section, the substance of which is that "any device, word," and so forth, publicly used before the date mentioned in 1875 "by more than three persons on the same or a similar description of goods shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed common to the trade in such goods." But that is no definition nor explanation of the term "common to the trade," except an explanation to the limited extent which I am about to mention. It might have been a question whether user by three or four or five or six persons would have made a word or combination of words common to the trade, and the proviso is introduced merely for the purpose of settling that question, which might have been a difficult one of fact, and saying that, where you have user in the trade by more than three persons, then the name so used shall be deemed to be common to the trade. But that is only a particular case, and it has not the effect of defining the meaning of the term.

(a.) Reported by V. de S. Fowler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, the applicants' contention is that "common to the trade" means that which is open to the trade to use, substituting another phrase in order to bring out exactly the meaning which the applicants contended ought to be placed upon the word, and in support of this contention they put this case: Supposing that there is some word which has been used by the trade largely some ten years or so, or by twenty or thirty persons before the application for registration under this Act of 1883, but for certain reasons all those persons except two have dropped the user, any of the others may have recourse to the user again at any time; but say the applicants, if the term "common to the trade" is confined to user, it must mean user at the time of the application. That was (I put the question specially to Mr. Byrne) also the contention on the part of the respondents, that "common to the trade" meant common use at the date when the application was made, and I think that is a very good illustration to show that the Legislature could not have intended to employ this term in that limited sense. The true solution of the question is very simple. The phrase "common to the trade" is not to be interpreted otherwise than according to the ordinary rules of grammar, and I think "common to the trade" means exactly what it says. I cannot really make use of a better term, which I think exactly corresponds with the meaning that it is "open to the trade." Therefore, I hold that the applicants are entitled to an order which is, within the 90th section, a variation, in fact, of the register, where without sufficient cause something has been entered upon it; or I will make the order as asked, that the respondents should disclaim any right to the exclusive use of the term "Washerine," and make the order with costs. I may add, as this case may go elsewhere, that, as I understand, Kekewich, J., has come to the same conclusion in Humphries v. Taylor Drug Co., and I also gather that there are dicta of Cotton, L.J., in the two cases mentioned in the Board of Trade reports in conformity with what I have decided.

Solicitors, Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael; Janeways, Gribble, & Oddie, for W. Burtonshaw, Crowle.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Oct. 28.

In re Jones.
Dutton v. Brookfield. (a.)

Will—Trustee—Power to mortgage testator's real estate.

A testator, after appointing two persons executors and trustees of his will, directed "that the trustees for the time being of my will shall have full power to settle my accounts and wind up my affairs as they or he shall think fit, and in so doing to make any sales and arrangements they or he shall judge expedient." And the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate unto and to the use of his trustees upon the trusts therein declared. Shortly after the testator's death one of the trustees named in the will (the other having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts thereof) raised a sum of £500 by a mortgage of a portion of the testator's real estate for the purpose of satisfying some pressing claims against the testator's estate.

Held, that the mortgage was authorised by the terms of the will.

Adjourned summons.

John Jones (hereinafter called the testator) by his will, dated the 5th of April, 1884, appointed his son-in-law, John Hignett, and his son, W. R. Jones, executors and trustees of his will. And the testator directed that the trustees or trustee for the time being of his will should have full power to settle his accounts and wind up his affairs as they or he should think best, and in so doing "to make any sales and arrangements they or he shall judge expedient." And the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate unto and to the use of his trustees upon the trusts therein declared.

The testator died on the 7th day of April, 1884, and his will was proved by W. R. Jones alone, John Hignett, the other executor, having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts thereof.

The testator had during his lifetime deposited a policy of assurance on his life with the defendant Brookfield as security for the sum of £500, advanced by the defendant to the testator, with interest. After the testator's death the defendant, at the request of W. R. Jones, handed to him the policy to enable him to obtain payment of the policy moneys from the insurance society, Jones undertaking to pay the defendant the moneys owing to him out of the policy moneys when received. After Jones had received the policy moneys he requested the defendant to allow the sum of £500 to remain in his hands at interest for a further period of five years on mortgage of a portion of the testator's real estate, Jones alleging that he required the money to satisfy some pressing claims against the testator's estate. The defendant acceded to this request, and an agreement dated the 6th of September, 1884, was entered into between the defendant of the one part and Jones (described as executor and trustee of the will of John Jones) of the other part whereby the defendant agreed that if interest on the said sum of £500 should be paid half-yearly at the rate of five per cent. per annum for the term of five years from the 29th of July, 1884, then last, the same sum of £500 should not be called in during that term. And Jones agreed that the said sum of £500 with interest thereon at the rate aforesaid should be charged upon the eleven houses in St. Anne-street, Chester, then in mortgage to the Provincial Insurance Co. for £1,800. The houses referred to in the agreement formed part of the testator's real estate. Interest was duly paid to the defendant by Jones until the 29th day of July, 1886. No interest was paid after that date. In

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

January, 1887, Jones died. In October, 1888, William Dutton and Henry Small were appointed trustees of the testator's will, and in the same year letters of administration de bonis non to the testator's estate were granted to the said William Dutton, who claimed to be a creditor against the estate. The testator's estate proving to be insolvent the trustees of his will refused to recognize the defendant's claim to be a secured creditor upon the property comprised in the agreement of the 6th of September, 1884, on the ground, as they alleged, that under the terms of the testator's will Jones had no power to mortgage or charge the testator's real estate. They accordingly took out this originating summons to have it determined whether by the agreement of the 6th of September, 1884, a valid charge was created in favour of the defendant over the property comprised in the agreement.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the defendant.—We do not think this question can properly be decided on an originating summons under order 55. Creditors would not be bound. The plaintiff Dutton, no doubt, is a creditor, but he does not sue on behalf of himself and all other creditors. We are, however, willing to have the question decided on this summons if your lordship think you can do so. [North, J.—The summons must be amended by making another creditor of the testator plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the testator other than the defendant, and making Dutton (as administrator de bonis non of the testator) a defendant instead of a plaintiff. If this course is adopted I think I can get over the difficulty suggested by the defendant's counsel. The summons should also be amended by asking for administration of the estate.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Russell Roberts, for the summons.—The trustee had no power under the testator's will to mortgage the real estate: Stroughtill v. Anstey, 1 De G. M. & G. 635. The will contains no charge of debts.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and Stokes, for the defendant Brookfield.—We rely upon the words "make any sales and arrangements." We say those words authorize a mortgage. We do not want a charge of debts. Stroughtill v. Anstey does not apply, as in that case the trusts of the will contemplated a conversion out and out: Ball v. Harris, 4 My. & Cr. 264, applies.

They also referred to Devaynes v. Robinson, 5 W. R. 509, 24 Beav. 86.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—In Ball v. Harris there was a charge of debts.

North, J.—Having regard to the language of this particular will, I think I must hold that the agreement of the 6th of September, 1884, created a valid charge upon the testator's real estate comprised therein. It is not suggested that the conduct of Mr. Brookfield has not throughout been in perfectly good faith, and if he fails to have a good security it is by reason of misfortune, and not through any fault of his own. His conduct has been bonâ fide from the first. [His lordship stated the facts and continued:—] The question now raised is whether this security so created in September, 1884, upon the property in St. Anne's-street is a good security or not. If it is Mr. Brookfield will be paid in full; if it is not he will only receive a dividend for the amount of his claim.

In my opinion, the arrangement which was made by Mr. Jones with Mr. Brookfield was one which it was within the power of Mr. Jones, as executor and trustee, to make. The point has been put that if he had not been executor, and if the trustee had been one person, and the executor or administrator another, the trustee could not have made the arrangement. Of course, he could not without the executor, and the executor could not have made it without the trustee. Mr. Jones filled both characters. He had the legal estate devised to him, and the terms upon which it was devised to him are stated in the will. The will begins by appointing Mr. Jones executor with another person, who did not act; then it proceeds, "And I direct that the trustees or trustee for the time being of my will shall have full power to settle my accounts and wind up my affairs as they or he shall think best, and in doing so to make any sales and arrangements they or he shall judge expedient." Mr. Jones was sole executor and trustee, and according to the evidence it appears that he required the money in question for pressing claims against the testator's estate. Under those circumstances, the defendant's right to receive the £500 was clear if he insisted upon it, but the right of Mr. Jones to sell the real estate to raise the £500 which he required for pressing purposes was equally clear, and is not disputed. Further than that, I think it is quite clear that he could, if he liked, have raised money by mortgage, and that is in point of fact what he did do. In my opinion, he was justified by the terms of the will in making an arrangement by which the money required for the pressing claims was retained in his hands, instead of being paid to the defendant, upon the terms of his giving the defendant the mortgage of the 6th of September, 1884.

So far as authorities go, Ball v. Harris seems to me to be nearer than any other to the present case. It is quite true that there is not here any charge of debts as there was in that case, and it was admitted that if there had been a charge of debts Ball v. Harris would not have been distinguishable. But here there are words which, in my opinion, justified the trustee in dealing with and settling the accounts, and which justified his dealing with the estate in the manner he did. In my opinion, those words give him exactly the same power as he would have had if the power had been given him, not by these words, but by a direct charge of debts upon the estate.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to retain the security, and is not compelled to give it up for the benefit of the other creditors of the testator.

Solicitors, Kennedy, Hughes, & Kennedy; Chester & Co.

Chan. Div. North, J. } July 3, 1889.

In re Dixon.
Byram v. Tull. (a.)

Will—Construction—Gift to husband and wife and a third person—Indication of intention that husband and wife to take one share each.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to W., E. (the wife of W.), S., the wife of H., J., the wife of G., B., C., and D. (the wife of C.), to be equally divided between them, share and share alike.

Held, that, under that gift, W., and E., the wife of W., took one share each, not one share between them; and that C., and D., the wife of C., also took one share each, not one share between them.

Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Hare, 54, followed.

In re Jupp, 36 W. R. 712, 39 Ch. D. 148, dissented from.

Thomas George Dixon, by his will, gave the residue of his estate, after the death of his wife, "unto William

(a.) Reported by J. Trustram, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Byram, Elizabeth Byram, his wife, Sarah Byram, the wife of Henry Richards, Jane Byram, the wife of George Davis, George Dixon Byram, Cyrus Carter, and Charlotte Carter, his wife, to be equally divided between them share and share alike."

The testator died in September, 1882, and his widow in December, 1887.

This was an originating summons by the residuary legatees, other than Cyrus Carter and Charlotte, his wife, for the determination of the question whether William Byram, Elizabeth Byram, Cyrus Carter, and Charlotte Carter each took one share of the residue, or whether William Byram and Elizabeth, his wife, took one share only between them, and Cyrus Carter and Charlotte, his wife, also took one share only between them.

The defendants were Cyrus Carter and Charlotte, his wife, and the surviving trustee of the will.

Ingpen, for the plaintiffs, except William Byram and Elizabeth, his wife.—Under this gift husband and wife take one share only between them. The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has not destroyed the rule of law that husband and wife take as one person under a gift to them with other persons: In re March, 32 W. R. 941, 27 Ch. D. 166; In re Jupp, 36 W. R. 712, 39 Ch. D. 148.

H. T. Eve, for the defendants.—A slight indication of an intention that husband and wife shall take separately will defeat the application of the rule of law that a gift to a husband and wife and to a third person is to be construed as a gift of a moiety to the husband and wife and a moiety to a third person: Dias v. De Livera, 5 App. Cas. 123, 28 W. R. Dig. 34. The wording of the gift in the present case is a sufficient indication of an intention that husband and wife are to take separately; Bricker v. Whatley, 1 Vern. 233; Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Hare, 54; Paine v. Wagner, 12 Sim. 184; In re Wylde, 1 W. R. 9, 2 De G. M. & G. 724. The decision in In re Jupp referred chiefly to the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

Ingpen, in reply.—The decision in Warrington v. Warrington rested upon the fact that there the husband and wife were equally related to the testator. It was not referred to by Kay, J., in In re Jupp.

North, J., read the gift in the will, and proceeded:—There are seven persons named in the gift, and there is no copulative except between the sixth and seventh. The question is whether the rule of law that a gift to a man, his wife, and a third person is to be construed as a gift of one moiety to the husband and wife and of the other moiety to the third person, should be applied in this case, so that William Byram and Elizabeth, his wife, take one share only between them, and Cyrus Carter and Charlotte Carter, his wife, also take one share only between them. It is pointed out in the cases that a very little indication to the contrary is sufficient to lead to an opposite construction. In the judgment of the Privy Council in Dias v. De Livera it is stated: "The rule of English law that a gift to a man and his wife and to a third person is to be construed as a gift of a moiety to the husband and wife and a moiety to a third person is founded on the doctrine of English law that husband and wife are, for most purposes, one person. And yet any indication, however slight, of an intention that each shall take separately has been held to defeat the application of this doctrine. Warrington v. Warrington, Paine v. Wagner, and other cases illustrate the nice distinctions which have been given effect to on this subject. Knight-Bruce, L.J., in In re Wylde, attributes the rule to the position, which he describes as 'peculiar,' of husband and wife under our law."

That is a statement of the law by the Privy Council and also a recognition of Warrington v. Warrington and Bricker v. Whatley, as cases well decided upon the nice distinction recognized. It is material, then, to consider those cases. In Warrington v. Warrington the words are: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my trust estate and property, whatever and wherever not herein disposed of, I leave equally between my brother, Thornhill Warrington, my sister, Anne Van Corlandt, widow, my nephew, William Henry Warrington, and Emma, his wife"—that is, between four legatees named, the only copulative being between the third and fourth, "their heirs and assigns, nevertheless subject to any bequest and legacy herein mentioned." It was given equally between them, and they, therefore, took as tenants in common. It was held that the gift was between all four equally, the wife and husband not taking merely one share between them. The Vice-Chancellor referred to Bricker v. Whatley thus: "It may be observed that Littleton, in stating the rule which has been referred to, always illustrates it by placing the husband and wife as the first parties to whom the estate is made; and in Bricker v. Whatley the occurrence of the word 'and' before the names of the husband and wife is adverted to by the Lord Keeper." Then he says, "The husband and wife are equally of kin to the testatrix, and there is nothing in the disposition of the names which can import any intention to treat either of them differently from the other legatees. I cannot do otherwise than hold the gift to be a gift in severalty to several persons, and the residue must therefore be divided into four shares, and the husband and wife declared to be entitled each to one of such shares." It is said that the decision turned on the fact that the legatees were equally related to the testatrix. That is not the case. The husband and wife were equally related to the testatrix, but the other legatees were not. The fact that the husband and wife were, the other legatees not being so, can throw no light upon the construction. I do not understand how that can affect the meaning, and I do not think it was a governing ground of the decision. That decision is recognized as law in the Privy Council in the case to which I have referred.

The case of Paine v. Wagner was also referred to and recognized as law. That is rather a complicated case and the words are distinct. I do not think it throws much light on the present case; but Bricker v. Whatley seems to me undistinguishable from the present case. Then In re Jupp, a decision of Kay, J., is relied upon; and if that had been the only case on the subject I should have thought the words in the will in that case so like those in the present that I should have been prepared to follow it. The words there were "and one share between my sister Mary Buckwell, Daniel Buckwell, her husband, and Harriet Buckwell, her stepdaughter, in equal parts," and Kay, J., there held that Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell took one half share only and their stepdaughter took the other half. The ground of the decision is put in the judgment shortly in this way: "Unless this gift is affected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, Mr. and Mrs. Buckwell would take one half and Harriet, the stepdaughter, the other half: Bricker v. Whatley, In re Wylde. In the last case, Paine v. Wagner, which was relied on before me, was considered as not a binding authority." I put Paine v. Wagner on one side and look at the two cases referred to. In Bricker v. Whatley there was a gift by a testator of all the residue and surplus of his estate to A., B., and C., and the wife of C., there being an "and" so that there was a copulative conjunction between the second and third names as well as another linking the husband and wife. The Lord Keeper held "that the husband and wife should have but one third part; and the rather for that he observed the two 'ands' in the devise, namely, to A., B., and C., and W., his wife; and though a man may devise to ten persons and add an 'and' betwixt every person's name, yet it is not natural or usual to add an 'and' till you come to the last person."

Then in In re Wylde, the other case referred to by Kay, J., the gift was to J. C. and C., his wife, and W. L. in equal shares and proportions. There is the conjunction "and" between each of the three persons named; therefore, that case came exactly within the observations of the Lord Keeper, and the same view is taken by Knight-Bruce, who says: "For reasons stated in the argument, my conclusion here may possibly be consistent with the cases of Warrington v. Warrington and Paine v. Wagner. I am not sure that it is not." So that he did not consider he was overruling Warrington v. Warrington. Lord Cranworth says: "I confess that I was at first very much struck with the decision of Sir James Wigram in the case of Warrington v. Warrington, and I felt a difficulty in seeing a distinction between that case and the present. The distinction between it and Bricker v. Whatley is very fine, as Sir James Wigram himself thought. I think, however, that the cases were distinguishable. The ground upon which the Lord Keeper relied in Bricker v. Whatley was that the use of the word 'and' occurring twice in the enumeration of the legatees was not the ordinary form of language, if it was meant that all the four legatees named were to participate equally; therefore it was held that, according to the ordinary construction of a sentence so framed, the word 'and' occurring before the name of Stephen Whatley and Hester, his wife, must be taken to mean that the persons following it were meant to take, as if they were one person only, the same interest as each of the legatees previously named, the second 'and' which occurred between the names of the husband and wife being merely a subcopulative, showing that the two were to be treated as one person in the distribution of the benefits given, just as they would have been, according to Littleton, had the case been one of a devise of land. There being, therefore, that distinction between the cases of Bricker v. Whatley and Warrington v. Warrington, the latter case is not in the way of the application of the original doctrine laid down by Littleton."

The question is whether I ought to take a different view because of the decision in In re Jupp. There Kay, J., deals with cases in which the words differ from those in Warrington v. Warrington, and professes to follow those cases. I find that in those cases the proposition is recognised that a slight difference of language is sufficient to prevent the application of the rule of law on which they are founded. Kay, J., decided that case at variance with what I am now deciding. But I do not find that Warrington v. Warrington was referred to by him in his judgment; and he refers to two cases as supporting the view he took, which I find not only do not support his view, but do support the case of Warrington v. Warrington, which I must follow in this case.

Solicitors, Alfred T. Lawden; John Nicholls & Co.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) Nov. 8.

Leake v. Driffield. (a.)

Married woman—Contract—Deemed to be contract with respect to, and to bind, separate property—Showing the contrary—Question of reasonable inference—Clothing bought with separate income—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 3.

An action of contract against a married woman, under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is answered, if it appears that, at the time of entering into the contract, the married woman had not any separate property which she could reasonably be supposed to have intended to bind.

A married woman was entitled to the income of certain stock for her separate use without power of anticipation. At the time of entering into the contract sued upon, she had spent all the income then accrued in clothing for herself and her children:

Held, that it was unreasonable to suppose that she intended to bind the clothing by her contract.

Appeal from a judgment of the county court of Yorkshire.

The plaintiffs were a firm of drapers, and they sued the defendant for the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendant was at the commencement of the action a married woman, and she was sued as such under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Before the hearing, however, she was divorced from her husband. It appeared that by a settlement made previously to her marriage, which took place in 1867, she was entitled to the income of about £2,800 Consols for her separate use without power of anticipation. For many years she paid for her own clothing out of this income. She gave her orders to the plaintiffs, and duly paid for all the clothes supplied by them to her up to the 1st of March, 1884. In November, 1884, it was arranged between her and her husband that she should for the future pay for the clothing of some of their children as well as for her own, out of her separate income. From March, 1884, to May, 1886, during which time the defendant lived with her husband, the plaintiffs supplied her with goods to the amount of £21 19s. 10d., and it was for this sum that they sued.

The case came before his Honour Judge Turner in the county court at York on a default summons, under section 86 of the County Courts Act, 1888, in answer to which the defendant pleaded her coverture.

It appeared that the marriage had been dissolved by a decree absolute on the 29th of May, 1888.

The county court judge came to the conclusion that the defendant failed to show that she had not entered into the contract with respect to and to bind her separate property, and he thought that at the time when she ordered the goods she was possessed of free separate property—viz., the clothes on which she had spent her income. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, execution to be limited to separate property belonging to the defendant on the 29th of May, 1888, which was not on that day subject to any restraint against anticipation.

The defendant appealed.

J. V. Austin, for the defendant.—It was decided in Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519, that in an action against a married woman under the Act of 1882 it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the defendant had separate property at the time of entering into the contract. Here there is no evidence of any separate property which it is reasonable to suppose the defendant intended to bind. The separate property to which she was entitled, independently of her own and her children's clothing, was subject to a restraint against anticipation, and that is sufficient to rebut the presumption that she entered into the contract with reference to such property. The clothing was her only free separate property, and it is unreasonable to suppose she contracted with respect to that. Section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act says:—"Every contract entered into by a married woman shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, unless the contrary be shown." Sub-section 4 says:—"Every contract entered into by a married woman with respect to and to bind her separate property shall bind, not only the separate property which she is possessed of or entitled to at the date of the contract, but also all separate property which she may thereafter acquire." Before the Act there was a doubt as to how far a married woman's general engagements bound her separate estate. The Act says two things—(1) a married woman's general engagements shall bind all separate property which she has at the time of any particular engagement, and which it is reasonable to suppose she meant to bind; (2) where a married woman so binds such separate property she binds all future separate property as well. A question of fact lies at the basis of the matter—viz., what is the reasonable inference to draw in each particular case? see Johnson v. Gallagher, 9 W. R. 506, 3 De G. F. & J. 494; London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lempriere, 21 W. R. 513, L. R. 4 P. C. 572. In Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. R. 748, 13 P. D. 180, where a married woman's separate property was for her "sole, separate, and inalienable use," it was held that it was unreasonable to assume that she intended to contract with respect to it. It is equally unreasonable to make such an assumption here.

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Scott Fox, for the plaintiffs.—Even before the Act such a contract as the present would not have been treated as a nullity. It would have been enforced to the extent of binding all separate estate existing at the time of the contract which was capable of being taken in execution. Picard v. Hine, 18 W. R. 178, L. R. 5 Ch. 274, decided that where a married woman contracts a debt which she can only satisfy out of her separate estate, her separate estate will in equity be made liable to the debt: see also Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 Ch. D. 454. Under the Act, which cannot have intended to relieve a married woman's separate property from any liability, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the defendant had some separate property at the time of the contract; the nature or the amount of it is immaterial. The contract will then be deemed to have been entered into by the married woman with respect to and to bind her separate property. Sub-section 3 places the burden of showing the contrary on the defendant.

J. V. Austin replied.

MATHEW, J.—In this case I differ with reluctance from the judgment of the county court judge. I think that the plaintiffs' claim has been answered. The case put forward is, that the married woman had, at the time of entering into the contract, free separate estate which became liable to satisfy her engagement; and the question is whether there was separate estate in existence such as would be bound by her engagements. It was proved to the satisfaction of the county court judge that she had spent the income arising from her separate estate in buying clothes for herself and her children, and that at the time of the contract these clothes constituted the whole of her free separate estate. It was said that, being possessed of such separate estate (and the amount of it was immaterial), any contract made by her came within the Act, and was enforceable against any private income from time to time accruing to her. It was said, on the other hand, that no such consequence arises from the Act, and that the liability only exists where there is reasonable ground for supposing that the contract was made with reference to separate estate. Sub-section 3 of section 1 says that every contract by a married woman is to be deemed to have been made with respect to her separate estate, "unless the contrary be shown." Is it reasonable to presume that this lady entered into this contract with respect to her clothing or that of her children?

Palliser v. Gurney shows that the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the married woman has separate property which can be made liable. Harrison v. Harrison is an authority that, where the separate property of a married woman is not alienable, it is unreasonable to assume that she entered into any contract with respect to or to bind her separate property; the very fact of its being inalienable shows the contrary to that assumption within the meaning of sub-section 3. I think it would be equally unreasonable to assume that the present defendant entered into this contract with respect to property which she could not do without.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, under sub-section 3, the burden is on the defendant to show the contrary. Has, then, the contrary been shown? The defendant appears to have spent the whole of her income on clothes; and they were the only free separate property belonging to her when she gave her orders to the plaintiffs. Is it possible to suppose that she was then professing to contract with reference to her separate property? I think it would be just as absurd if she had no separate property at all, and that this is a case in which a judge ought to direct a jury that it was impossible to draw the inference that the defendant intended to charge the property.

Appeal allowed; leave to appeal.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Ridsdale & Son, for G. Crumble, York.

Solicitors for the defendant, Crowder, Austin, & Visard.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) Nov. 5

GREENHAM v. CHILD.
THORNTON, Claimant. (a.)

Bill of sale—Description of grantor—Affidavit—Residence—41 & 42 Vict. c. 31, s. 10—45 & 46 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

The grantor of a bill of sale had described himself in the affidavit as "residing at 20, Avington-grove, in the hamlet of Penge, in the county of Surrey." In the bill of sale he was described as "of 20, Avington-grove, and of 72, Beckenham-road, both in the hamlet of Penge, and of 100, High-street, Croydon, all in the county of Surrey." The grantor had offices at all these places, but he resided only at the first. The goods scheduled in the bill of sale were distributed among all three places.

Held, that he was sufficiently described in the affidavit within the requirements of section 10 of the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882.

Appeal from a judgment of his Honour Judge Bayley sitting at the county court of Westminster.

The defendant, as the grantor of a bill of sale, had described himself in the affidavit attached to the bill as "the said Alfred John Childs, residing at 20, Avington-grove, in the hamlet of Penge, in the county of Surrey." In the bill of sale he was described as "of 20, Avington-grove, and of 72, Beckenham-road, both in the hamlet of Penge, and of 100, High-street, Croydon, all in the county of Surrey." All three were places of business, being several offices of the defendant as auctioneer, and the goods affected by the bill of sale were distributed among the three places, but he resided only at 20, Avington-grove. The plaintiff, the judgment creditor, sought to set aside the bill on the ground that the grantor was insufficiently described in the affidavit. The county court judge upheld the bill of sale, against which decision the plaintiff now appealed.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. C. Scott, for the plaintiff.—The searcher for bills of sale is not bound to look beyond the affidavit, unless the description therein of the grantor of the bill is obviously insufficient. A man might have residences in different counties, but if only described as of one county the creditors in another county might not recognize the description: Hewer v. Cox, 9 W. R. 143; Wallis v. Smith, W. N., 1882, p. 77; In re Wood, Ex parte McHattie, 27 W. R. 327, 10 Ch. D. 398.

B. Bray, for the defendant, was not called upon.

MATHEW, J.—The object of the affidavit to a bill of sale is to make sure of the identity of the grantor of the bill. In describing his residence he is taken, in popular language, to be describing the place in which he lives and for which he pays rates and taxes. Here a bill of sale is made affecting goods in different places belonging to the grantor. In the bill he is admittedly properly described as of the three places of business, but it is said that this must be invalidated, because, in the affidavit, he is described as of only one place. But that place is his place of residence. If so, that is sufficient for the requirements of the Act. We are referred to the authority of Hewer v. Cox, but that rules that where a man carries on business at a place he is sufficiently described as residing there. Some dictum of Bacon, V.C., in a case only reported in the Weekly Notes in 1882, has been cited, but the Vice-Chancellor's later decision in In re Woods is against the present appellant.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Vanderpump & Eve.

Solicitors for the claimant, Child & Son.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) Nov. 1.

Ex parte BOARD OF TRADE.
In re WAYMAN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Costs of solicitor—Appointment of solicitor as trustee in bankruptcy—Remuneration—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 72, 73—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 305, 306.

Where a solicitor is appointed trustee in a bankruptcy, his remuneration must be in the nature of a commission or percentage, and the creditors have no power to pass a resolution directing that the remuneration of such trustee shall be his proper professional charges as a solicitor for work done and expenses incurred by him in or about the bankruptcy proceedings.

Application by the Board of Trade for review of taxation of solicitor's costs.

The case raised a question of considerable importance to solicitors appointed to act as trustees in bankruptcy.

On June 1, 1888, the first meeting of the creditors of the bankruptcy was held, at which Mr. William Peed, a solicitor at Cambridge, was appointed trustee at a remuneration to be fixed by the committee of inspection. On August 24, 1888, the committee passed the following resolution:—"That the remuneration of the trustee in this matter shall be his proper professional charges as a solicitor for attendance and work done and expenses incurred by him in or about the proceedings in this bankruptcy."

Under this resolution the trustee did the legal work arising in connection with the estate, and carried in a bill of costs therefor.

Objection was taken before the registrar by the official receiver that the resolution was ultra vires, but the charges were allowed. It was also held by the taxing master on review that the resolution was valid, but the question was referred to Cave, J., as the judge in bankruptcy, for decision.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The objections of the Board of Trade to the allowance of these costs are that, having regard to section 72, sub-section (1), and section 73, sub-section (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and to rules 305 and 306 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, the resolution which the committee of inspection passed on August 24 was bad in law and inoperative. The trustee being a solicitor cannot charge the estate for business done in that character. A trustee who is a solicitor is not entitled to charge the trust estate with costs for professional services.

Tindal Atkinson, for the trustee.—If, where the trustee is a solicitor, he is only to be paid by a percentage, it is difficult to see why sub-section (2) of section 73 was enacted at all. Where the creditors employ a solicitor as their trustee they may then contract with that solicitor that he may charge in addition to his percentage, his charges as a solicitor. It does not follow that the remuneration provided for by section 73 must be limited to the remuneration mentioned in section 72.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the committee of inspection have in this case done what they have no power to do. Section 72 is very plain, and it says that where the creditors appoint any person to be trustee of a debtor's estate, his remuneration shall be fixed by an ordinary resolution of the creditors, or, if the creditors so resolve, by the committee of inspection, and shall be in the nature of a commission or percentage, of which one part shall be payable on the amount realised, and the other part on the amount distributed in dividend. Then, all that section 73, sub-section (2), says, is that "where the trustee is a solicitor he may contract that the remuneration for his services as trustee shall include all professional services." The result of that would be that his remuneration would be higher than in the case of an ordinary trustee, but still it must be in the nature of commission or percentage by virtue of section 72. The result is that the resolution is worthless, and no remuneration has been voted to the trustee. He must therefore send in his bill for taxation under sub-section (4) of section 72, which provides that where no remuneration has been voted to a trustee he shall be allowed out of the bankrupt's estate such proper costs and expenses incurred by him in or about the proceedings of the bankruptcy as the taxing officer may allow.

Objection allowed.

Solicitor for the Board of Trade, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Solicitors for the trustee, F. & T. Smith & Sons, for W. Peed, Cambridge.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. C. R. Nov. 2.

REG. v. JOSHUA BROWN. (a.)

Criminal law—Jurisdiction of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved after plea of guilty — Unnatural offence—Fowls—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61—Attempted felony.

It is not a condition precedent to give jurisdiction to the Court of Criminal Appeal that a point of law existing "on the trial" should be formally taken at the trial.

(a.) Reported by R. E. MELSHEIMER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. v. Clark, 15 W. R. 48, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 64, disapproved.

A fowl is an animal within the meaning of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61.

R. v. Dodds (unreported) overruled.

A conviction for an attempt at an offence may be supported, although the attempt could not possibly have culminated in the full offence in the manner intended.

R. v. Collins, 12 W. R. 886, L. & C. 471, overruled.

The prisoner had been convicted before Lord Coleridge, C.J., upon his own confession, at the assizes for the county of Essex, on an indictment charging him with an attempt to commit unnatural offences with domestic fowls. The depositions showed that in all probability the offence had been habitual with him, and had resulted in the death of several of the birds and serious injury to several others who were found torn and bleeding, apparently from the effects of attempted penetration.

After sentence passed, the learned judge was informed that the Court of Criminal Appeal, in an unreported case, had unanimously held that a duck was not an animal within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61, and the question for this court was whether the conviction should accordingly be quashed.

No counsel appeared.

The judgment of the COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., POLLOCK, B., FIELD, MANISTY, CAVE, DAY, and GRANTHAM, JJ.) was delivered by Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. — There is a preliminary question arising out of the judgment in Reg. v. Clark, 15 W. R. 48, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 54, as to whether we have jurisdiction to consider a case in which the prisoner has pleaded guilty. The jurisdiction of this court is, by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, s. 1, confined to questions of law "which shall have arisen on the trial," but we think that the not taking objection to an indictment, owing, for instance, to accident or ignorance, is not final, because any point upon which the sufficiency of the indictment depends does exist at the trial, though not formally taken. This is not a question of sufficiency of proof, as in Reg. v. Clark, which case is not, therefore, quite in point, and we are not obliged to differ from it in terms.

We are agreed that the unreported case (R. v. Dodds) should equally be overruled whether the judgment turned solely upon the question of the construction of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61, or, whether as we are informed by some of the judges who took part in the decision it proceeded upon another ground—viz., that upon which the case of R. v. Collins, 12 W. R. 886, Leigh & Cave, 471, was based. It was there held that an attempt at larceny cannot be committed by a person putting his hand into the pocket of another for the purpose of committing larceny, there being at the time nothing in the pocket—that, in fact, if the attempt had proceeded without interruption, and could not possibly have culminated in the full offence, there could be no conviction for the attempt. The depositions in the present case seemed to make this reasoning inapplicable; but, independently of this, we do not think the decision in R. v. Collins should any longer be considered binding.

Conviction affirmed.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } June 1, 18, 1889.

"THE STETTIN." (a.)

Bill of lading—Master liable for wrong delivery when bill of lading not produced.

Goods were shipped in London for a German port on board a German ship under the terms of a bill of lading in two parts, exclusive of the master's copy, making the same deliverable to M. or to his or their assigns. M. was the agent of P., and the shippers of the goods sent one of the parts of the bill of lading to P., and P. afterwards returned it to an agent of the shippers. When the ship arrived at its destination the master delivered the goods to M. without production of the bill of lading. In an action against the shipowners for wrong delivery of the goods the court found that the German law governing the case did not essentially differ from the law of England.

Held, that the defendants had not delivered the goods according to the contract of shipment, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, subject to a reference as to the amount of damages.

This was an action instituted in the City of London Court on behalf of Sir Charles Price & Co. against the German vessel Stettin, and against her owners, defendants, intervening, and subsequently transferred to this court.

The action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful delivery of fifty-seven barrels of seed oil which had been shipped by the plaintiffs on board The Stettin in the port of London under the terms of a bill of lading, of the material portion of which the following is a copy:—

"Shipped, in good order and condition, by Sir Charles Price & Co on board the steamship called The Stettin . . . now lying in this port bound for Stettin, fifty-seven barrels of seed oil . . . to be delivered, subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned . . . at the port of Stettin unto S. Mendelsohn or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods in London. . . . . In witness whereof the master or agent of the said vessel hath affirmed to two bills of lading, exclusive of the master's copy, one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.—Dated in London."

June 1, 18.—The action was now heard before Butt, J. It appeared by evidence taken under commission at Stettin that the seed oil, the subject-matter in the suit, arrived at Stettin on the 25th of June, 1888; that the next day Mendelsohn obtained them from on board The Stettin, and, acting on a letter from the plaintiffs, forwarded them the next day to Julius Manasse, Breslau; that Mendelsohn never produced any bill of lading when the goods were delivered to him; and that his firm carried on business as a forwarding agent at Stettin. It also appeared from a letter written by Manasse to Mendelsohn, and put in evidence under the same commission, that the bill of lading for the fifty-seven barrels of oil had been sent at the time to Manasse at Breslau by Ad. Tresler, the representatives of the plaintiffs at that place, and that after they had been despatched to Breslau, Manasse had at the request of another member of the firm of Messrs. Tresler given the bill of lading back to them.

The result of the remainder of the evidence appears from the judgment.

Cohen, Q.C. and Pyke, for the plaintiffs.—The German law governing this case is the same as the English law—namely, that the master of The Stettin was not justified in delivering the oil to any person who was not the holder of one of the bills of lading.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Barnes, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.—Mendelsohn was the consignee named in the bill of lading, and he never assigned over either the oil or the bill of lading, whilst the shippers sent the bill of lading to Manasse, to whom Mendelsohn forwarded the goods. The master, therefore, performed his contract, and both parts of the bill of lading were accomplished by a delivery of the oil to Mendelsohn. This is so whether the law to be applied is German law or English law, for, so far as this case is concerned, the two laws do not differ to any important extent. Moreover, Mendelsohn, in forwarding the oil to Manasse, acted as the plaintiffs' agent, and the plaintiffs have not in reality suffered from anything the shipowners have done. If they have sustained any damage it is by the default of their own agent.

BUTT, J.—I have no doubt, on the evidence, that Mendelsohn was the agent of Manasse, and not of the shippers of the goods. This disposes of one contention raised by the defendants, but the main point contended for by them is that, by German law, the shipowner is entitled to deliver to the consignee named in the bill of lading without production of either part of the bill of lading. Now German advocates have been called on both sides, but as they differ, I must, in this divergence of opinion, decide what, in the result, the German law appears to be. Having considered the reasons given by these advocates for their opinions, I have come to the conclusion that on this point German law does not essentially differ from English law. According to the English law and the English mode of conducting business a shipowner is not entitled to deliver goods to the consignee without the production of the bill of lading. I hold that the shipowners must take the consequences of having delivered these goods without the production of one of the parts of the bill of lading.

There will be judgment for the plaintiffs, with, if necessary, a reference to the registrar and merchants for the assessment of damages.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, J. H. & H. E. Furnfield.

Solicitors for the defendants, T. Cooper & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 19, 20.

In re NEW EBERHARDT CO. Ex parte MENZIES. (a.)

Company—Shares—Issue of shares as fully paid up—"Contract duly made in writing"—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.

The conditions required by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, to exempt shares from being issued and held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, are (1) the existence of a contract, (2) that the contract be duly made in writing, (3) that the contract be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, and these three things must be in existence and be done at or before the date of the issue of the shares.

Held, accordingly, that a document, containing an agreement to issue shares as fully paid up, which was executed by one of the parties thereto only, and, being so executed, was filed at or before the date of the issue of the shares, did not, by reason of the acceptance of its terms by the other party after the issue of the shares, constitute a contract "duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares" within the meaning of section 25.

Decision of Stirling, J., reversed.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

In August, 1888, the Eberhardt and Monitor Co., hereinafter called the old company, went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of a reconstruction scheme being arrived at, and by this scheme it was proposed that the assets and business of the old company should be transferred to the New Eberhardt Co., and that each £1 debenture in the old company should be exchanged for four preference shares in the new company of 5s. each fully paid. The present appellant, E. F. Menzies, was a debenture-holder in the old company, and at a meeting of the debenture-holders held on the 31st of August, 1888, he voted by proxy for a resolution approving of the proposed scheme, and this resolution was duly passed.

In pursuance of the proposed scheme, by an agreement dated the 25th of September, 1888, and made between the liquidator of the old company, and the new company, the latter company purchased the assets and business of the old company on the terms (inter alia) that the new company should allot and issue to the holders of debentures in the old company four fully paid-up preference shares in the new company of 5s. each for every £1 of principal due on the debentures, in full satisfaction and discharge of principal and interest due to them on their debentures.

This agreement was duly executed, both by the old company, through their liquidator, and by the new company, but it was not registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office.

On the 28th of September, 1888, the New Eberhardt Co. affixed its common seal to a document bearing date the same day, and which purported to be an agreement made between the new company and the several persons whose names and addresses were set forth in the schedule thereto; this document recited the agreement of the 25th of September, and the fact that the liquidator of the old company had requested the new company to allot and issue to the persons named in the schedule to the present document, 45,724 fully-paid shares of 5s. each, in satisfaction of the amount secured by their debentures; and it was thereby witnessed that the new company should allot and issue to the persons named in the schedule thereto the number of shares set opposite their respective names, specifying the distinctive numbers of such shares, and credited as having the full sum of 5s. per share paid up thereon; and it was thereby agreed and declared that the shares included in the schedule thereto so to be allotted were to be held as shares upon which the full sum of 5s. per share had been paid, and that they should be liable and subject to no further payment; and the new company thereby undertook to cause this agreement to be duly registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office before the said shares, or any of them, were issued. The schedule to this document contained the names and addresses of the debenture-holders in the old company, including the name of the present appellant, Mr. Menzies, but neither Menzies nor any of the other persons therein named as parties to this document, nor any person on his or their behalf, had ever signed this document.

On the 1st of October, 1888, the document of the 28th of September was registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office.

On the 8th of November, 1888, Mr. Menzies received notice from the new company that 400 fully paid-up preference shares in the new company had been allotted to him, and on the 5th of December, 1888, a certificate of these shares, treating them as fully paid up, was received by him.

At that time Mr. Menzies believed that the new company had registered a proper and sufficient agreement for the purpose of providing for the issue of the said shares as fully paid up, and that he was under no liability to pay any money on them.

Shortly before the 19th of June, 1889, however, Mr. Menzies became aware of the fact that the only document registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office was the document of the 28th of September, 1888, and he thereupon required the new company to cancel the allotment, and the certificate of the shares allotted to him, and to file a proper agreement, and re-allot new shares and issue a fresh certificate. The new company having refused to do so, on the ground that the registered document was a sufficient agreement, Mr. Menzies applied by way of motion to have the register of members of the new company rectified by striking out his name as the holder of the 400 shares therein, and that the new company might be ordered to enter into and execute a proper agreement with the applicant so as to secure to the applicant 400 fully paid-up shares in the new company, and that, upon registration of such agreement, the new company might be ordered to issue 400 fully paid-up preference shares to the applicant.

It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Menzies had not, since the certificate of shares was sent him by the new company, in any way acted as a shareholder in the new company, either by receiving dividend, attending meetings, or otherwise. It also appeared that the new company is a perfectly solvent company.

Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), provides that, "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares."

Stirling, J., dismissed Mr. Menzies' application, on the ground that the requirements of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had been sufficiently complied with by the registration, before the issue of the shares, of the document of the 28th of September, and the acceptance, after the issue of the shares, of the terms of that document by Mr. Menzies.

Mr. Menzies appealed.

Whinney, for the appellant.—The document of the 28th of September, 1888, which is the only document filed at the Joint-Stock Registry Office, did not, in fact, at the time it was filed, constitute an agreement at all, because at that time neither the appellant nor any of the other debenture-holders whose names are mentioned in the schedule to the document, nor any person purporting to act for them, had, in fact, assented to the terms of that document; neither, therefore, could there be any subsequent ratification, by the acceptance of the shares by the appellant, because there was no existing contract or agreement to ratify. Secondly, the document of the 28th of September was not a "contract duly made in writing" within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, as the document was only executed by the new company, and was not signed by the appellant, nor by anyone purporting to act for him. To constitute an "agreement in writing" in the strict legal sense, "it is necessary that each of the parties should put his signature to the document": Bewley v. Atkinson (a case on section 3 of the Prescription Act), 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283, per Thesiger, L.J., 28 W. R., at p. 641, 13 Ch. D., at p. 298; and Jessel, M.R., in Firmstone's case, 23 W. R. 867, L. R. 20 Eq. 524, said that the words "duly made in writing" in section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, meant "made by the contracting party," using these words, I submit, in the comprehensive sense of "each contracting party."

He also referred to In re Lewis, 24 W. R. 1017, 1 Q. B. D. 724 (a case on the Attorneys and Solicitors Act).

Grosvenor Woods, for the New Eberhardt Co., the respondent.—At the date of the registration of this document there was an existing agreement to which Mr. Menzies had assented, binding the new company to allot these shares as fully paid up in exchange for the debentures in the old company. The document of the 28th of September, which was registered, contained a statement of all the material parts of this agreement between the old and the new company, and therefore really amounted to a registration of that agreement. In Anderson's case, 26 W. R. 442, 7 Ch. D. 75, Baggallay, L.J., referring to the contract required to be registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867, quotes with approval the statement of James, L.J., in Crickmer's case, 24 W. R. 219, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 614: "It must be a contract which shows what shares are to be issued fully paid up, and for what consideration they are to be issued." As to the second point—viz., that there was no "contract duly made in writing," because the registered document was not signed by Mr. Menzies, I say the signature is not part of the contract, and it is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the section, if that which both parties have in fact consented to, be evidenced in writing, and it is not essential that the consensus of the two minds should be declared in the written document itself: Laythoarp v. Bryant, 3 Scott, 238, 2 Bing. N. C. 735; Williams v. Byrne, 11 W. R. 487, 1 Moore P. C. C. N. S. 154; Reuss v. Picksley, 14 W. R. 924, L. R. 1 Ex. 342, which were all cases on the Statute of Frauds. An offer made in writing and afterwards accepted by parol will bind as a contract under the Statute of Frauds, for it is "quite a fallacy to suppose that because certain acts happen at different periods they cannot be so connected as to form one transaction" per Willes, J., in Reuss v. Picksley. When the shares allotted and issued by the new company to Mr. Menzies were accepted by him the document of the 28th of September became a contract in writing as from its date. Again, the document of the 28th of September may be treated as an acceptance by the new company of the terms, as to the issue of shares, which Mr. Menzies had previously assented to. The document which has been registered, at all events, satisfies the object of section 25, as it gives the names and addresses of all the persons to whom these shares were issued, and the number of shares issued to each, and the amount which was to be credited as paid up on each.

COTTON, L.J.—The question is whether Mr. Menzies has contracted and agreed with the New Eberhardt Co. to take from it certain fully paid-up shares—i.e., shares which in law could have no further claim made upon them. But he says that section 25 of the Act of 1867 has not been complied with because there has not been, before the shares were issued, a registration of such an agreement as is required by the statute, and what the statute requires is this. [The Lord Justice read section 25, and continued:—].

The question upon which this turns is, whether, before the issue of the shares, there was a contract duly made in writing and registered with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies?

What has been done here may have been perfectly honest and well-intentioned, but I am afraid there has not been a compliance with the statute.

There had been a proposal in the winding up of the old company to transfer all the assets of the old company to the new company on certain terms—viz., that the debenture-holders of the old company were to have 5s. shares, fully paid up, in the new company to the amount of their debentures. The law has enabled that to be done, provided there was a special resolution passed by the debenture-holders, and that was done—that is to say, the debenture-holders authorized the directors of the old company to make a contract with the new company, and to transfer to the new company the property of the old company on those terms, and the present appellant assented to that. Then what was done? A memorandum of agreement was prepared, which recited a contract between the new company and the liquidator of the old company, and then went on in this way:—"And in pursuance of the said agreement"—that is, the agreement between the new company and the liquidator of the old company—"and of such request and direction of the liquidator, as aforesaid, the new company shall allot and issue to the persons named in the schedule hereto the number of shares set opposite their respective names in the 4th column of the schedule and credited as having the full sum of five shillings per share paid up thereon; and it is hereby agreed and declared that the shares included in the schedule so to be allotted as aforesaid are to be held as shares upon which the full sum of 5s. per share has been paid."

Now, this memorandum of agreement, this document, which was the thing that was registered, in my opinion contained no agreement at all; but I think it contained an offer to give all the debenture-holders named in the schedule fully paid-up shares to the amount standing to their names, and as soon as that offer was accepted by the debenture-holders then there became, no doubt, a contract between them and the new company in the terms of, and in accordance with, this memorandum.

But I cannot see that there is anything here which can amount to a contract in writing registered. What, in fact, was it that was registered? As I have before said, it was merely an offer made by the new company to issue shares as fully paid up to those persons named in the schedule who would come in to accept them. Now I cannot see how that can be, within the words of section 25, "a contract made in writing and filed with the registrar at or before the issuing of such shares."

At the time when this was filed there had been no acceptance by any person to whom it was intended to issue these paid up shares, and therefore there was then no contract at all.

I doubt whether there would have been a "contract made in writing," even although a contract had been made by reason of the acceptance by those persons of the terms offered. The words of section 25 are, "a contract made in writing," and that is very different from the terms of the Statute of Frauds, because what that statute says is, that no action shall be brought unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, "or some note or memorandum thereof," be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith. It may be—though I do not intend to express any opinion as to that—that in accordance with the decisions on the Statute of Frauds there might be a memorandum in writing within the meaning of that statute, although there had been no acceptance in writing, but merely an acceptance arising from acts or circumstances that were held to amount to an acceptance. Those cases turned, however, on the words, "a note or memorandum in writing of the agreement." In one of those cases (Reuss v. Picksley) it was held that there was an agreement constituted by acts and circumstances which amounted to an acceptance of an offer made in writing, and, there being an agreement, it was held that there was, within the Statute of Frauds, a good memorandum in writing of the agreement, because all the terms were stated in the document. That was apparently the ground upon which the court decided the case, for Willes, J., said, "All difficulty as to the terms of the proposal is out of the case. It contained the names of the parties and all the terms by reference to the letter of the 8th of September, which must be taken to be recited in the letter of the 9th. The only question is, whether it is sufficient to satisfy the statute that the party charged should sign what he proposed as an agreement, and that the other party should afterwards assent, without writing, to the proposal? As to this it is clear, both on reasoning and authority, that the proposal so signed and assented to does become a memorandum or note of an agreement within the 4th section of the statute." But in the present case the words of the statute are not "an agreement in writing or some note or memorandum of an agreement in writing," but "an agreement made in writing." That is something very different from a memorandum thereof made in writing, and in my opinion it is impossible to say that, when at the time of registration of this document there was only, in fact, an offer, there was an agreement made in writing at or before the issue of the shares, and which was registered at or before the issue of the shares.

But then it was ingeniously suggested by Mr. Grosvenor Woods that the document of the 28th of September was not a proposal at all, but was in fact an acceptance by the company of a proposal previously made by the shareholders, and assented to by the appellant. But as I understand the facts, what the appellant assented to at the general meeting was the resolution authorizing the liquidator to enter into this agreement with the new company. That was not a proposal made by the debenture-holders to the new company, it was merely that they gave authority to the liquidator to make the proposal to the new company, and, in my opinion, the document registered does not purport to be an acceptance of any offer made by the debenture-holders so as to constitute an agreement made in writing within the requirements of section 25. In my opinion, in the present case, there being merely a proposal made in writing by the company, it cannot be considered to be an "agreement made in writing" within section 25, or that that section has been complied with.

In my opinion, therefore, an order ought to be made that the name of the appellant be taken off the register of shareholders.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only express my individual view because we are differing from the learned judge in the court below.

For the reasons given by Cotton, L.J., it is plain that the document which has been registered is not an acceptance by the company of an offer by the appellant. There was no offer capable of being accepted made by the appellant to the company, but only a consent given by him to a resolution which authorized the agreement between the two companies.

If this document which has been filed is not the acceptance of an offer already made, what is it? It is an offer, and only an offer, duly made in writing, and filed while it was only an offer. The offer being something short of a complete contract, it was not a complete contract when it was filed. It is true that it did afterwards turn into a contract when it was accepted, but it did not, I think, turn into a contract duly made in writing, and it certainly did not turn into a contract duly made in writing at the time this document was filed, because it only became a contract long after the document was filed.

It is obvious, therefore, that, unless we are to fritter away this section by putting a forced construction upon it, the section has not been complied with. I regret this judgment for the reasons given in the argument by Cotton, L.J. I think it is a most unfortunate slip, and that in substance the object of the Act has been fulfilled, though the requirements of the Act have not been complied with. But we must see that the Act of Parliament is carried out in its letter as well as in its spirit.

The cases on the Statute of Frauds can have nothing

At that time Mr. Menzies believed that the new company had registered a proper and sufficient agreement for the purpose of providing for the issue of the said shares as fully paid up, and that he was under no liability to pay any money on them.

Shortly before the 19th of June, 1889, however, Mr. Menzies became aware of the fact that the only document registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office was the document of the 28th of September, 1888, and he thereupon required the new company to cancel the allotment, and the certificate of the shares allotted to him, and to file a proper agreement, and re-allot new shares and issue a fresh certificate. The new company having refused to do so, on the ground that the registered document was a sufficient agreement, Mr. Menzies applied by way of motion to have the register of members of the new company rectified by striking out his name as the holder of the 400 shares therein, and that the new company might be ordered to enter into and execute a proper agreement with the applicant so as to secure to the applicant 400 fully paid-up shares in the new company, and that, upon registration of such agreement, the new company might be ordered to issue 400 fully paid-up preference shares to the applicant.

It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Menzies had not, since the certificate of shares was sent him by the new company, in any way acted as a shareholder in the new company, either by receiving dividend, attending meetings, or otherwise. It also appeared that the new company is a perfectly solvent company.

Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), provides that, "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares."

Stirling, J., dismissed Mr. Menzies' application, on the ground that the requirements of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had been sufficiently complied with by the registration, before the issue of the shares, of the document of the 28th of September, and the acceptance, after the issue of the shares, of the terms of that document by Mr. Menzies.

Mr. Menzies appealed.

Whinney, for the appellant.—The document of the 28th of September, 1888, which is the only document filed at the Joint-Stock Registry Office, did not, in fact, at the time it was filed, constitute an agreement at all, because at that time neither the appellant nor any of the other debenture-holders whose names are mentioned in the schedule to the document, nor any person purporting to act for them, had, in fact, assented to the terms of that document; neither, therefore, could there be any subsequent ratification, by the acceptance of the shares by the appellant, because there was no existing contract or agreement to ratify. Secondly, the document of the 28th of September was not a "contract duly made in writing" within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, as the document was only executed by the new company, and was not signed by the appellant, nor by anyone purporting to act for him. To constitute an "agreement in writing" in the strict legal sense, "it is necessary that each of the parties should put his signature to the document": Bewley v. Atkinson (a case on section 3 of the Prescription Act), 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283, per Thesiger, L.J., 28 W. R., at p. 641, 13 Ch. D., at p. 298; and Jessel, M.R., in Firmstone's case, 23 W. R. 867, L. R. 20 Eq. 524, said that the words "duly made in writing" in section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, meant "made by the contracting party," using these words, I submit, in the comprehensive sense of "each contracting party."

He also referred to In re Lewis, 24 W. R. 1017, 1 Q. B. D. 724 (a case on the Attorneys and Solicitors Act).

Grosvenor Woods, for the New Eberhardt Co., the respondent.—At the date of the registration of this document there was an existing agreement to which Mr. Menzies had assented, binding the new company to allot these shares as fully paid up in exchange for the debentures in the old company. The document of the 28th of September, which was registered, contained a statement of all the material parts of this agreement between the old and the new company, and therefore really amounted to a registration of that agreement. In Anderson's case, 26 W. R. 442, 7 Ch. D. 75, Baggallay, L.J., referring to the contract required to be registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867, quotes with approval the statement of James, L.J., in Crickmer's case, 24 W. R. 219, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 614: "It must be a contract which shows what shares are to be issued fully paid up, and for what consideration they are to be issued." As to the second point—viz., that there was no "contract duly made in writing," because the registered document was not signed by Mr. Menzies, I say the signature is not part of the contract, and it is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the section, if that which both parties have in fact consented to, be evidenced in writing, and it is not essential that the consensus of the two minds should be declared in the written document itself: Laythoarp v. Bryant, 3 Scott, 238, 2 Bing. N. C. 735; Williams v. Byrne, 11 W. R. 487, 1 Moore P. C. C. N. S. 154; Reuss v. Pickslay, 14 W. R. 924, L. R. 1 Ex. 342, which were all cases on the Statute of Frauds. An offer made in writing and afterwards accepted by parol will bind as a contract under the Statute of Frauds, for it is "quite a fallacy to suppose that because certain acts happen at different periods they cannot be so connected as to form one transaction" per Willes, J., in Reuss v. Pickslay. When the shares allotted and issued by the new company to Mr. Menzies were accepted by him the document of the 28th of September became a contract in writing as from its date. Again, the document of the 28th of September may be treated as an acceptance by the new company of the terms, as to the issue of shares, which Mr. Menzies had previously assented to. The document which has been registered, at all events, satisfies the object of section 25, as it gives the names and addresses of all the persons to whom these shares were issued, and the number of shares issued to each, and the amount which was to be credited as paid up on each.

COTTON, L.J.—The question is whether Mr. Menzies has contracted and agreed with the New Eberhardt Co. to take from it certain fully paid-up shares—i.e., shares which in law could have no further claim made upon them. But he says that section 25 of the Act of 1867 has not been complied with because there has not been, before the shares were issued, a registration of such an agreement as is required by the statute, and what the statute requires is this. [The Lord Justice read section 25, and continued:—].

The question upon which this turns is, whether, before the issue of the shares, there was a contract duly made in writing and registered with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies?

What has been done here may have been perfectly honest and well-intentioned, but I am afraid there has not been a compliance with the statute.

There had been a proposal in the winding up of the old company to transfer all the assets of the old company to the new company on certain terms—viz., that the debenture-holders of the old company were to have 5s. shares, fully paid up, in the new company for the amount of their debentures. The law has enabled that to be done, provided there was a special resolution passed by the debenture-holders, and that was done—that is to say, the debenture-holders authorized the directors of the old company to make a contract with the new company, and to transfer to the new company the property of the old company on those terms, and the present appellant assented to that. Then what was done? A memorandum of agreement was prepared, which recited a contract between the new company and the liquidator of the old company, and then went on in this way:—"And in pursuance of the said agreement"—that is, the agreement between the new company and the liquidator of the old company—"and of such request and direction of the liquidator, as aforesaid, the new company shall allot and issue to the persons named in the schedule hereto the number of shares set opposite their respective names in the 4th column of the schedule and credited as having the full sum of five shillings per share paid up thereon; and it is hereby agreed and declared that the shares included in the schedule so to be allotted as aforesaid are to be held as shares upon which the full sum of 5s. per share has been paid."

Now, this memorandum of agreement, this document, which was the thing that was registered, in my opinion contained no agreement at all; but I think it contained an offer to give all the debenture-holders named in the schedule fully paid-up shares to the amount standing to their names, and as soon as that offer was accepted by the debenture-holders then there became, no doubt, a contract between them and the new company in the terms of, and in accordance with, this memorandum.

But I cannot see that there is anything here which can amount to a contract in writing registered. What, in fact, was it that was registered? As I have before said, it was merely an offer made by the new company to issue shares as fully paid up to those persons named in the schedule who would come in to accept them. Now I cannot see how that can be, within the words of section 25, "a contract made in writing and filed with the registrar at or before the issuing of such shares."

At the time when this was filed there had been no acceptance by any person to whom it was intended to issue these paid up shares, and therefore there was then no contract at all.

I doubt whether there would have been a "contract made in writing," even although a contract had been made by reason of the acceptance by those persons of the terms offered. The words of section 25 are, "a contract made in writing," and that is very different from the terms of the Statute of Frauds, because what that statute says is, that no action shall be brought unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, "or some note or memorandum thereof," be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith. It may be—though I do not intend to express any opinion as to that—that in accordance with the decisions on the Statute of Frauds there might be a memorandum in writing within the meaning of that statute, although there had been no acceptance in writing, but merely an acceptance arising from acts or circumstances that were held to amount to an acceptance. Those cases turned, however, on the words, "a note or memorandum in writing of the agreement." In one of those cases (Reuss v. Picksley) it was held that there was an agreement constituted by acts and circumstances which amounted to an acceptance of an offer made in writing, and, there being an agreement, it was held that there was, within the Statute of Frauds, a good memorandum in writing of the agreement, because all the terms were stated in the document. That was apparently the ground upon which the court decided the case, for Willes, J., said, "All difficulty as to the terms of the proposal is out of the case. It contained the names of the parties and all the terms by reference to the letter of the 8th of September, which must be taken to be recited in the letter of the 9th. The only question is, whether it is sufficient to satisfy the statute that the party charged should sign what he proposed as an agreement, and that the other party should afterwards assent, without writing, to the proposal? As to this it is clear, both on reasoning and authority, that the proposal so signed and assented to does become a memorandum or note of an agreement within the 4th section of the statute." But in the present case the words of the statute are not "an agreement in writing or some note or memorandum of an agreement in writing," but "an agreement made in writing." That is something very different from a memorandum thereof made in writing, and in my opinion it is impossible to say that, when at the time of registration of this document there was only, in fact, an offer, there was an agreement made in writing at or before the issue of the shares, and which was registered at or before the issue of the shares.

But then it was ingeniously suggested by Mr. Grosvenor Woods that the document of the 28th of September was not a proposal at all, but was in fact an acceptance by the company of a proposal previously made by the shareholders, and assented to by the appellant. But as I understand the facts, what the appellant assented to at the general meeting was the resolution authorizing the liquidator to enter into this agreement with the new company. That was not a proposal made by the debenture-holders to the new company, it was merely that they gave authority to the liquidator to make the proposal to the new company, and, in my opinion, the document registered does not purport to be an acceptance of any offer made by the debenture-holders so as to constitute an agreement made in writing within the requirements of section 25. In my opinion, in the present case, there being merely a proposal made in writing by the company, it cannot be considered to be an "agreement made in writing" within section 25, or that that section has been complied with.

In my opinion, therefore, an order ought to be made that the name of the appellant be taken off the register of shareholders.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only express my individual view because we are differing from the learned judge in the court below.

For the reasons given by Cotton, L.J., it is plain that the document which has been registered is not an acceptance by the company of an offer by the appellant. There was no offer capable of being accepted made by the appellant to the company, but only a consent given by him to a resolution which authorized the agreement between the two companies.

If this document which has been filed is not the acceptance of an offer already made, what is it? It is an offer, and only an offer, duly made in writing, and filed while it was only an offer. The offer being something short of a complete contract, it was not a complete contract when it was filed. It is true that it did afterwards turn into a contract when it was accepted, but it did not, I think, turn into a contract duly made in writing, and it certainly did not turn into a contract duly made in writing at the time this document was filed, because it only became a contract long after the document was filed.

It is obvious, therefore, that, unless we are to fritter away this section by putting a forced construction upon it, the section has not been complied with. I regret this judgment for the reasons given in the argument by Cotton, L.J. I think it is a most unfortunate slip, and that in substance the object of the Act has been fulfilled, though the requirements of the Act have not been complied with. But we must see that the Act of Parliament is carried out in its letter as well as in its spirit.

The cases on the Statute of Frauds can have nothing to do with this case, and it would not follow, even if this were held to be a contract within the Statute of Frauds, that the contract dealt with by this section may not be different. Reuss v. Picksley, and the case of Smith v. Neale, 5 W. R. 563, 2 C. B. N. S. 67, which preceded it, were not decisions that the documents amounted to a contract, but only that they amounted to a memorandum of a contract. We are bound by Reuss v. Picksley, and that case no doubt pushed the literal construction of the Statute of Frauds to a limit, beyond which it would perhaps be not easy to go; but unless we found the language of the Statute of Frauds repeated in this section, we should not be bound by Reuss v. Picksley, and if we were to follow it we should be following that which has not a real analogy.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, requires certain conditions to exempt shares from liability to be paid for in cash.

Now, those conditions are as follows: The existence, at or before the date of the issue of these shares, first, of a contract; secondly, that the contract be duly made in writing; and, thirdly, that the contract be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies.

Now, all these things must be done or be in existence at or before the date of the issue of the shares. You cannot have a contract filed before the issue of the shares if it is not a contract till after the issue of the shares. You cannot have it duly made in writing at that time unless it has been made before the issue of the shares. All these things, therefore, must be done at or before that time.

Now, what we have here is this. There was a contract between the old and the new company, which provided for the issue of these shares, but that was never registered; therefore, that is out of the question. But instead of that a certain memorandum of agreement of the 28th of September, 1888, was filed with the registrar.

Now, that purported to be between the new company and the several persons whose names and addresses are set forth in the schedule thereto. Not one of these persons, however, signed that agreement; not one of them is shown to have given any assent to the agreement until, by the acceptance of the shares after issue, they may be said to have concurred in the agreement.

It appears to me, therefore, that at the time of the issue of the shares there was no contract between the parties as to the terms of this instrument, and still less was there any contract duly made in writing.

Now, it is to be observed that we have been asked to attend to cases on the Statute of Frauds, but nothing can be more different than the language of this statute and the language of the Statute of Frauds. That is satisfied if the contract be in writing, or if the memorandum of the contract be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith; but here the contract must be made in writing, by which I understand that both parties to the contract must signify their assent to the terms of it in writing, and that, without going beyond the writing, you can see the existence of the contract between the contracting parties. That is the ground on which it appears to me that we cannot convert this document into a contract satisfying the language used in the section, by reason of the subsequent acceptance of its terms by some of the persons making the contract.

But then it is said that this document is not an offer by the company, but is an acceptance by the company of an offer previously made by the shareholders. But the misfortune of that is, that this document does not contain any writing stating the offer. It does not purport to be an acceptance of the offer; it proceeds on an entirely different footing. Therefore, if it were the fact that there were any such offer (and I agree in thinking there was not) this document contains no embodiment of such offer, and, therefore, is not a contract duly made in writing, by reason of the proposals of the shareholders.

I regret to have to come to this conclusion, because the document registered is an honest one, and one obviously disclosing the real transaction between the parties.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Snell, Son, & Greenip.

From Lancaster Palatine Ct. of Chan. } Aug. 2, 1889.

PROCTOR v. BAYLEY. (a.)

Patent — Infringement — Infringement discontinued before action brought—Intention to infringe—Injunction—Damages.

An injunction against the infringement of a patent will not be granted where, though there has been an infringement, it has been discontinued several years before action brought, and there is no intention or probability of a renewal of the wrongful user.

In 1882 A. commenced using experimentally certain machines supplied by B. In 1883, A. being dissatisfied with the machines, the user was discontinued and never resumed, and B. was requested to remove them, which he did in 1885. In 1887 C. obtained a judgment against B. that the machines were an infringement of C.'s patent, and shortly afterwards C. claimed royalties from A. for the use of the machines supplied by B. A. replied that he was not using, and had no intention of using, either B.'s or C.'s machines, and stated the circumstances under which he had formerly used them. In 1888 C. brought an action against A. for an injunction and account of damages. A., by his defence, denied infringement, and stated that, if there had ever been infringement, it had been discontinued long before the action, and that there was no threat or intention to infringe in the future.

Held, reversing the decision of Bristowe, V.C., that, though there had been an infringement, the circumstances were such as not to afford any inference that the infringement was likely to be repeated, and, therefore, an injunction ought not to be granted; consequently, this being a Palatine case, to which the Judicature Acts did not apply, damages could not be given except under Cairns's Act, under which they can only be given where there is a proper case for an injunction.

Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, and Geary v. Norton, 1 De G. & S. 9, distinguished.

Appeal from Bristowe, V.C., of the Lancaster Palatine Court of Chancery.

The plaintiff was the owner of a patent for machines (for feeding furnaces) known as "automatic stokers." A Mr. Bennis had induced the defendants in 1882 to try some of his "automatic stokers," on the terms that he was not to be paid for them unless the defendants found them satisfactory. The defendants not being satisfied with the working of the machines, requested Bennis to remove them, and in the meantime discontinued using them, and placed them in their yard. They were never used again, and were removed by Bennis early in 1885. The present plaintiff brought an action against Bennis (Proctor v. Bennis, 36 W. R. 456, 36 Ch. D. 740) on the ground that Bennis's "stokers" were an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, and he obtained judgment in that action in February, 1887. In the following month he applied to the present defendants, claiming a royalty from them for having used the "stokers" supplied by Bennis. The defendants intimated in reply that they used neither the plaintiff's nor Bennis's stokers, and did not intend to use them. There was some further correspondence, which ended with a denial by the defendants that they had used or were using any machine which infringed the plaintiff's patent, or that they were under any liability to him.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, in January, 1888, commenced this action in the Palatine Court of the Duchy of Lancaster, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing his patent, and an account of profits or damages. In their defence the defendants, while admitting the validity of the patent, denied their user of any machines which were an infringement of it. Alternatively, they said if they had used any such machines it had been done in ignorance of the plaintiff's patent, and only experimentally, that the experiment having been a failure they had discontinued the user years before this action was commenced, and they had not threatened and had no intention to use any such machines in future.

Bristowe, V.C., granted an injunction, and directed an inquiry as to damages, ordering the defendants to pay the costs of the action.

The defendants appealed.

Romer, Q.C., Rotch, and Stoffurth, for the appellants.—The judge was over-persuaded in the reply by the case of Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. & Cr. 338; but the present case is different. Here there had been no infringement for years before action brought, and there was no intention or threat to infringe, and consequently there was no ground for an injunction. As to damages in lieu of an injunction, the case of Ferguson v. Wilson, 15 W. R. 80, L. R. 2 Ch. 77, is in point as showing they cannot be given under Lord Cairns's Act in a case like this where the plaintiff was not entitled to equitable relief. An account in equity cannot be ordered where an injunction cannot be granted: Baily v. Taylor, 1 Russ. & My. 73. An injunction ought not to have been granted in a court of equity to restrain a party from doing what he does not threaten or intend to do: Stannard v. Vestry of St. Giles, 30 W. R. 693, 20 Ch. D. 190. In that case there had been a threat or intention to infringe, but it had been abandoned. In Geary v. Norton, 1 De G. & S. 9, on which, and Millington v. Fox, the Vice-Chancellor relied, there actually was an infringement. In Millington v. Fox, which was a trade-mark case, the defendants had used the plaintiff's trade-marks on steel bars in ignorance of the plaintiff's rights, and though the defendants abandoned their user when they found the marks were private property, and offered to pay compensation, that was not till after action brought, and the Lord Chancellor granted the injunction but gave no costs. So far from supporting his case, Millington v. Fox is really against the plaintiff. There the judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs under the circumstances required and were entitled to the protection of an injunction. Here it cannot be so, as the defendants wrote (in answer to a complaint by the plaintiff) that they were not using any of the plaintiff's machines, infringing his patent or intending to do so. Geary v. Norton merely decided that plaintiffs were not bound to rely on assurances by defendants that they would not infringe again when they had already wilfully infringed.

They also cited Caldwell v. Vanvlissengen, 9 Ha. 415, on the same point.

Moulton, Q.C., and Maberly, for the respondent.—The plaintiff established at the trial the fact of the infringement by the defendants of his rights under the patent, and the denial by the defendants of the extent and scope of those rights, and their refusal to pay damages before action brought. The plaintiff was thus obliged to prove that the articles used by the defendants were within the scope of the patent. [FRY, L.J.—Was there any ground for believing at the time of the trial that the defendants would continue their infringements? Infringements discontinued years before would not justify an injunction.] What difference does it make whether you deny the validity of the patent or deny that the machines used are within the patent? The defendants claimed to use them as of right. The assertion of the right to use them is inconsistent with absolute certainty of the user not being repeated. There is no case which shows that the plaintiff must prove affirmatively that the defendants will repeat the offence. The user was discontinued, not because it was an infringement, but because the machines, being badly managed, wasted coal. [They referred to Geary v. Norton and Losh v. Hague, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 200.] As to the question whether an injunction ought to have been granted, the position of the defendants here was very similar to that of the defendants in Millington v. Fox.

Romer replied on the question of costs only.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application by way of appeal from a judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster granting an injunction and an inquiry as to damages. The action was brought on the ground that the defendants had infringed the plaintiff's patent. They did infringe it. Is there ground here to justify the exercise of the extraordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in granting an injunction? It is not enough for that purpose that a man has done a wrong, as the injured person may get damages for the wrong. But in a proper case the court says: We will do more than that—where a wrongful act is threatened and intended we will prevent it being done by granting an injunction beforehand to stop it. Now that all the superior courts exercise the same jurisdiction, the distinction between the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and of the common law courts is apt to be lost sight of. The Palatine Court of Chancery, however (unlike the Chancery Division of the High Court), having only the old jurisdiction in equity, can only give damages where the case is one for an injunction. In the present case, therefore, it becomes necessary to consider whether the order for an injunction can be sustained. Where a person has done a wrongful act there is a primâ facie ground for an injunction, because a presumption is afforded that he will go on doing it. Similarly the patentee may be entitled to an injunction if, though there has been no infringement in the past, there is proof of an intention to infringe in the future.

But here, though the defendants did infringe the patent, we must consider all the circumstances of the case to see whether the court ought to draw the inference that an injunction is necessary in order to prevent the wrongful act being repeated. The defendants here are not manufacturers or vendors, but merely persons who have used the patent stokers. When did they use them? It was a long time ago. They have discontinued the user ever since 1883. That user, when it occurred and while it lasted, was no doubt a wrongful act as against the plaintiff, and an infringement of his patent. It was, however, discontinued because the defendants found the patent stokers useless. Then, that being the case, is there any probability that there will be a repetition of the act? I think the answer must be that there is not. The strong point against the defendants is the course they took both before and after the action was brought.

The first letter rather puts the matter as if the infringement were being continued, asking for the payment of a moderate royalty, and threatening proceedings if that is declined. Now before writing in that strain the plaintiff ought to have made inquiries as to when and under what circumstances the user had occurred. I cannot, however, commend the answer to that letter, for it refrains from giving information which would probably, if given, have put a stop to the bringing of the action. What it said was that the defendants were not using the plaintiff's patent and had no intention of using it. Now, if the plaintiff had, after receiving that answer made inquiries, he would have ascertained that it was four years since the defendants had used the patent stokers. In August the defendants wrote to the plaintiff informing him, in reply to his circular, that Mr. Bennis's stokers had been used by them but not found satisfactory. I do not think that was the letter of persons desirous of avoiding litigation, which might probably have been averted if there had been a greater desire to avert it. Then we come to the defence, which, the action having been brought to get damages and an injunction, does not take the course it ought to have taken, because it disputes the fact of infringement, and thus implicitly denies the plaintiff's right, but no intention was expressed or implied to continue the wrongful act. The plaintiff relies on the denial of his right by the defendants as showing their intention to continue the wrongful act. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that it afforded no inference of their intention to continue the act, though it might have done so had they been manufacturers of the machines, and, in my opinion, no inference could be drawn from it that the summary action of the Court of Chancery was required to protect the plaintiff from injury. There is no ground for the plaintiff coming here to claim protection by the exercise of this extraordinary jurisdiction of a court of equity because there is really nothing to be protected from. But the Vice-Chancellor seems to have thought he was bound by the reported cases, and especially by the decision in Millington v. Fox, where the defendants had probably used the plaintiff's trade-mark in ignorance, and did not intend to use it again. But in that case the natural inference from the defendants' conduct, so far as it was within the plaintiff's knowledge, at the time the bill was filed, was that they did intend to continue the user. That being so, and it being shown that the defendants had stamped the plaintiff's mark on their steel bars, the court might have drawn the inference that the defendants there were selling the steel and not merely manufacturing it at that time. If there had been anything to lead to the inference that the defendants here intended to continue the user of the patent stokers the injunction would have been rightly granted, but I do not think that was so in this case.

Then in Geary v. Norton one of the defendants, though knowing of the patent, offered to sell the shawls which infringed the plaintiff's rights at two-thirds less than the patentees' price, and the proper inference was that there was a probability of the wrong act being repeated, and that the plaintiffs would not be safe unless protected by an injunction. In my opinion, on the facts of the present case we ought not to infer that there was any intention to continue the infringement, and, therefore, I think the Vice-Chancellor was wrong in granting the injunction.

Then, in the Palatine Court of Chancery there is no jurisdiction to give damages except under Lord Cairns's Act, and under that Act damages can only be given where an injunction might be granted; but where there is no case for an injunction damages cannot be given under that Act. There being no case for an injunction here, we cannot give damages. And we cannot give damages under the old common law practice where the plaintiff has brought an action for equitable relief to which he is not entitled. However, the defendants have so acted here as not to deserve costs below, but as the appeal is successful they must have the costs of that.

FRY, L.J.—In this case the Vice-Chancellor granted an order for an injunction, and further directed an inquiry as to damages. Now he had no jurisdiction to give damages in an action like this; except as in lieu of, or in addition to, an injunction under Lord Cairns's Act. The question as to whether damages could be given therefore depends on whether this was a proper case for an injunction. The defendants are not manufacturers or vendors of the articles which infringed the plaintiff's patent—they are merely persons who have used those articles, and that only on one occasion which was nearly five years ago. They have never used them again, and the reason they abandoned the use of them was because they did not answer. They are, therefore, not at all likely to repeat the act. That being so, ought an injunction to be granted? An injunction is intended to prevent injury, and not to protect rights, except so far as you protect rights by preventing wrongs. I think, therefore, there is no ground here for an injunction. What was most strongly pressed upon us was that the defendants asserted, even in their written defence, that they had a right to use the articles, but, in my opinion, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, there is no real probability of a repetition of the offence, though the defendants may have been foolish or ill-advised enough to make that assertion. The claim for an injunction fails, and with it that for damages. The plaintiff himself assesses the damages at a sum of £40, and instead of bringing an action at common law, he actually puts in motion all the machinery of a patent action in the Palatine Court of Chancery. There is nothing in the conduct of the defendants to support such a proceeding.

LOPES, L.J.—The wrongful act complained of here had been discontinued five years before action brought, and no repetition of it, or threat of repetition, has since taken place. If there were nothing more than this it would be abundantly clear that there was no case for an injunction. But the defendants challenged the plaintiff's right, and even up to and at the time of the trial they never admitted that they had infringed it. I have felt great doubt whether an inference ought not to be drawn from that conduct of theirs that a repetition of the infringement was probable. If so, the plaintiff would, I think, be entitled to the protection of an injunction. However, the rest of the court who are most likely much more familiar with this jurisdiction, do not take that view, and therefore, though I arrive at their conclusion with considerable doubt, I do not dissent from them.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Dangerfield & Blythe, for John Hall, Son, & Lord, Manchester; A. McDonald Blair, Manchester.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 27.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. EMERSON. (a.)

Practice — Stay of proceedings pending appeal—Discretion of court—Ord. 58, r. 16.

There is, and there can be, no practice to limit the absolute discretion given to the court by order 58, r. 16, to grant or refuse a stay of proceedings pending an appeal.

Application for a stay of proceedings pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the applicant.—It is an established and universal practice in such cases to stay proceedings unless the solicitor to the respondents will give his personal undertaking to return the costs in the event of the appeal being successful: Merry v. Nickalls, 21 W. R. 305, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 205; Grant v. Banque Franco-Egyptienne, 26 W. R. 669, 3 C. P. D. 202; Morgan v. Elford, 25 W. R. 136, 4 Ch. D. 352; Wilson v. Church, 27 W. R. 843, 11 Ch. D. 576.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Stuart Moore, for the respondents.—There is no such practice as is suggested. The court has an absolute discretion, under ord. 58, r. 16, to grant or refuse the stay.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case application is made to the court to stay proceedings under ord. 58, r. 16. That rule is in the following terms:—"An appeal shall not operate as a stay of execution or of proceedings under the decision appealed from, except so far as the court appealed from, or any judge thereof, or the Court of Appeal may order."

Now, it is contended for the Crown that, whether there are any special circumstances or not, there is a universal practice in this court to stay execution for costs pending an appeal to the House of Lords, unless the solicitor will give his personal undertaking to return the costs in the event of that appeal being successful. Cases have been cited, and expressions of judges have been relied upon, to show that the court has laid down and established this practice. As to any expressions used by the judges before the Judicature Act, I think that they are absolutely immaterial. The rule has been made since those expressions, and it is a valid and binding rule. I cannot think that any of the expressions which have been used since the making of the rule are meant to convey that there is any practice of the kind suggested. The question really turns on the true construction of the rule. It is clear that the rule gives the court a discretion—that is to say, of course, a judicial discretion—to grant or refuse a stay. If any such practice as was suggested had been established, it would be a limitation of the discretion given by the rule. No court has any authority to lay down such a practice to alter the rule. The rule alone is binding on the court, and there is no such practice as is contended for; but the court has an absolute discretion to grant or refuse the application according to the circumstances of each case.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I protest against the notion of limiting, by the practice of the court, the absolute discretion given by the rule. If a discretion is given to any court, it is their bounden duty to exercise it, and it is not competent to them to limit that exercise by laying down any rules of practice. No doubt this is often done, and saves trouble; but, in my opinion, it is entirely and utterly wrong. There is, and there can be, no such practice as that contended for by the Attorney-General. The rule gives a discretion, which must be exercised on the circumstances of each case.

LOPES, L.J.—The application is made under ord. 58, r. 16. According to my mind the interpretation of that rule is clear. The court has an absolute judicial discretion to grant or refuse the stay, and it would, in my opinion, be in contravention of the rule were we to hold that there was any practice limiting that discretion.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

Solicitor for the respondents, F. E. Goodhart.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 13.

PRAED v. GRAHAM. (a.)

Practice—New trial—Action of libel—Excessive damages—Principle upon which new trial granted.

In an action ex delicto in the nature of an action of libel a new trial ought not to be granted on the ground that the damages are excessive unless the court comes to the conclusion, upon all the circumstances, that the damages awarded by the jury are so large that no twelve reasonable men could have given them.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, refusing a new trial in an action of libel.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £500. The defendant moved for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were excessive. The Divisional Court (Field and Manisty, JJ.) refused the application. The defendant appealed.

Fillan, for the appellant.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Atherley Jones, for the respondent.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The rule of conduct upon which the court acts when it is asked to set aside the verdict of a jury in an action ex delicto in the nature of an action for libel on the ground that the damages are excessive, seems to me to be the same as that upon which the court acts when asked to set aside a verdict on the ground that it is against the weight of evidence. The rule may be stated thus:—If the court comes to the conclusion, having all the facts and circumstances before it, that the damages are so large that no twelve reasonable men could have given them, then the court ought to interfere and set aside the verdict. But if, on the other hand, the court should come to the conclusion that, though the damages are larger than the court, if it was acting as a jury, would give, yet it could not say that they are so large that no twelve reasonable men could have given them, then the court cannot interfere with the verdict. That, in my opinion, is the general principle, and all the special grounds for disturbing a verdict, such as the jury having misconceived the facts, or having been carried away by the speeches of counsel, will be found to come within the above rule. The same principle was stated in other language by Fitzgerald, B., and adopted by Palles, C.B., in M'Grath v. Bourne, 10 Ir. Rep. C. L. 160, 24 W. R. Dig. 131, that to render the damages excessive "the amount should be such that no reasonable proportion existed between it and the circumstances of the case." [His lordship then came to the conclusion, upon all the facts, that the verdict should not be set aside, and that the appeal should be dismissed.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot say that twelve men could not have reasonably given £500 damages.

LOPES, L.J.—In an action of libel there is no exact measure of damages. The damages are at large in the discretion of the jury. To enable the court to grant a new trial it is not sufficient for the court to say that the damages are larger than they would themselves have given. The court must come to the conclusion that the damages are so obviously unreasonable as to lead to the conclusion that no twelve reasonable men could have given them.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, White & De Buriatte.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. Bohm.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

boats. This would in practice be useless unless the right extended above, at least, ordinary high-water mark, and, seeing this, and the possibility of more difficult questions arising respecting the shore below that line, I suggested to the plaintiff's counsel that it would be as well to limit his claim to an injunction to the soil above it. This he properly conceded—not by way of abandonment of his larger claim, but as sufficiently meeting the exigency of the present case—on the understanding that words should be inserted in the judgment to prevent the concession from being cited against him hereafter. I see no answer to the plaintiff's claim thus limited. He admits, as he was bound to do, that, deriving title to the foreshore by royal grant, he can claim nothing that was not originally vested in the Crown, and that paramount to the right of the Crown in the open sea is the right of the public to navigate and fish.

It has long been settled that this right does not extend to places only occasionally covered by water, and the necessity of laying down some rule of reasonable certainty has introduced one which fully supports the claim just mentioned. It was solemnly decided in Attorney-General v. Chambers, in 1854, and it has never since been questioned, that the average of the medium tides in each quarter of a lunar revolution during the year gives the limit in the absence of usage to the rights of the Crown on the seashore. There is here no evidence of usage to interfere with the application of this rule. Instances have no doubt been mentioned of fishing vessels having been drawn, not only up, but over the Chesil Beach, but this has occurred only in stress of weather, actual or imminent—that is, under circumstances sufficient to repel usage even if they did not imply that peril or necessity which has ever been admitted to justify interference with proprietary rights. I take it, therefore, to be clear that whatever the rights of the plaintiff may be below the line of the ordinary high-water mark, as defined in the case above quoted, no right can be asserted against him above that line. The title of the public, which is paramount to that of the Crown, can only extend as far as the title of the Crown itself, and the grantee of the Crown, if he can be in no better position than his grantor, cannot, without special reasons, of which there is not a trace here, be placed in a worse one.

There remains the principal point in the case, and to my mind the only one presenting any real difficulty. The defendants claim to pass at their pleasure in suitable craft over the waters of the Fleet, including that part which alone the plaintiff seeks to protect—viz., that situate between Reed's End and a point 250 yards to the west of the Abbotsbury Stone. They disclaim all right or intention to enter within the limits of the decoy or to disturb the swans, and, further, they profess to care for the privilege claimed only for the purpose of carrying their fish from spots at which they happen to land them to the shore of the mainland; but their position, if tenable at all, can be so only on the footing of this water being navigable as of right—that is, open to all her Majesty's subjects. So far as any argument was made in support of a different position—that is, in favour of fishermen or a class of fishermen—it is disposed of by the remarks above made on the evidence of custom, which are equally applicable to this part of the case. The question in dispute admits of being thus plainly and tersely stated. Is the water of the Fleet within the specified limits navigable or not? If it be navigable in the proper sense in which that word is used concerning legal rights over water, the defendants are entitled to judgment. If, on the other hand, it be not in that sense navigable, they certainly fail. It becomes, therefore, important to determine the proper meaning of the word "navigable." Mr. Crackanthorpe, in reply, invited me to hold that the definition of "foreshore" must determine what is navigable, and that, if any water, or rather land covered with water, cannot properly be styled foreshore, neither can it be properly styled navigable. It is a tempting argument, because offering an easy method of solving a troublesome question. About the limits of the foreshore there is no doubt, and if I could have securely taken those limits as my infallible and only guide, there would have been no occasion for any further argument on this part of the case. I am not, however, satisfied that this is enough.

It is of course of the first importance to bear in mind not merely the rule respecting the limits of foreshore, but the more general doctrine on which that rule rests, and to use that rule in applying the doctrine to the question of navigability. But I think that one must go further back and not be content with the rule as being itself the only guide. The defendants point out that the plaintiff, while insisting that this water is not navigable, seeks to restrain them from navigating it, and that although it may be, and is, the fact that this water does not admit navigation by their ordinary fishing boats, to say nothing of vessels of larger draught, yet it can be navigated by those lighter boats which they find convenient to their trade purposes, and which are adapted to water of this particular character and depth. In short, they say that, being navigable by craft suited to the circumstances, it cannot be said to be not navigable at all. The answer to this plausible argument is that, as stated in Murphy v. Ryan, the word navigable has a popular and also a legal and technical meaning, and that this legal and technical meaning, although no doubt essentially requiring navigation to be possible, requires also something more—namely, the ebb and flow of the tide. The history of this limit of distinction between waters which are technically navigable and those which are not, is far too long and intricate for examination here. Such an examination would involve reference to many ancient writers, such as Lord Coke and Lord Hale, supplemented by others who have contributed much learning on those and other serious branches of law—as, for instance, Mr. Angell, the 13th chapter of whose work on watercourses, contrasting as it does the laws of England and America, deserves more attention than I have been able to give to it, and Chancellor Kent, whose commentaries have often been quoted in connection with this subject. He devotes a section in the second part of his commentaries to the division line, which has exercised the minds of many writers, between the jurisdiction of the Admiralty and of courts of common law. That division line has had something to do with the matter in hand, and so has also the broad common-sense which so often underlies the principles of English law and their application to the affairs of daily life. I am far from saying that the legal and technical meaning of "navigable" has been plainly rested upon any such practical reason as that navigation is impossible for any useful purpose of trade or commerce except where the tide ebbs and flows; but yet I cannot read any of the numerous treatises, whether in text-book or judicial decisions on the subject, without concluding that this practical reason is at the bottom of it. That is borne out by the legal meaning (for these words also have a legal meaning) of ebb and flow. Those who have framed the law of England on this subject—I speak principally, of course of the two great men above mentioned—saw the absurdity of treating as subject for this purpose to the ebb and flow of the tide, such land as is occasionally covered with water, but is during the greater part of the year dry.

They have, therefore, excluded from the meaning of these words not merely those exceptional tides which occur, it may be, only twice or thrice in the year, but also those high tides which recur more often, and have limited them to what are sometimes called average, sometimes ordinary, tides, and have been more than ence precisely defined—e.g., in Attorney-General v. Chambers. It is useless to multiply illustrations, but some will be found in the following cases:—Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, Blundell v. Catterall, The King v. Mountague, and Pearce v. Scotcher, 9 Q. B. D. 162—a case where the law is raised and stated somewhat differently, but substantially on the same lines. Neither to these nor to any other authorities do I propose to refer again. Seldom, I suppose, have so many been cited, even in a case of importance, and yet none been irrelevant. With such industry and zeal as the opportunities at my disposal and the season of the year permitted, I have angled in all these waters, and in some others, which, though not specified by counsel, were probably in their minds. Like the inhabitants of Chickerell and the neighbouring villages, I have, as regards many of them, been only more or less a fisherman, but, like them also, my occupation has not been without profit. There are not wanting passages in some of the books already quoted, and others, that to arms and creeks of the sea there may be applied, as one might naturally expect, considerations different from those applicable to the open sea beating against the main shore. And these considerations might possibly justify an easier conclusion against the defendants as regards the Fleet, or at least the part of it here in question, than if they were asserting rights over the open sea. But it is unnecessary to pursue this.

The result of the evidence is, in my judgment, adverse to them, even on the assumption that what they call the Little Sea ought to be treated on the same footing as the Great Sea, and I prefer to make that assumption in their favour. What is the evidence? On the part of the defendants there is little enough. Of the many witnesses called on their behalf some professedly knew nothing about tides, and those who knew anything at all had so limited the scope of their observations that they could afford me but little assistance. This makes me the more regret that the defendants were not afforded an opportunity of witnessing and, if they pleased, taking part in the experiments made on behalf of the plaintiff. I repeat what I have already said, in this case and in others, that if, whenever a party, plaintiff or defendant, intends to adduce evidence requiring experiments, measurements, or other applications of practical science, he offered his opponent an opportunity of participating in the process on fair terms, he would assist the court and advance the administration of justice without risk of injury to himself. According to my experience he would, in a large majority of cases, thereby gain some advantage. Here the experiments were made without any such offer, and the result is to make them less valuable than they might well have been, and to lay them fairly open to the criticisms of the defendants' counsel. It occurred to me that some independent observation would be useful, if not necessary; but, having regard to what really is absence of contradiction on the part of the defendants, and the confirmatory evidence on the part of the plaintiff, I hold those made, which I have no doubt were fairly made, sufficient. The confirmatory evidence is that of persons who have at different times seen dry portions of the land alleged to be covered with navigable water. That, of course, might be possible and yet the water be navigable, but the evidence goes to this—that the land was dry for days together, and that, I think, excludes the notion of navigability. Whether the water is more properly styled brackish, or salt, I cannot determine, but if it be really salt I am not disposed to attribute much importance, still less draw any concluded inference from the fact, remembering that under certain conditions, which must frequently recur, there is a supply of sea water coming through or over the beach. Taking all the evidence together, it has proved to my satisfaction, and I must hold, that so much of the Fleet as is in question, is not a creek or arm of the sea in which the tide ordinarily ebbs and flows. Variations there are, partly due to land streams or other causes, either constant or of frequent occurrence, but there is no diurnal ebb and flow. I must, therefore, hold that it is not navigable, and therefore also that the defendants have no right to pass over it, or, in other words, that the defendants or other persons passing over it without the plaintiff's licence are trespassers. If my view of the law and the result of the evidence be correct, this conclusion is inevitable.

My duty is to decide irrespective of consequences; but yet I am not sorry to think, as the evidence has convinced me I fairly may, that in restraining interference with the plaintiff's private property I shall not really be checking a useful industry or a means of livelihood. I am far from saying that the issue between the plaintiff and defendants is not of real importance. No doubt it is; and as, notwithstanding some irritability in the past, the defendants have assisted me to determine that issue unincumbered with smaller and comparatively trivial points, I should have been disposed to have relieved them from the costs of an adverse judgment. I am pleased to be able to follow my own bent with the assent of the plaintiff. My judgment will take the following form:—The defendants by their counsel disclaiming any intention to enter the plaintiff's decoy (which may be described by reference to one of the plans in evidence) or to disturb or injure the swans frequenting the Fleet, and the plaintiff by his counsel not asking as against the defendants or for the purposes of the present action any greater relief than hereinafter mentioned, restrain the defendants, &c., from (1) trespassing on the plaintiff's soil called the Chesil Beach, between Reed's End and the point 250 yards to the west of the Abbotsbury Stone (which limits can be defined also by reference to one of the exhibited plans); (2) stationing or maintaining fishing or other boats above the line of ordinary high-water mark within the limits aforesaid; (3) passing in boats or otherwise over the water or land of the Fleet within the same limits. No order as to costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Fladgates.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pitts & Savage, for Budge & Slade, Wareham and Swanage.

Q. B. Div. (Huddleston, B., and Stephen, J.) Nov. 4.

Chamberlain v. Stoneham. (a.)

Costs—Witness in bankruptcy—Allowance to—Solicitor—Loss of time—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 71—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 16.

The decision in Collins v. Godefroy, 1 B. & Ad. 950, that an attorney who has attended on subpœna as a witness in a civil suit cannot maintain an action against the party who subpœnaed him for compensation for loss of time, does not interfere with the statutory right of a witness in a bankruptcy proceeding to payment for expenses and loss of time.

Appeal from the Shoreditch County Court.

The plaintiff was a solicitor, and attended before the registrar in the Barnet County Court on the summons of the official receiver to give evidence in certain bankruptcy proceedings as to alleged dealings of the bankrupt with his property. He was given 3s. 6d. as travelling expenses, but before being sworn asked for the usual allowance for a professional witness. The registrar thought the 3s. 6d. sufficient, and the plaintiff gave his evidence, and afterwards brought this action against the official receiver for £1 10s., his costs as a witness.

(a.) Reported by T. R. Colquhoun Dill, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge, on the authority of Collins v. Godefroy, 1 B. & Ad. 950, dismissed the action, with costs, and gave leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

R. S. Wright, for the plaintiff.—Although Collins v. Godefroy may have been rightly decided in 1831, the law is now altered, and under the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 16, and the scale thereto, and the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 71, the plaintiff is entitled to an allowance for loss of time.

Mattinson, for the defendant.—The plaintiff's remedy was not by action in another county court, but by appeal from the registrar to the judge of the court at which he had attended. He might have done this by refusing to be sworn. On the authority of Collins v. Godefroy he is only entitled to recover his out-of-pocket expenses.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The only difficulty in this case arises from the decision in Collins v. Godefroy. Here the plaintiff says, "I am entitled by statute to my costs and allowances—that is, under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, and the County Court Rules, 1889." Under these rules he is entitled to recover the proper amount for his "expenses and loss of time," and but for Collins v. Godefroy this would be quite clear. In that case, however, there was no suggestion that the plaintiff could be entitled to recover for his loss of time unless upon the ground of usage, and that usage he was unable to prove. Lord Tenterden held that, although there was a promise to pay, there was no consideration to support it, it being the plaintiff's duty, apart from any payment, to attend and give evidence. This case is very different. The plaintiff's case is based on the rules. In In re Working Men's Mutual Society, 30 W. R. 938, 21 Ch. D. 831, Collins v. Godefroy was cited and was not acted upon, and we cannot act upon it here.

In my opinion the county court judge was wrong, and the case must go back to him to assess the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no real connection between Collins v. Godefroy and this case, because now the plaintiff's right rests on statutory authority.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, V. I. Chamberlain.

Solicitor for the defendant, Ernest Todd.

Q. B. Div. (Field and Manisty, JJ.) Oct. 29.

BAZETT v. MORGAN. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Action founded on contract—Less than £50 recovered—Discretion of judge over costs—Right of appeal—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

A writ in an action founded on contract was specially indorsed for a sum of £49 10s. 11d. More than twenty-one days after service of the writ the plaintiff obtained, under order 14, final judgment for £23 15s., leave being given to the defendant to defend as to the remainder. An order was afterwards made directing the case to be tried in a county court, but subsequently the plaintiff abandoned the remainder, except £4, which was by consent ordered to be paid to the plaintiff, with costs to be taxed. A judge at chambers gave the plaintiff his costs on the High Court scale. The defendant appealed.

Held, that, under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the judge at chambers had a discretion to give costs on the High Court scale, and that, having exercised his discretion as to the costs, no appeal lay from his order.

Appeal from an order made at chambers by Wills, J.

The writ in the action was specially indorsed for a sum of £49 10s. 11d. for the board and tuition of the defendant's son supplied by the plaintiff. This writ was served on the 19th of March, 1889, and on the 11th of April the plaintiff obtained an order, under order 14, allowing him to sign final judgment for £23 15s., with liberty to the defendant to defend as to the remainder. The summons under which this order was made was returnable on the 6th of April, but was adjourned until the 11th of April.

On the 30th of April an order was made that the case should be tried in a county court; before any further steps were taken a further order was made by consent "that the plaintiff do abandon his claim to the £25 15s. 11d. (the balance), except as to £4 10s. 11d., part thereof, and that the defendant do pay to the plaintiff the sum of £4 10s. 11d. and costs to be taxed."

The plaintiff made an application at chambers as to the costs, and Wills, J., ordered that the plaintiff should be allowed the costs of the action upon the scale in use in the Supreme Court.

The defendant appealed against this order upon the ground that the plaintiff was only entitled to costs on the county court scale. No leave to appeal was obtained.

Morton Smith, for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection. There is no right of appeal, as the order was an order as to costs only, and by section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), there is no right of appeal against such an order. Here the costs are in the discretion of the judge, and no leave to appeal was obtained. Order 65, r. 12, which deals with costs, is now superseded by section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which in effect re-enacts that rule and gives the judge a discretion over the costs: Barker v. Hempstead, 37 W. R. 685, 23 Q. B. D. 8.

Lincoln Reed (J. E. Palmer with him), for the defendant.—The order under order 14 was not obtained by the plaintiff within twenty-one days after service of the writ, and therefore the case does not come within the proviso at the end of sub-section 2 of section 116. [FIELD, J.—You have to show that this was not an order as to costs only, which are in the discretion of the judge.] This action was for a sum above £20 and under £50, and so comes under the first sub-section, and not under the second sub-section. That part of sub-section 2 which gives the judge a discretion as to costs refers only to the actions mentioned in that sub-section, and not to the actions mentioned in the first sub-section. The case comes within sub-section 1, and the judge has no discretion as to costs, which ought to have been on the county court scale, as provided by sub-section 1.

FIELD, J.—The plaintiff brought this action, which is founded on contract, to recover a sum less than £50, but upwards of £20. The writ was served on the 19th of March, and a summons was taken out, under order 14, returnable on the 6th of April; the hearing of this summons was adjourned until the 11th of April, which was more than twenty-one days after the service of the writ, and on that day the plaintiff obtained judgment for £23 15s. We do not decide whether the case comes within the proviso at the end of sub-section 2 of section 116 of the Act; it is not necessary to do so, as the case comes within the words in the earlier part of the same

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

[redacted] ...ess in
... on tort,
... as suffi-
... court, or
... chambers
... that in
... plaintiff
...led to any
...an £20, but
...osts on the ... High Court
... bringing the

...873, provides
...ly, which are leave to appeal taken here is present case, as leave to appeal.
...e costs in this
, and it is con-
the discretion of action and say on ne case of Neaves
Appeal, reversing
...6 W. R. 62), held
...scretion as to the ought not to have ink, therefore, that
...d a discretion over
... has been exercised from his order, and
...d.

...e opinion. By the 1st
...acted that in an action shall not be entitled to ...um less than £20, and county court costs if he under £50. Then the
...tions of tort in similar
...o sub-sections are clear;
the sub-section commenc-
...s applies to both sub-sec-
...e plaintiff shall not be and in the second case he
...y more costs than he would action had been brought in
...ge of the High Court certifies
...eason for bringing the action
...less an order for costs is ob-
...e end makes it clear, as it says certain circumstances, shall be
... think, therefore, that the judge
these costs, and that no appeal

...aintiff, Pitman & Son, for Bazett,

...efendant, T. Durant.

[redacted] June 21, 1889.

[redacted]HAM v. HASLAR. (a.)

...d in negotiation—Value given by ...—Notice of fraud—Onus of ...e Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c.

...ction 2, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the onus is on the holder of a fraudulently-negotiated bill to prove, not only that he has actually given value for the bill subsequently to the alleged fraud, but that he gave such value in good faith without notice of the fraud.

[redacted], Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion for a new trial, or that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The action was brought by the indorsee of a bill of exchange for £500, against the defendant Haslar, as acceptor, and the defendant Johnson, as indorser. Judgment in default had been signed against Johnson, but the defendant Haslar pleaded the absence of any value or consideration for the acceptance or payment of the said bill by him, and alleged that he had merely accepted and delivered it to one Leslie for the purpose of getting it discounted for him, but that Leslie had, without his consent, handed it to the defendant Johnson, who fraudulently indorsed it to the plaintiff. At the trial, before Field, J., and a special jury, the defendant Haslar gave evidence to the above effect, and the plaintiff, on the other hand, proved that he had given £450 to Johnson for the bill after making inquiries as to the respectability of both defendants.

The judge directed the jury that if the plaintiff honestly and really advanced the sum of £450 in cashing or discounting the bill he was a bonâ fide holder for value, and that the onus was on the defendant Haslar to prove that the plaintiff had reason to suspect fraud. He further directed that there was evidence of the existence of circumstances which should have put the plaintiff on inquiry from which he wilfully abstained. The jury having found a verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff made the present application, on the grounds that the latter direction of the judge was wrong, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is a holder "in due course" under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and the judge ought not to have called upon the plaintiff to prove consideration and bona fides. The evidence that he has given full consideration to the indorser is not disputed.

Whateley (Cock, Q. C., with him), for the defendant Haslar.—Whatever may have been the state of the law before the passing of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (Jones v. Gordon, 26 W. R. 172, 2 App. Cas. 616), it is now clear that where fraud is proved in the inception or negotiation of a bill, the onus of proof is on the holder, not only that he gave value, but that he gave it in good faith and without notice of the fraud: Bailey v. Bidwell, 13 M. & W. 73; Raphael v. The Bank of England, 4 W. R. 10.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., replied.

DENMAN, J.—The summing up of the learned judge has been read through and fully commented upon, and I have come to the conclusion that, upon the true construction of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, he put the case too favourably for the plaintiff. Inasmuch as the argument in this case has turned to a great extent upon what is the present state of the law under the Act, I think that we must express our opinion upon it. The first clause with which we must deal is section 30, sub-section 2, which provides that "Every holder of a bill is primâ facie deemed to be a holder in due course; but if in an action on a bill it is admitted or proved that the acceptance, issue, or subsequent negotiation of the bill is affected with fraud, . . . the burden of proof is shifted, unless and until the holder proves that, subsequent to the alleged fraud or illegality, value has in good faith been given for the bill." Now the learned judge told the jury that, if money had really and in fact been given for the bill, value had in good faith been given. I have never so read this section of the Act; and I think that the attention of the learned judge could not have been called to the other clauses of the Act. Giving "value in good faith" must mean something more than the mere actual and real passing of money or other value, and this appears clearly when the other clauses of the Act are looked at.

A "holder in due course" is, by section 29, sub-section 1 (b), defined to be a person who has taken a bill in good faith and for value, and without notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it. Then section 30, sub-section 2, says, in effect, that if fraud in the inception or negotiation of a bill is proved or admitted, the holder must prove that he is a holder in due course as defined by section 29, sub-section 1 (b). Again, section 90 says that "a thing is deemed to be done in good faith . . . when it is, in fact, done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not." This clause is obviously founded upon the distinction which is pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Jones v. Gordon between honest blundering or carelessness, and a dishonest refraining from inquiry. Applying that construction to the words "value given in good faith," at the end of section 30, sub-section 2, it appears to me that those words mean value given honestly and without any notice of the fraud, in the sense explained by Lord Blackburn, and not merely the actual giving of value.

The words of section 30, sub-section 2, "if it is admitted or proved," mean no more than that some evidence of circumstances in the nature of fraud must be given sufficient to be left to the jury. That was the old law, as stated in Hall v. Featherstone, 3 H. & N. 284, which has not, I think, been altered by this Act. When, therefore, some sufficient evidence of fraud has been given, as in this case, the onus is on the plaintiff to prove both that he gave value, and that he had no notice of the fraud in the sense explained by Lord Blackburn in Jones v. Gordon.

In this case there was evidence of fraud which could not have been withdrawn from the jury, and their verdict on that point cannot be set aside as against the weight of evidence. The onus of proving that he had no notice being upon the plaintiff, it was essentially a matter for the jury to say whether he had satisfied them on that point; and I think that, even had the onus been upon the defendant, there was evidence upon which the jury were entitled to find a verdict for him.

The verdict, therefore, cannot be disturbed.

CHARLES, J.—It is impossible to say that there was not abundant evidence of the fraud practised upon the plaintiff to support the verdict. Then arises the important question in the case—whether there were circumstances in the transaction which ought to have led the plaintiff to make inquiries, and he wilfully abstained from inquiry.

At the time of the passing of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, it was uncertain how much the plaintiff had to prove in cases of this kind when evidence of fraud had been given. Lord Blackburn, in Jones v. Gordon, says:—"The language of the quotation from Parke, B., would seem to show that the onus as to both is shifted, but I do not think that has ever been decided, nor do I think it is necessary to decide it in the present case." The learned judge who tried this case took the view that the onus was shifted only to the extent of making the plaintiff prove that value was, in fact, given, not that it was also given bonâ fide. Upon the construction of the Act I respectfully differ from him. The plaintiff was bound to satisfy the jury that he gave value, and that he gave it in good faith. The Act has settled the law in accordance with the opinion expressed by Parke, B.

I agree with my brother Denman as to the meaning of the words "admitted or proved" in the earlier part of section 30, sub-section 2. The latter part of that section says that the holder must prove that value was in good faith given for the bill. Referring back to section 29, sub-section 1 (b), a holder in due course is defined to be a person who has taken a bill in good faith and for value, and without notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it. Therefore a holder is, by section 30, sub-section 2, deemed to be a holder in due course until fraud is proved; but in that case he must prove that he is a holder in due course as defined in section 29, sub-section 1 (b). "Good faith" is, by section 90, defined to be the doing of a thing honestly. When, therefore, fraud has been proved, the holder must prove that he gave value honestly without notice of the fraud.

The jury have found against the plaintiff, and the verdict must stand.

Motion dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Thorneycroft & Willis.

Solicitors for the defendant, Roopers & Whateley.

Q. B. Div. (Denman, and Stephen, JJ.) | Jan. 17; April 10; May 4, 1889.

CLIMPSON v. COLES. (a.)

Bill of sale—Building agreement—Mortgage—Power of entry—Power to sell materials—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.

By a mortgage deed the plaintiff assigned to the defendants certain land, and buildings in course of erection thereon, "and also all bricks, timber, slates, and other building materials which may at any time hereafter be brought by or for the mortgagor into the said premises for completing the buildings." The plaintiff covenanted that all such building materials should be considered as immediately attached to, and forming part of, the fee simple of such premises; none were to be removed without the concurrence of the mortgagees; and, in default of completion of the premises to the satisfaction of the mortgagees, a power to enter, seize, and take possession of all such building materials was given to them. Power was further given to the mortgagees, in case of default by the mortgagor, to sell all or part of the premises, and all building materials, bricks, timber, &c., standing and being thereon, or on any part thereof, either together or in parcels.

Held, that, inasmuch as the deed gave a power to sell the building materials, independently of the powers of entry and of taking possession of the premises, and exercisable without the latter powers being exercised, it was an assurance of personal chattels, or a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt, within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and therefore was a bill of sale, and as such void under section 8 of the Act of 1882 for want of registration in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein.

In re Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112, distinguished.

Cross-motions to enter judgment, or for a new trial after a trial before Manisty, J., and a special jury.

The material facts of this case were as follows:—

The plaintiff Climpson sued the defendants Coles and Carr for an alleged wrongful conversion of building materials and plant seized by them. The defendant justified the seizure under a deed of the 13th of February, 1886, and they further counter-claimed against the plaintiff, on the ground that, by several indentures, including the one of the 13th of February, 1886, the plaintiff had mortgaged a great number of buildings at Eastbourne to secure separate sums of money, amounting to £11,000; and that, by a consolidation clause in each of the said indentures, the plaintiff was barred from redeeming any one of the mortgages without the others. The defendants therefore counter-claimed for the whole amount, and asked for an account to be taken of the amount due, and, in default of payment, for foreclosure. The plaintiff joined issue, but alleged further that the deed of February, 1886, was void for non-registration as a bill of sale under sections 8 and 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, so far as it made personal chattels a security for the payment of money; and he further alleged that the consolidation provision had never been made known to him. Upon the trial, before Manisty, J., and a jury, the question as to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, was reserved as a point of law, and the judge held that the instrument was not a bill of sale requiring registration. Upon the other point he left to the jury "whether the plaintiff was told and made aware of the effect of the consolidation clauses?" The jury found that "the plaintiff's attention was called to the consolidation clauses, but that they were not sufficiently explained, for him to understand them." The judge, upon that finding, gave judgment for the plaintiff on the counter-claim, but he gave judgment for the defendants upon the plaintiff's claim for wrongful conversion, for which, by agreement, £25 had been assessed as damage, if any. The defendants now moved for judgment on the counter-claim or for a new trial upon the question of the consolidation of the mortgages. The plaintiff made a cross-motion for judgment upon the claim for the £25 against the decision of Manisty, J., on the ground that the deed of February, 1886, was void for want of registration as a bill of sale.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reid, Q.C., and R. Wallace, for the plaintiff's trustee.

Muir Mackenzie and W. Baker, for the defendants.

Newson, for Colbran, a receiver in chancery.

Marshall Hall, for Mrs. Climpson.

Denman, J., delivered the judgment of the Court (Denman and Stephen, JJ.) [The learned judge, after reciting the facts of the case, held that the verdict of the jury upon the counter-claim ought not to be disturbed, and that the judgment upon that in favour of the plaintiff must stand, and continued:—].—With regard to the other question raised on the plaintiff's motion, that depends upon the construction of the deed of the 13th of February, 1886, and the cases relating to bills of sale.

The deed in question describes the plaintiff as mortgagor and the defendants as mortgagees. It recited that the mortgagor was erecting some houses on the land therein described and assigned to the mortgagees, and that he had applied to the mortgagees to lend him £2,700 for completing the said houses on the security of the said premises, to be advanced in certain instalments.

The material parts of the deeds were as follows:—

The mortgagor, "in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of £65 paid by the mortgagees, the receipt of which he acknowledges, and also in consideration of the further sums to be advanced by instalments as aforesaid," covenanted that he would, on the 13th of May then next, pay the sum of £2,700, or so much thereof as should have been then advanced, with interest on the whole £2,700 at £5 per cent., to be calculated from the date of the deed, and also the amounts paid and due for the surveyor's certificates. It was then witnessed as follows:—"The mortgagor doth hereby assign and transfer to the mortgagees all those pieces of land" (describing them), "and also all those three messuages now being erected thereon by the mortgagor, and also all bricks, timber, slates, and other building materials which may at any time hereafter be brought by or for the mortgagor into the said premises for completing the said buildings, to have," &c., "for all the term, estate, and interest of the mortgagor." Then followed a proviso that, if the mortgagor paid all sums then due by virtue of the indenture on the 13th of May, the indenture shall be absolutely void. Then followed, amongst others, the following covenants by the mortgagor:—1. To complete the buildings with all possible speed. 2. That all bricks, timber, slates, building materials, and other things which shall be brought upon the premises by or for the mortgagor for the purpose of completing the said messuages shall be considered as immediately attached to and forming part of the fee simple of and in the same premises, and no part of the said bricks, &c., shall be removed from the premises, but with the concurrence of the mortgagees in writing. 3. "That, in case the mortgagor shall not proceed with the completion, &c., to the satisfaction of the mortgagees, it shall be lawful for the mortgagees to enter upon the premises and to seize and take possession of all bricks, &c., and other building materials, and to complete the said messuages, &c."

The deed contained the following proviso:—"If the mortgagor shall make default in payment of the said sum of £2,700, or any part thereof which shall have been then advanced or paid in pursuance hereof, with interest, on the 13th of May next, or become bankrupt, &c., whilst any money remains due on this security, it shall be lawful for the mortgagees at any time thereafter, without any further consent of the mortgagor, to sell all or any part of the said hereditaments or premises, and all bricks, timber, slates, and other materials standing and being thereon, or on any part thereof, either together or in parcels, either by public auction or by private contract, with full power to make any stipulation as to title or otherwise as they may think fit, and to rescind any contract for sale and to re-sell without being responsible for any loss occasioned thereby; and to execute all such assurances as they may deem expedient, and in the meantime and until such sale, being in actual possession of the premises or in receipt of the rents thereof, to demise the premises or any part thereof, for any term not exceeding twenty-one years," &c.

It was contended before the learned judge at the trial on behalf of the plaintiff that this deed was a bill of sale, "void" for want of registration "in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein" under section 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The learned judge thought that the case was covered by the decisions relating to building agreements, and held that it was not a bill of sale requiring registration. This question was elaborately discussed before us, and most, if not all, of the cases bearing upon the point were cited. In Brown v. Bateman, 15 W. R. 350, L. R. 2 C. P. 272, where the deed in question contained almost identical clauses to the present one, the instrument was held not to be "an assurance of personal chattels" or "a licence to take possession of personal chattels as a security for a debt" within the then existing Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36). It was argued for the plaintiff that in that case the deed was not a mortgage by the builder to the money-lender, but was an agreement by the owner to demise to the builder for a long term, at certain rents, as soon as the builder should have erected certain messuages upon it, but we cannot see that that makes any difference, and the clauses in that deed relating to the right to enter and take possession of the land in question and the materials thereon are undistinguishable so far from those in this deed of February 13, 1886. In substance, the relations between the parties as mortgagor and mortgagees in the present case seem precisely on a par with those between the parties in Brown v. Bateman. In Blake v. Izard, 16 W. R. 108, the clause provided that all materials upon the land should become the property of the intended lessor. The court there followed Brown v. Bateman in deciding that the instrument was not a bill of sale (vide Willes, J.). Ex parte Newitt, In re Garrud, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D. 522, is not at variance with these decisions, the words of the agreement being too different from the present case to constitute it an authority, and the court clearly held that Brown v. Bateman was rightly decided, but was not an authority in point (vide James, L.J.'s judgment).

In Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436, the Court of Appeal held that a document was not a bill of sale which provided that all materials brought upon the land should become the property of the lessor, whether affixed to the freehold or not. But the argument turned upon the words in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, which are not relied on here—namely, as to "an agreement by which a right in equity to personal chattels is conferred." Here the words relied on are the same as those in the Act of 1854—namely, "assurances of personal chattels" or "licences to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt," which were the words relied on in Brown v. Bateman; and it is clear from Bowen, L.J.'s judgment in Reeves v. Barlow, that he considered the clause providing for the property in the land to pass to the lessor was of the same effect as the clause in Bown v. Bateman, which, however, he distinguished on other grounds.

So far, then, on the contention of the plaintiff that the above cases cited did not apply to the present case, we think that on this one ground his contention was untenable—namely, in regard to any distinction between the relation of the parties in this case and in that of Brown v. Bateman and the cases following it.

The plaintiff, however, further contends that, inasmuch as in this case there was a power to sell any part of the materials upon the land separately upon default of performance of any part of the mortgagor's agreements, including that to repay the £65 advanced upon the execution of the deed, the case fell within the requirements of the Bills of Sale Act according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310, and in In re Yates, 36 W. R. 563, 38 Ch. D. 112. We think that In re Burdett does not go further than to decide that, where a deed mortgages both personal chattels and other property, such deed is valid as regards the other property if it is possible to sever the provisions of the deed into two parts, so as to apply specifically to each species of property. The deed was a mere bill of sale in form, and the only question was whether it was void in toto under section 9 of the Act of 1878 for want of registration, or only in relation to the part affecting "personal chattels" as distinct from "trade machinery." The court certainly did not there lay down any rules as to the general application of the Act of 1878 to building agreements containing clauses such as the present deed. In In re Yates, however, there is a test laid down which seems to us applicable to the present case. That was a mortgage in consideration of an advance of £950, which the mortgagor covenanted to repay on a certain day with interest agreed. It conveyed certain land and buildings with a proviso for reconveyance on payment of principal and interest. It was agreed that the powers in section 19 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, should be exercisable at any time after February 7 then next without it being necessary to serve the notice required by section 20 of the Act (i.e., it gave power to sell the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, either together or in lots, when the mortgage-money became due" (ib., section 19)). Upon the mortgaged property was a considerable amount of trade fixtures coming within the description of "trade machinery" as defined by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 5, and therefore coming within the description of "personal chattels" according to the exception in section 4 of that Act. But, inasmuch as section 7 of the Act provides that no fixtures are to be deemed to be separately assigned by reason only that they are assigned by separate words, or that power is given to sever them from the building to which they are affixed, or if by the same instrument any freehold or leasehold interest in the building to which they are affixed is conveyed to same person, it was held that the mortgage was not an assignment of the "trade machinery," which only passed by virtue of being fixed to the freehold, and that the deed gave no power to take possession of the machinery as chattels, and that the power of sale did not authorize the mortgagee to sell the trade machinery apart from the freehold, and that, therefore, the deed was not a bill of sale of the "trade machinery."

The decision, therefore, is against the argument that the Bills of Sale Act applied. But the ground of that decision was one which cannot apply to a case like the present, in which the chattels seized are pure chattels, and in which the power to deal with them is not a power to be derived from an Act of Parliament, but from the agreement between the parties themselves.

In In re Yates Cotton, L.J., very clearly draws the distinction. He says: "The mortgage is simply a conveyance of the land; it gives the mortgagee a right to the trade machinery, not as something assigned by the deed, but as annexed to the land, and so passing by the conveyance of the land. Nor, I think, does it give the mortgagee power to take possession of chattels. It empowers him to take possession of the land, but he can take possession of the trade machinery in no other way than by taking possession of the land to which it is affixed. Where an instrument is simply a mortgage of the fee simple of a freehold property, it cannot be such an instrument as is pointed out by the Bills of Sale Act—an instrument authorizing the holder to take possession of chattels apart from the land on which they are. I hold that, under this mortgage, the mortgagee had no power to sever the chattels from the land. He would only have a right to do so if a power of sale was given to him which authorized him to sell them separately." Lindley, L.J., says: "The question is whether the mortgagee of a mill, under a mortgage framed as this is, can seize and sever and sell, apart from the land or mill, the trade machinery on it. If he can, then it strikes me that, as regards trade machinery, it would be impossible to avoid conclusions that this is a bill of sale, and void because it is not registered." He agrees in holding that the deed in that case was not a bill of sale, because "the machinery passes as a portion of the land, not as personal chattels"; and he says: "If the mortgagee of a mill wants to have the power of selling the trade machinery apart from the mortgaged property, he must have a bill of sale." Now it is true there is nothing in the two last-mentioned decisions that overrule the cases of Brown v. Bateman or Blake v. Izard; but, on the other hand, there is nothing to show that those decisions can extend to a case where the deed does give express power to the mortgagee to enter upon the land and sell any materials which he may find there, intended to be used for the completion of the buildings which the mortgagor had covenanted to erect, in a case where the power to sell the materials is given "upon the neglect to pay money due for advances, as well as for any other default." It seems to us impossible to hold that the very extensive words in the deed of February 13, 1886, do not give the mortgagee power, upon default in payment of the advances made, to sell any "bricks, timber, slates, or other building materials standing and being on any part of the premises" without even entering on the premises, except so far as is necessary for raising the amount required and disposing of the goods. We think it impossible to hold that the mere provision "that the materials brought upon the premises for the purpose of building shall become part of the fee simple," can exempt them from the operation of the Bills of Sale Act, and prevent them from being "personal chattels" within the meaning of that Act.

Therefore, applying the test given by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal in In re Yates, and finding no provision there such as that contained in the present case with regard to the power of selling those "personal chattels" which are the subject of the action, we feel bound to hold that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment upon his claim for £25, and not merely to have the benefit of it in account. Our judgment, therefore, upon both motions must be in favour of the plaintiff, and of course he is entitled to the costs of the action and of the counter-claim down to the present time, and of both motions heard before us. The costs of Colbran and Mrs. Climpson of and occasioned by their having been served with notice of the defendants' rule must be paid by the defendants.

We say nothing at present about any future costs to be incurred in taking the accounts upon the basis which we hold to be applicable, as above mentioned.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, G. R. Grant.

Solicitors for the defendants, Tippetts & Son.

Solicitors for Colbran, Alfred Hicks & Arnold.

Solicitors for Mrs. Climpson, Prince & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. July 25, 26; Nov. 20.

GLASIER v. ROLLS. (a.)

Company — Misrepresentation — Promoter — Action of deceit—False statement in prospectus—Proof of actual fraud necessary—Burden of proof—Costs—Shorthand notes of evidence—Practice as to allowance of costs of shorthand notes of evidence—Special direction necessary—Time for making application for—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 4; ord. 70, r. 1.

In order to maintain an action of deceit the plaintiff must prove actual fraud or dishonesty on the part of the defendant in making the statement relied on as a misrepresentation, and nothing less will suffice.

So held, following the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, ante, p. 33.

R. was the principal partner in a business which was to be turned into a limited company, of which he was a promoter, and of which he was to be a director as soon as the purchase was completed; the prospectus as to the company contained a statement that "the business at the present time returns a net profit of over seventeen per cent. on the capital employed." R. did not see the prospectus, as issued, before it was issued, but saw and corrected two drafts of it. The truth or falsehood of the statement appeared to depend upon the doubtful question of the proper meaning to be attached to the words "the capital employed"—that is to say, upon the amount at which such capital ought to be taken—a question involving, in this case, somewhat complex calculations, and depending (e.g., as to whether the value of the business premises ought to be included), to some extent, on mercantile usage.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, even if the statement had been false in fact, of which there was no sufficient proof, the plaintiff had failed to discharge the burden, which lay upon him, of proving that it was false to the knowledge of the defendant so as to involve dishonesty on his part.

At the time the case was decided by Kekewich, J., the decision of the Court of Appeal in Peek v. Derry, 36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541, not having been then reversed by the House of Lords, the law was understood to be that it was not necessary for a plaintiff, in order to succeed in an action of deceit, to prove actual fraud. The plaintiff accordingly did not press that part of his case, and the judge did not decide the question of fraud, but decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the statement was untrue in fact, and that, though the defendant may have believed it to be true, he had no reasonable grounds for such belief.

Held, that, as the plaintiff might have insisted on pressing the case of fraud, but had not done so, he ought not now to be allowed to put the defendant to the risk and expense of a new trial upon that issue.

After the order of the Court of Appeal in the present case, allowing the appeal and dismissing the action, with costs, had been passed and entered, the successful appellant applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence taken at the trial of the action, and of the transcripts of the judgments of the Lords in Derry v. Peek, might be allowed on taxation.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction, after the order had been passed and entered, to alter it in the manner sought, the order, as passed and entered, having expressed what it was the intention of the Court of Appeal to order at the time the order was made.

The costs of shorthand notes of evidence are never allowed on taxation without a special direction in that behalf given by the court, and though the court, in the exercise of its discretion, can give such a direction, yet it is a discretion which, as a matter of practice, is only exercised under very special circumstances, and any application to the court to exercise such discretion should be made at or immediately after the time when the judgment is given.

Appeal from Kekewich, J. (37 W. R. 430).

In this case an old-established business of linoleum and floor-cloth manufacturers, belonging to Messrs. James Rolls & Sons, had been turned into a limited company. The defendant was the principal partner in the old firm, and he was to be a director of the company, but not till after the completion of the purchase. The company was incorporated in 1886, with a capital of £80,000 in 16,000 £5 shares. Before the shares were allotted a prospectus was issued, which contained, amongst other statements, the following:—"The annual sales are already very large, and the business at the present time returns a net profit of over seventeen per cent. on the capital employed."

Mr. Glasier, who was one of the shareholders in the company, brought this action against the defendant, on the ground that he (the plaintiff) had been induced to take shares in the company by the above statement, which was alleged to be false and known to be so at the time by the defendant, and for the issue of which the defendant was alleged to be responsible. The defendant, George Rolls, had not seen the prospectus, as issued, before it was issued, but had seen and corrected two drafts of it, in the first of which he struck out a statement that the profits exceeded twenty per cent. The defendant maintained that there were good grounds for believing that at the time the prospectus was issued the profits, in fact, amounted to seventeen per cent. on the capital; but the plaintiff alleged that, both at that time and for some time previously, the profits fell considerably short of that amount. The shares had become much depreciated since the allotment.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE and M. J. BLAKE, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Kekewich, J., held that the defendant, as a promoter, was responsible for the prospectus, and that the statement was incorrect in fact, and was made recklessly and without taking proper means to ascertain whether it was true, though not fraudulently, and therefore decided, on the authority of Peek v. Derry, 36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541, that the defendant must make good the loss sustained by the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed, and the hearing of the appeal, having been postponed to await the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, ante, p. 33, came on again immediately after the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek had been pronounced.

Moulton, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The first intimation Mr. Rolls had of the existence of the prospectus was by seeing it in the newspapers; but, believing the statement as to the profits being equal to seventeen per cent. on the capital employed, to be true, he took no steps to have it withdrawn. There is a dispute as to the meaning of the term "the capital employed," but in any case the statement was believed by Mr. Rolls, and was made bonâ fide. [LOPES, L.J.—If he made the statement believing it to be true, even though he had no reasonable grounds for so believing it, this action will not lie.] So the House of Lords have decided in Derry v. Peek. [FRY, L.J.—This case is like Peek v. Gurney, 22 W. R. 29, L. R. 6 H. L. 377.] If necessary, we say the defendant had reasonable grounds for his belief. The question is whether he is honest. The average yearly profit gives more than seventeen per cent. on the capital employed, which was £13,000 odd, not including the value of the business premises. The decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek lays down that, in order to support an action like this, the statement relied on must have been made with a fraudulent intention. [FRY, L.J.—Lord Bramwell says a false statement believed in without reasonable grounds is actionable if the defendant knew he had no reasonable grounds. LOPES, L.J.—If a man deceives himself he is entitled to deceive others.] Only if he is honest; want of reasonable grounds is evidence of dishonesty. It is impossible to conceive a man having an honest belief where he knows he has no reasonable grounds. The statement here was correct upon the true view of what the capital was. Even if not true, the defendant believed it true. Either of those propositions is sufficient for our purpose. The capital, in the proper sense, was the balance of assets over liabilities—that makes it less than £14,000. That is a question of mercantile usage, not a question of law. The judge below took the capital at £28,000. The words "capital employed" must be taken in the sense in which the defendant meant to use them, not in what the judge may think the proper sense. An untrue statement made recklessly is actionable; but if the person deceives himself there is no fraud, and if made without any knowledge it is not actionable. If made without caring whether it be true or false the statement is actionable; but if made without consideration, yet not wilfully, it is not actionable. It must be found to have been made purposely; mere shutting of one's eyes is not sufficient to establish liability. No amount of mere carelessness is actionable: Derry v. Peek. [FRY, L.J.—Is no amount of negligence fraud?] Weight may be given to it as evidence of fraud.

Warmington, Q.C., and J. M. Solomon, for the respondent.—All the statements in the prospectus should be looked at. It is impossible that Rolls could have honestly believed them. Derry v. Peek is to be considered with reference to the facts of that case. It was not a case of a vendor, but of outside directors. [COTTON, L.J.—What is the difference? You must show that the statements here were dishonest, or we are against you.] Honesty here is impossible. A full account was made out in 1879, and, starting with that, the capital was then £22,000. [COTTON, L.J.—The plaintiff was never asked how he understood the words "capital employed."] Money spent in producing what has been sold is capital employed. In Arnison v. Smith, 37 W. R. 739, 41 Ch. D. 348, Lord Halsbury, C., adopts what Lord Selborne said in Smith v. Chadwick, 30 W. R. 661, 32 Ibid. 687, 20 Ch. D. 27, 9 App Cas. 187, and in Derry v. Peek he adopts what he himself said in Arnison v. Smith. You must take into consideration the man's knowledge and means of knowledge: Smith v. Chadwick, per Lord Selborne, C. Rolls had the knowledge and means of knowledge if he had chosen to use it. In the partnership deed the capital is put at £17,000. [FRY, L.J.—The goodwill is to be deducted from that.] No, it should be included. The question of dishonesty was not much dwelt upon below, not being then considered material. In the defendant's statement no deduction is made for depreciation, &c. A fraudulent statement by an agent, acting for, and for the benefit of his principal, renders the principal liable: Barwick v. English Joint-Stock Bank, 15 W. R. 877, L. R. 2 Ex. 259. Here Ashworth was the agent of Rolls: Weir v. Barnett, 26 W. R. 746, 3 Ex. D. 238. [FRY, L.J.—The judge below not having tried the question whether the agent was fraudulent, is not the utmost you can ask for a new trial on your paying costs?] The judge's finding amounts to dishonesty; he says the statement was inserted without sufficient justification—that is, recklessly. Rolls admitted he did not know what the capital was, and Lord Herschell, in his judgment in Derry v. Peek, asked whether a man can believe what he knows he is ignorant of. Belief must have reference to moral certainty. In Smith v. Chadwick both Jessel, M.R., and Lord Selborne held that there was actual fraud. We put it to Kekewich, J., that the statement was made dishonestly, and he found that no one concerned in making the prospectus had the means of stating the facts honestly. The finding of Kekewich, J., is a finding within Lord Herschell's definition of fraud. The judge here said the statement was made recklessly. [COTTON, L.J.—Was it not an honest statement by a man who took it in a different way?] Taking it in his own sense, on the basis of any possible estimate of the amount of the capital, the profits were in fact so far below what was stated that the statement could not have been honestly made. Taking it on any basis it must have been inaccurate. "Recklessly" means "without caring whether true or not," and not merely "without care." There is ample in this case to enable the court to decide that the appellant must have known the statement was untrue. The evidence shows that the capital, without reckoning the buildings, must have been in excess of the amount upon which the profits would pay 17 per cent. The account allowed nothing for depreciation, though Rolls' own evidence shows he was aware that in such accounts some allowance ought to be made for it. The burden of proof was on the defendant to show that his statement was honest, it being in fact so unreasonable as to make it unlikely that it could be true. In Arnison v. Smith Lord Halsbury, C., held the defendants guilty of actual fraud, and that such fraud was necessary to the plaintiffs' case, though Kekewich, J., had declined to decide the question, as he held that actual fraud was not necessary.

Moulton, Q.C., in reply.—In any case there is not enough to show fraud. It requires a clear case of untrue figures to raise even a presumption of fraud. Here there is great doubt even whether they were actually untrue.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendant

from a judgment of Kekewich, J., who held him liable in an action of deceit.

What was relied on was this: It was said that Mr. Rolls, the defendant, was a party to the bringing out of this company and to the issuing of a certain statement in the prospectus; or that, if he did not issue the statement, he recognized and adopted it, as he abstained from correcting it after it was brought to his notice, and that the plaintiff took his shares on the faith of that statement, which was a false one.

The question really turns on one passage, which was this: "The annual sales are already very large, and the business at the present time returns a net profit of over seventeen per cent. on the capital employed."

It is reasonable enough, however, to refer to other points in the prospectus, and to see if it contains any evidence that it was adopted by Mr. Rolls, or anything to show dishonesty on his part; but I can see nothing whatever in it to show anything of the kind. He did not prepare it; and it is in favour of his honesty that, when the first draft was submitted to him, he struck out a passage to the effect that the returns showed a net profit of over twenty per cent. At the time the case was tried before Kekewich, J., the law as laid down by this court then stood, that a man was liable in an action of deceit if he made a false statement in order to induce others to act upon it, without having reasonable grounds for believing it to be true—in other words, if he made it recklessly. That was laid down in Peek v. Derry. But since that time the decision of the House of Lords in that case has upset that view of the law, and has laid down that the question of liability is to be governed by the old rules of law applying to an action of deceit—that is to say, that the statement must not only be untrue in fact, but must be made dishonestly, and that no amount of ignorance, or carelessness, or recklessness will make a man liable for a false statement in a prospectus.

The two questions here are, first, whether the statement made was in fact incorrect, and, secondly, whether, if incorrect, it was made dishonestly? As to the first question, Fry, L.J., takes a more favourable view than I have been able to, though I do not think I am prepared to say positively that the statement is untrue. It really depends on what is to be taken as the capital employed; but I shall not go into that, because I think this case is to be decided on the second point—whether the statement was made dishonestly. We cannot come to the conclusion that it was so made. I think the burden of proof as to that, lies on the plaintiff. According to the decision of the House of Lords, it lies on him to prove fraud by the defendant. Unless, therefore, there is the clearest evidence on the documents, or on the facts, that there has been fraud, it would not be right for us to find that the defendant was guilty of it, when the judge below, who saw and heard the witnesses, has not so decided. It has been argued that he did find fraud. But what he says is this: "I cannot doubt on the evidence that the paragraph was inserted without reasonable or sufficient grounds—that is, recklessly." He is bringing it within the term or definition of a reckless statement adopted by this court—i.e., a statement made without reasonable grounds. It was conceded here that if the judge was right in his construction of the words "the capital employed," the statement was untrue in fact. But we are not compelled to decide that point, because I think it has not been shown that the defendant acted dishonestly in making the statement, and that is therefore the only question we need determine. [His lordship then examined the evidence to see if there was any proof of dishonest intention, and proceeded:—].

There is no evidence that the defendant here was guilty of what the House of Lords says is essential—i.e., dishonesty—not folly; not acting on insufficient grounds—but fraud, or, to use the term which I prefer, dishonesty. The plaintiff has asked that, as the question of fraud was not brought before the judge below, the case may be sent back for a new trial. No doubt the case was tried when the law was supposed to be what was laid down by this court in Peek v. Derry, yet I always hold to this rule, that where there are two ways of bringing a case forward, but counsel, in the exercise of his discretion, elects to rely on only one, and the one relied on fails, it is wrong to give the plaintiff another opportunity of bringing forward the other, because he might and ought to have done that at the trial, instead of relying on the one only. So that the plaintiff is now too late in saying that he did not press the case of fraud because it was not necessary as the law then stood to do so. For the case of fraud would equally have given him a right to relief even if the decision of this court in Peek v. Derry had stood. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed and the action dismissed, with costs, and the plaintiff must be ordered to repay the costs paid to him upon the judgment below.

FRY, L.J.—This is an action of deceit, and it is really based on a single sentence in the prospectus, which was this: "The business at the present time returns a net profit of over seventeen per cent. on the capital employed." Before the judge below, the case was conducted on the ground that this statement was false in fact, and that, though the defendant may have believed it to be true, he had no adequate or reasonable ground for so believing. That was sufficient as the law was understood to be at that time, but now, by the decision of the House of Lords, it has been held not to be sufficient. The case accordingly has been argued here on the grounds, first, that the statement was false in fact; secondly, that the defendant knew it was false; and, thirdly, that the defendant's alleged agent knew it was false, and that that made the defendant liable. The respondent has to get over a preliminary difficulty arising from the fact that the case of fraud was not put prominently forward in the court below, and we are asked to convict a man of fraud on grounds on which the judge who heard the case did not convict him. I should pause long before doing that. The plaintiff's only hope of success would be by obtaining a new trial, and therefore the real question is, Ought we here to order a new trial on points not decided by the judge below merely because the case might have been put in a different way but was not? I think we ought not. I entirely agree with the remarks of Cotton, L.J., on that question. The plaintiff might have presented the two cases alternatively in the court below—that is, first, that the statement was false in fact, even if not fraudulent; and, secondly, that it was false and also fraudulent. I think we ought not now to put the defendant to the risk and expense of a new trial. There are two questions involved on this appeal. First, were the defendant's allegations false in fact? Secondly, were they false to the knowledge of the defendant? I confess I am by no means convinced that they were false in fact. The nearest evidence we have to show what the capital employed was, is from the partnership deed of 1885. The father was then dealing with his sons, and made what seems to be an honest estimate. In the absence of positive evidence I know of no firmer ground than that deed on which to take my stand in estimating the amount of capital employed in this business. The father said in his evidence that no capital had been added since. I should come, if it were necessary to decide the point, to the conclusion that the capital was less than £13,000, but all I say is that the statement is not shown to be false in fact.

I see no reason to doubt that the report on which the statement was based was substantially correct, but it is not necessary to express a concluded opinion on that point, as the case entirely fails on both the main questions. Secondly, Was the defendant aware that the statement was untrue, assuming that it was so in fact? On the facts I hold he clearly was not. He said in his evidence that he believed the statement was true, and there was nothing to show that he was not speaking the truth. The action, therefore, fails, and the appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—It is unnecessary in this case to express any opinion whether the judgment of Kekewich, J., would have been maintainable if the House of Lords had not reversed the decision of this court in Peek v. Derry. The House of Lords, however, as I understand their decision, have held that, if a statement is untrue in fact, but believed to be true, though without any reasonable grounds for that belief, no action can be maintained—there must be moral delinquency and some dishonesty.

Lord Herschell, in his judgment, adopted the first three definitions of what would make a false statement, sufficient to support an action of deceit, which I gave in Peek v. Derry, and rejected the fourth, which was this:—"If the statement is untrue in fact, but believed to be true, but without any reasonable grounds for such belief." The judge below acted on that fourth definition. The House of Lords have decided that, however unreasonable it would be for the defendant to believe the statement true, yet, if he does in fact honestly believe it, it will not support an action of deceit. So that, even if ninety-nine people out of a hundred would understand the statement in a sense in which it would be inaccurate, yet, if the defendant believed that it bore a meaning which would make it accurate, he would not be liable for it. For the reasons given by the other Lords Justices, I think the burden of proof that the statement was dishonest lies on the plaintiff, and has not been discharged by him, and also that there ought to be no new trial granted of this action.

Appeal allowed.

November 20.—On this day an application was made to the Court of Appeal, after the above judgment had been passed and entered, on behalf of the defendant, the successful appellant, that an order might be made to allow the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence taken at the trial of the action before Kekewich, J., and also the costs of the transcripts of the judgments of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek.

Muir Mackenzie, for the applicant.—The judge below only took short notes of the evidence, as he said there were shorthand notes being taken of it; these shorthand notes were transcribed for the use of the judges on the hearing of the appeal, and were in fact used and referred to by them; the hearing of the appeal would have taken a much longer time if these shorthand notes had not been taken and used. One of the questions in the case was as to the meaning of the word "capital," and the evidence on that was very conflicting. As to the transcripts of the judgments of the Lords, the hearing of this appeal was at first adjourned till after the decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, and it came on again for hearing, a short time after the decision of the Lords in that case had been pronounced, but before any full report of it had been published, and therefore it was necessary for the appellant to obtain transcripts of the judgments of the Lords. He referred to Bigsby v. Dickinson, 25 W. R. 89, 4 Ch. D. 24; Philipps v. Philipps, 28 W. R. 376, 5 Q. B. D. 60. [FRY, L.J., referred to Earl De la Warr v. Miles, 30 W. R. 35, 19 Ch. D. 807. COTTON, L.J.—The order made by the Court of Appeal has been passed and entered, and how can we now alter that order, by making a new order as to costs?] I am not asking that the former order of the Court of Appeal be altered, but that a new order be made. An application like this may be made after the former order has been drawn up: Ex parte Steed, 33 W. R. 80.

He also referred to ord. 58, r. 4.

Warmington, Q.C., and J. M. Solomon, contrà, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application made to us, to direct that the appellant should be allowed the costs of the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence in this case of Glasier v. Rolls, and also that he should be allowed the shorthand writer's notes of the judgments in the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek.

The order has been passed and entered, and except where there has been a slip in not embodying in the order what was really the intention of the court, that order cannot be varied, because that would be really altering an order of this court, after that order has become a final order of the court. Even if one had thought that this ought to be done, it cannot be. It is not merely giving some direction which was not embodied in the order, but it is this. The order has directed that the costs be paid by one party to the other, and ordered those costs to be taxed. Well, as regards the costs of shorthand notes of evidence, the master is directed not to allow them unless there is some special direction given by the judge or by the court which hears the case; and it has been already laid down by this court* that any application for that purpose ought to be made immediately after or at the hearing at which the order was directed, because then the court is in possession of all the facts of the case and can say whether or not it is reasonable that these costs should be allowed.

As regards the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence, I must say, although that is not what my judgment turns upon, that we should never have allowed those costs here. Either the judge's notes, or if those notes were not sufficient, the notes taken by counsel would be quite sufficient, especially in a case like this, which really did not turn upon the minutiæ of the evidence, but upon the question as to what the law applicable to the case was. I am only now speaking from recollection, but I think that Kekewich, J., did not hold there was any fraud on the part of the appellant, the defendant, but only that he made a misstatement as to the capital, which was as to an inference to be drawn from the facts. There was some discussion as to what was properly called capital, &c. But certainly, independently of that, we ought never, except in very extreme cases, to allow the shorthand notes of the evidence, when there are the judge's notes to be referred to, and when counsel, by the note which they take, ought to be able to correct that if necessary. I decide the present application only on this ground, that as regards the altering the order which has been made, and which this in effect would be doing, we cannot do it, and ought not to do it, after the order has become the final order of the court, and has been passed and entered. That really applies to the application as regards the shorthand notes, both of the judgment of the House of Lords and the shorthand notes of the evidence.

As regards the notes of the judgment of the House of Lords those stand in a different position from the notes of the evidence, and if the taxing master, having regard to the circumstances of the case, thinks that those can be allowed, then no alteration of the order will be required. But I am of opinion that we cannot and ought not to make any alteration even as regards those, so as to make the order direct that which in fact at present it does not direct. I do not say at all what the effect of the order as it now stands is as regards the taxation; but I decline to make any alteration in the order in the events which have happened—namely, after the order has become the final order of the court, and is passed and entered, and there has been no slip in properly expressing what the order of the court was.

* Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums District Board, 28 W. R. 664.

BOWEN, L.J.—I entirely agree with Cotton, L.J., and I think the judgment of the court in this matter ought to rest upon the ground on which he has put it. It is quite a different thing to come after a judgment and ask that it should be amended so as to express the real intention of the court, entertained by the court at the time the judgment is given. If an intention so entertained by the court is not expressed by the order there has been a miscarriage, and you set it right as a slip; but to seek to alter the judgment by asking that something be embodied in it, the demand for which was not even thought of at the time, and was never brought to the attention of the court, is really to ask us to make a different judgment from that which has already been perfected. It seems to me therefore it is too late now for Mr. Mackenzie to come with any part of his request.

I entirely agree with what the Lord Justice has said about the general practice as regards shorthand notes. Of course it is a matter of discretion. We cannot bind the discretion of the court, nor do we intend to do so in any similar case, but looking at the practice of the court I think it is most expedient that suitors should know that it would require an extreme case to induce the court to exercise such a discretion. To easily allow the shorthand notes on appeal would be, in my opinion, to add a new terror to litigation, of which there are plenty. It seems to me that this application must be dismissed with costs.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors, E. T. Tadman; Byrne & Lucas.

(1898, 2 Ch. 539.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 7.

STROUSBERG v. SANDERS. (a.)

Costs—Taxation—Practice—"Objection in writing"—Review of taxation—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 39—41.

An application by a party to a judge under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 41, for an order for a review of taxation of a bill of costs as to any item or part of an item contained therein, cannot be entertained unless the party applying has first carried in an objection in writing under sub-rule 39 with respect to each such item or part of an item.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

This was an appeal from Stirling, J., refusing to make an order on a summons under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 41, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, for a review of taxation of costs.

It appeared that an order had been made in the action that certain costs of the defendants, the Commercial Bank of Scotland, should be taxed, and paid by the plaintiff, who had failed in an application for an interim injunction against them. Upon taxation the master disallowed some of the items in the said defendants' bill of costs incurred in respect of the said application. The defendants then carried in objections in writing to the disallowance, under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 39, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. The taxing master, after considering the objections, changed his mind, and allowed the items. The plaintiff then, instead of carrying in objections in writing to the allowance of the items, took out a summons, under sub-rule 41, to review the taxation. Sub-rule 39 is as follows:—"Any party who may be dissatisfied with the allowance or disallowance by the taxing officer, in any bill of costs taxed by him, of the whole or any part of any items, may, at any time before the certificate or allocatur is signed, deliver to the other party interested therein, and carry in before the taxing officer, an objection in writing to such allowance or disallowance, specifying therein by a list, in a short and concise form, the items, or parts thereof, objected to, and the grounds and reasons for such objections, and may thereupon apply to the taxing officer to review the taxation in respect of the same." Sub-rule 40 provides for the reconsideration by the taxing master, upon the objections, of his taxation. Sub-rule 41 is as follows:—"Any party who may be dissatisfied with the certificate or allocatur of the taxing officer as to any item or part of an item which may have been objected to as aforesaid may, within fourteen days from the date of the certificate or allocatur, or such other time as the court or judge, or taxing officer at the time he signs his certificate or allocatur, may allow, apply to a judge at chambers for an order to review the taxation as to the same item or part of an item, and the judge may thereupon make such order as the judge may think just; but the certificate or allocatur of the taxing officer shall be final and conclusive as to all matters which shall not have been objected to in manner aforesaid."

Stirling, J., held that the plaintiff's application could not be entertained, on the ground that he had not carried in objections in writing (under sub-rule 39) to the allowance of the items.

The plaintiff appealed.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the appellant.—Sub-rule 39 was satisfied by the Bank carrying in objections to the disallowance. The only object of the written objections is to narrow the issue by pinning the party down to the objections taken, and also to assist the judge by showing him what items are objected to. It cannot have been intended that the other side must then carry in cross-objections in writing. That would be endless, as the first objectors would then have to bring in counter cross-objections, if the taxing master again changed his mind, and so on ad infinitum; and thus the path, provided by sub-rule 41, to the judge would never be trodden. The plaintiff asks for a review of taxation in respect of items as to which objections in writing were carried in by the other side. That is sufficient to satisfy sub-rule 39, though the objections were to the disallowance of the items, and we now object to their allowance.

Buckley, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the defendant Bank, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Stirling, J., refusing to send back a certificate, for the taxing master to review his taxation. The order was made upon an application, under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 41, for a review of the taxation. That was refused. Was Stirling, J., right in refusing to order a review? I think he was. It was argued here very strenuously that the only object of sub-rule 39 was to narrow the issue so that the judge might know which of the items were objected to. But in my opinion that was not the only object. The objecting party has by sub-rule 39 to state his reasons, so that he may be confined to the grounds he has taken before the taxing master. [His lordship read sub-rule 39.] Does not this plaintiff come within that? He is a party dissatisfied with the allowance of the items. Under that sub-rule, therefore, he is to specify in a short and concise form his objections, and the grounds and reasons for them, and may thereupon apply to the taxing master to review the taxation in respect of the items. But this was not done. Sub-rule 40 is not so material. It deals with the duty of the taxing master to review his taxation and give the grounds of his decision. The plaintiff has not got that. Then we come to sub-rule 41. [His lordship read sub-rule 41.] Well now, it is said that the plaintiff has complied with that, because he asked for a review of taxation as to items which had been objected to. That is not so. The objections carried in by the other side were against the disallowance of certain specified items for specified reasons, and not to their allowance, which is a different thing. Anyone who wishes to avail himself of that sub-rule can only do so when he has carried in objections in writing, and therefore the plaintiff ought to have carried in objections to the allowance. Fairly construed, sub-rule 41 must mean that the items must have been objected to by the party applying for a review of the taxation. Then there was a very ingenious argument put forward, that the bringing in of objections would tend to perpetuity, as each side would heap objections on objections ad infinitum. That would not be the case. After one party has carried in objections, and when the other party, after a change of mind by the taxing master, has carried in cross-objections, the whole thing is at an end. I think that the plaintiff has not followed the course required by the rules. He ought to have begun with sub-rule 39 instead of sub-rule 41. In my opinion, therefore, the order of Stirling, J., was quite right, and this appeal fails.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FRY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The appellant here was dissatisfied with the allowance by the taxing master of certain items in a bill of costs. He says that sub-rule 39 has been satisfied because the disallowance of the items was objected to by the other side. But that is not what the rule requires. In sub-rule 39 the objection is to be either to the allowance or to the disallowance, and the grounds of the objection to the allowance or disallowance ought to be given. The objection to the allowance cannot be the same thing as the objection to the disallowance. I think therefore that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Cuddon & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Rooke & Sons.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 20.

TOMLINSON v. CONSOLIDATED CREDIT AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION. (a.)

*Landlord and tenant—Fraudulent removal of goods to avoid distress—Bill of sale—Removal of goods within five days of seizure—*11 Geo. 2, c. 19, ss. 1, 3—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 13.

The statute 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, giving a landlord power to sue for the fraudulent removal of the goods of a tenant in order to avoid a distress, does not apply where the goods have become, by the execution of a bill of sale by the tenant, the property of the bill of sale holder.

The landlord has no power to sue under section 13 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, where goods of the tenant granted by him under a bill of sale have been removed by the grantee, with the consent of the tenant, within five days after seizure.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lane v. Tyler, 56 L. J. Q. B. 461, 35 W. R. Dig. 32, approved.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Field and Manisty, JJ.).

The plaintiff was the landlord of premises at Gunnersbury, which were let to a man named Flicker, who had given a bill of sale over his furniture to the defendants. On the 29th of September, 1887, rent to the amount of £30 was due from Flicker to the plaintiff in respect of the premises, and on the evening of that day the defendants, with Flicker's consent, seized and carried away the goods in order to avoid a distress. The goods were subsequently returned by the defendants to Flicker.

The present action was brought under section 13 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, for removing the goods of Flicker within four days after seizure, contrary to the provisions of the section, and a claim was added under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, for damages for fraudulently removing the goods of Flicker in order to prevent a distress for the rent due. It was tried before Grantham, J., and a verdict and judgment were given for the plaintiff, but were set aside by the Divisional Court.

The plaintiff appealed.

By the 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 1, power is given to landlords within thirty days to follow and distrain on any goods of the tenant fraudulently or clandestinely carried away in order to avoid a distress for rent then due.

By section 3, "If any such tenant or lessee shall so fraudulently remove and convey away his or her goods or chattels, or if any person or persons shall wilfully or knowingly aid or assist any such tenant or lessee in such fraudulent conveying away or carrying off of any part of his or her goods and chattels, or in concealing the same, all and every person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay to the landlord . . . from whose estate such goods and chattels were fraudulently carried off double the value of the goods."

By section 13 of the Bills of Sate Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882, "All personal chattels seized, or of which possession is taken after the commencement of this Act under or by virtue of any bill of sale, . . . shall remain on the premises where they were so seized or so taken possession of, and shall not be removed or sold until after the expiration of five clear days from the day they were so seized or taken possession of."

Waddy, Q.C., and Ogle, for the appellant.—The goods removed were distrainable, and were removed with the intention of defeating the distress for rent already due. Even if the case does not fall within 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 1, the defendants, in removing the goods within five days after seizure, committed a breach of section 13 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, for which the landlord can sue.

Cock, Q.C., and Clay, for the respondents.—The goods were not the tenant's. They had passed to the defendants under the bill of sale. The goods were removed no doubt within the five days, but they were removed by the consent of the grantor, and the landlord cannot complain: Lane v. Tyler, 35 W. R. Dig. 32.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal must fail. The action was brought upon the statute 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, and in order to succeed the plaintiff must bring himself within the statute. That statute imposes certain consequences in the case of the tenant's goods being fraudulently removed in order to defeat a distress for rent which is due at the time of removal. In this case there is no doubt that there was rent due, and that the goods were removed in order to defeat the landlord's distress for that rent. But they were not the tenant's goods; they were the goods of the defendants. Directly the bill of sale was executed the property in the goods passed to the defendants. Therefore the case does not come within the statute. But it is said that the landlord can recover against the defendants, because, by section 13 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the grantee of a bill of sale cannot remove the goods seized under a bill of sale until the expiration of five days from the date of the seizure. But the plaintiff has no right to complain of that. The case of Lane v. Tyler, which seems to me to be rightly decided, shows that where goods have been removed by the consent of the grantor of a bill of sale within the five days the landlord has no right to complain. The Bills of Sale Act was not passed in the interests of landlords, but to regulate the rights of grantors and grantees of bills of sale. That, therefore, disposes of the second point, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute of George II. refers to the fraudulent removal of the tenant's goods in order to avoid a distress. Here it is plain that the goods were not those of the tenant, but of the defendants. The property had been transferred by the execution of this bill of sale. As to the second point, it is obvious, when the Bills of Sale Act is looked into, especially having regard to section 7, which gives the grantor power to apply to the court within five days of the seizure, that the Act was not passed in the interests of the landlord, who has no locus standi to complain of its breach. Therefore the decision in Lane v. Tyler is correct, and must be adopted.

LOPES, L.J.—Up to the moment of the distress the goods of a stranger or of a lodger may be removed in order to avoid the distress without any contravention of the Act of George II. In this case the goods were not those of the tenant. They had passed to the defendants under the bill of sale. The removal, therefore, does not come within the statute. On the second point, I will only say that I entirely agree with Lane v. Tyler, which appears to me to be good law. If, with the consent of the grantor of a bill of sale, the goods seized are removed by the grantee within five days of the seizure, the landlord has no right to complain. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. B. Churchill.

Solicitors for the respondent, Vanderpump & Eve.

From Q. B. Div. July 3, 4; Aug. 9, 1889.

JOHNSON v. LINDSAY. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Negligence—Common employment—Common master—Contractor and sub-contractor.

J., a workman, was employed with others by H., a builder, in carrying out certain works which H. had contracted to do. Under the contract, L., an iron-founder, was to do certain special work (required to be done by a specialist) at a price to be paid out of the contract price for the whole work, but L. paid and had control over his own workmen. J., having been injured by the negligence of L.'s workmen, brought an action for damages against L.

Held, by Cotton and Lopes, L.JJ. (dissentiente Fry, L.J.), that L. was a sub-contractor under H., and was, with his workmen, in the employment and under the control of H., who was accordingly the common master of the injuring and injured workmen; that the case was, therefore, governed by Wiggett v. Fox, 4 W. R. 254, 11 Ex. 832, and the action could not be maintained.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Manisty, J.) affirmed.

Abraham v. Reynolds, 8 W. R. 181, 5 H. & N. 143, explained and distinguished.

Held, by Fry, L.J., that L. was not a sub-contractor under H.; that the burden of proving that H. had control over L.'s part of the work and over the workmen engaged on it, lay upon L., and that he had not discharged that burden; that, even if there was common employment, there was no common master; and, that being so, the case was not within Wiggett v. Fox, and the defence of common employment was not maintainable.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, George Johnson, from an order of a Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Manisty, J.) setting aside a verdict given in favour of the plaintiff, and entering judgment for the defendants.

Messrs. Higgs & Hill were contractors, and they entered into a contract with an architect, acting on behalf of the landowners, for carrying out certain building operations. Under the contract, Lindsay & Co., or any other firm to be approved by the architect, were to be employed to do a part of the work required to be done by specialists; and in fact Lindsay & Co. were so employed. The plaintiff was a workman employed by Higgs & Hill, and he was injured by a bucket falling on him, owing, as it was alleged, to the negligence of the defendants' workmen. The defendants denied the negligence and pleaded contributory negligence; and another defence set up, and on which this case turned in the Court of Appeal, was that of "common employment." The accident arose in this way:—A bucket was being hoisted up by Lindsay's men by means of a pulley to an elevated platform on which the defendants' part of the work had to be done, when the high wind unhooked it so that it fell on the plaintiff and injured him. He was picked up by one of the defendants' men, who, being asked by the plaintiff why they had not hooked the bucket securely, replied, "We were in a hurry."

The action was tried by Grantham, J., in Middlesex, and the learned judge put the above statement (as to the cause of the accident) to the jury as part of the evidence. The jury found a verdict for fifty guineas for the plaintiff. On appeal, the Divisional Court, consisting of Pollock, B., and Manisty, J., considered they were bound by the case of Wiggett v. Fox, 4 W. R. 254, 11 Ex. 832, and accordingly set aside the verdict on the ground of "common employment," and entered judgment for the defendants, and they also held that the plaintiff's statement as to what Lindsay's men had said at the time of the accident was not admissible as evidence.

The plaintiff appealed.

Guiry (Harris, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—The Divisional Court thought they were bound by the decision in Wiggett v. Fox; but, in the first place, that case is distinguishable from the present one, and, secondly, it has been overruled by more recent cases. Here the employers who were guilty of negligence were not sub-contractors under Higgs & Hill. The latter had no control over Lindsay's servants, nor Lindsay over theirs, and each paid their own. Higgs & Hill contracted to do the whole of the work in accordance with the specification, and the total amount to be paid them included payment for the part of the work to be done by Lindsay. It was all put into one so as to make a lump sum, but really the contracts were separate. [LOPES, L.J., referred to the case of Hutchinson v. The York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Co., 5 Ex. 343.] The nearest case to this is Wiggett v. Fox, but the facts were not the same, and if that decision were out of the way this could not be held to be a case of "common employment." In that case the defendants were the contractors, and let out to the employer of the deceased certain piece work, and paid the deceased with their own hands, and retained the control over the deceased workman's employer and his workmen. The doctrine of "common employment" is recognized in Priestley v. Fowler, 3 M. & W. 1, but there the plaintiff does not seem to have been aware of the defect, though the defendant was. In Abraham v. Reynolds, 8 W. R. 181, 5 H. & N. 143, at p. 149, Channell, B., explained Wiggett v. Fox, showing the facts to be different from what they are here. In the present case neither of the contractors had power to dismiss the servants of the others. In Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Co, 25 W. R. 263, 2 C. P. D. 205, Wiggett v. Fox was doubted. The principle that underlies the doctrine that an employer of labour is held not to be liable for damage to a workman caused by a person in the same employment, is that the workman can say Here is a person who is wanting in skill or care, if you do not dismiss him you will be liable for any mischief done by him, and unless you remove the source of danger I am entitled to leave your service without notice. [LOPES, L.J.—Defective machinery or an incompetent servant takes the case out of the doctrine of "common employment."] Yes, with the qualification that the master is aware of the defect or incompetence. The principle of "common employment" is also explained in Warburton v. Great Western Railway Co., 15 W. R. 108, L. R. 2 Ex. 30, at pp. 32, 33. In Turner v. Great-Eastern Railway Co., 33 L. T. N. S. 431, 24 W. R. Dig. 150, it was held that there was not common employment. Here, as in that case, each firm of contractors paid and retained control over their own servants. "Common employment" is where the plaintiff is in the position of a fellow servant of the wrong-doer. The service, employment, and payment must be common. In Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., Cockburn, C.J., in considering whether Wiggett v. Fox was rightly decided, said, "My own view is that it was not." Therefore that case is not binding to the full extent to which it goes, but must be limited to its own facts and circumstances. Hall v. Johnson, 13 W. R. 411, 3 H. & C. 589, is another case of "common employment." In Wiggett v. Fox the man killed was under the control of the defendant, and in that case the wrongdoer was employed by the contractors in chief, and the sufferer by the sub-contractor, whereas here it was the converse case.

Kemp, Q.C., and Poulter, for the respondents.—The building owners made their contract with Higgs & Hill, and had nothing to do with Lindsay & Co., but they insisted on a part of the work being done by specialists, and so Lindsay & Co. were brought in by Higgs & Hill. [FRY, L.J.—How can the sub-contractor here, when sued by a servant of the head contractor, set up the case that his own servants are employed by the head contractor? Is that a defence against the negligence of his own servants?] Yes. In Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Co. the other judges did not express any concurrence in the Chief Justice's dictum as to Wiggett v. Fox. The question of negligence arose from the way the bucket was fastened, which was only seen by the witness from a distance. Grantham, J., put to the jury as part of the evidence what was said to have passed between the injured man and Lindsay's workmen immediately after the accident. We ask to keep our judgment, or, in the alternative, for a new trial. [They referred to ord. 31, r. 6, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883.] Lindsay is entitled to stand in the shoes of Higgs & Hill as to the defence of common employment. Morgan v. The Vale of Neath Railway Co., 14 W. R. 144, L. R. 1 Q. B. 149, 5 B. & S. 570, referred to by this court in the case of Charles v. Taylor, 3 C. P. D. 492, 26 W. R. Dig. 140, is strongly in our favour.

Guiry, in reply.—In order to avail themselves of the defence of common employment, the defendants must be the common employer. In Swainson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 26 W. R. 413, 3 Ex. D. 341, Pollock, B., at p. 344, after referring to Wiggett v. Fox and the other cases, said, "In all these cases, there was not only a common employment, that is, employment with a common object, but also common service, that is, service under one master." [LOPES, L.J.—Was not Lindsay doing the work for which Higgs had contracted, so that both Lindsay and his servants were in Higgs's employment?] No. In order to ascertain who is liable, you must look to the wrongdoer himself or to the first person in the ascending line, who is the employer and has control over the work: Murray v. Currie, 19 W. R. 104, L. R. 6 C. P. 24; and Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 6 W. R. 664, where Lord Cranworth explained that a fellow workman knows the risks he undertakes. That was referred to and approved by Lord Cairns, L.C., in Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 Scotch App. Cas. 326, at p. 331. Higgs & Hill cannot be affected with the knowledge of the risks here. The principle of "common employment" is that as the servant has as good an opportunity as his master of judging as to the incompetence of his fellow-servant, he cannot recover damages from his master for injuries caused by that fellow-servant. That was not so here—the plaintiff had no opportunity of judging whether the persons employed by Lindsay were incompetent or not.

Poulter asked leave to refer to the Scottish case of Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Co., 1877, Court of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 469.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—COTTON, L.J.—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of Lopes, L.J., with which I agree.

LOPES, L.J.—The plaintiff in this case was employed by Higgs & Hill. The man whose negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff was directly employed by the defendants. The question to be determined is whether the plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendants as the masters of the man who caused the injury. This entirely depends on the relative position of the injuring and injured man. Higgs & Hill had contracted for the whole work of improving and altering certain dwelling-houses under the supervision of an architect. A certain portion of this work was of a special and definite kind, which was to be done under a special clause in Higgs & Hill's contract. The architect was to select the persons to do this work, and Higgs & Hill were to allow the persons so selected the use of their scaffolding, and were to provide them with any needful attendants for the carrying out of the work, and were to work with them as might be necessary for the due despatch of their work. The work was to be carried out in accordance with a specification and instructions to be forwarded by the architect to Higgs & Hill. The architect selected the defendants, and obtained an estimate for the work from them for £213, which was duly forwarded to Higgs & Hill. This sum was included in the contract of Higgs & Hill, and was to be paid by them. It was admitted that the man who caused the injury had been selected with reasonable care, and that all the materials and resources were adequate and proper. In these circumstances we are of opinion that the defendants became sub-contractors under Higgs & Hill, and were, together with the men directly employed by them, in the employment of, and under the general control of, Higgs & Hill, working together for one common object—i.e., the carrying out of Higgs & Hill's contract—and taking upon themselves all the risks naturally incident to the work they had undertaken. Higgs & Hill were the common masters of the injuring and injured men, both were in their employment, both were engaged at the time of the injury in performing an operation included in Higgs & Hill's contract, and for which Higgs & Hill were to receive payment, and both, the one directly and the other indirectly, were paid by them. This case comes within the decision of Wiggett v. Fox. In that case the defendants had contracted with the Crystal Palace Co. to erect two towers. They themselves supplied materials, scaffolding, and tools, but engaged one Moss as a piece-worker, who employed Wiggett and others as workmen under him. Whilst Wiggett was engaged at his work one of Fox & Co.'s own workmen let fall a heavy tool from the top of one of the towers and killed him. It was held that Fox & Co. were not liable. Alderson, B., said: "Here both the servants were at the time of the injury engaged in doing the common work of the contractors, the defendants, and we think that the sub-contractor and all his servants must be considered as being for this purpose the servants of the defendants whilst engaged in doing work, each devoting his attention to the work necessary for the completion of the whole, and working together for that purpose." And again, further on in his judgment, he says: "If we were to hold the defendants liable, we should be obliged to hold that every contractor, where various tradesmen, bricklayers, plumbers, and the like are employed to build a house, would be liable for all accidents, &c., inter se, to the various workmen so employed in the common object, and it is difficult to see that it could stop there; possibly the common employer of them all might be made liable in such cases." The case of Wiggett v. Fox is the inverse of the present case, but appears to us to involve the same principle. It has never been overruled, but has been commented on by Channell, B., and Martin, B., in Abraham v. Reynolds. The defendants in that case were cotton brokers, and the plaintiff was the servant of Jump & Son, who had contracted to do all the defendants' carting. The plaintiff was sent by Jump & Son with a lorry to fetch cotton for the defendants from the warehouse of a third person. The cotton was lowered by the defendants' servants into the lorry, and there received by the plaintiff. Owing to their negligence a bail fell upon and injured him. It was held by the Court of Exchequer that, as he was not under the control of the defendants, he was entitled to recover damages from them, although he was engaged in a common operation with their servants. It is to be observed that it is not and could not be suggested that the defendants were the common masters of the injuring and injured man, nor were they both in any sense paid by the defendants. The work was joint but the employment different. Channell, B., and Martin, B., say they assented to the judgment in Wiggett v. Fox, because they thought Fox & Co. had control over Wiggett. Having regard to the facts of the case which they were deciding, we think they must have meant because they thought the relation of master and servant existed between Wiggett and Fox & Co. There is, therefore, a material distinction between the case of Abraham v. Reynolds and the present case. We know of no case where it has been held that a man is liable for an injury caused by his servant when the man doing the injury and the injured man are to be considered as employed in doing the work of another who is the common master of both. The principle of common employment has been carried much further in a recent Scotch case, Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Co., where it was held that all persons engaged upon the same work, whether in the same service or not, had taken the risks of the work upon themselves and had no remedy for anything but the personal negligence of those co-operating in the work. The English authorities do not go so far as this, and for the purpose of the present case it is unnecessary to go so far, as we think there was not only co-operation in the work, but a common master and a common employment. We therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the judgment that has been delivered. The case appears to me to be one of very considerable importance, and I will therefore state my reasons for differing from my learned brethren. The first question is whether Lindsay & Co. were sub-contractors to Higgs & Hill. I have come to the conclusion that they were not.

The facts were as follows:—Mr. Burden, the architect who was superintending the erection of the building, obtained an estimate from the defendants, Lindsay & Co., who were ironfounders, of the cost of constructing and fitting a fireproof flooring for the roof of the building. Mr. Burden subsequently entered into a contract with Higgs & Hill for the erection of the buildings. That contract nowhere provided that Higgs & Hill should do the whole of the work, nor is there any specification with regard to their doing that particular work. It contained a general provision that for the purpose of carrying out the works specified to be executed by other tradesmen, and for which provisional amounts were included in the estimate, the contractors were to allow free access to the premises and all reasonable facilities to such tradesmen for carrying out the several works reserved for them to perform. It also contained a special provision that Higgs & Hill were to provide a sum of £213 to be paid to Lindsay & Co., or any other firm to be approved by the architect, for the fireproof flooring in question; and were to allow Lindsay & Co. the use of their scaffolding, and to provide necessary attendants for the carrying out of their work, and to work with them as might be necessary for the due despatch of their work, all of which seem to me to be quite inconsistent with the idea of Lindsay & Co. being sub-contractors to Higgs & Hill. When the building had reached the point at which it became necessary for the flooring to be laid, the architect communicated with Lindsay & Co., and they proceeded to do the work. On that state of facts I cannot come to the conclusion that they were in the position of sub-contractors at all, but in my opinion they were independent contractors for a particular portion of the work.

Secondly, even if they were sub-contractors, the further question arises whether the contract contained any provision for Higgs & Hill having control over that part of the work and the workmen engaged on it. The burden of proving that there was any such control lies upon the defendants, but there is no evidence at all to show that Higgs & Hill had any power to control the execution of this part of the work, and there is nothing to show that they had any control over Lindsay & Co.'s workmen, or that they had power to dismiss them, or were under any liability to pay them, and the probabilities of the case seem to me very strong against this hypothesis. Lindsay & Co. had undertaken to do this work, and they were responsible for doing it rightly. They were specialists and employed their own skilled men, and therefore the notion that they would submit to the control of a firm of general builders is not one that commends itself to my mind. I think, therefore, that there was no control in Higgs & Hill over Lindsay & Co.'s work or workmen. Those appear to me to be the facts of the case. When I turn to the authorities I feel I am placed in a position of considerable difficulty. There appear to me to be cases binding on this court which do lay down certain principles of law with sufficient clearness. On the other hand, there are cases (and some of them in the House of Lords) which have laid down principles which, if fully developed, seem inconsistent with the cases which I consider binding on this court. I think that Wiggett v. Fox, as explained by Cockburn, C.J., in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., and by Channell, B., in Abraham v. Reynolds, and by Pollock, B., in Swainson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., does not govern the present case. All those cases proceed on this—that the control of one person over the work and the men is the test to be applied in order to ascertain whether the master is liable or not. In Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Co. Cockburn, C.J., expressed his opinion that the decision in Wiggett v. Fox could only be supported on that principle. What he says is this: "It is quite unnecessary to say whether the case of Wiggett v. Fox, which was relied on by the defendants, was rightly decided. My own view is that it was not, though I might agree with the decision if I could come to the conclusion that the facts were what Channell, B., appears to have thought they were in the explanation he gives of that case in Abraham v. Reynolds." And in Swainson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., which was a decision of this court, two of the Lords Justices took the same view.

I think, therefore, that in the present case, in which there was no control over the work or over the men by one common master, the defence of common employment cannot be maintained. But the next cases — Warburton v. Great Western Railway Co. and Swainson v. North-Eastern Railway Co. — seem to me to establish another proposition—that, in order that the master may escape liability, there must be not only common employment but a common master. In the former case Kelly, C.B., referring to the recent authorities, said:—"The principle, or, rather, the proposition, of law established by these cases is, that where two or more persons are the servants of one master and engaged in one common employment, the master is not liable to an action for any injury sustained by one servant by reason of the negligence of another in the work or employment which is common to both or incidental to the carrying on of the general business or the operations in which the one and the other are engaged. And the ground upon which the decisions have been pronounced is, that it must be presumed that a servant takes upon himself the risk of any injury he may sustain by the negligence of another servant under the same master and in the same employment, and that such risk is part of the consideration for the wages which he is entitled to receive."

In Swainson v. North-Eastern Railway Co. that view was adopted not only in the Divisional Court, but by the learned judges of this court. Lord Bramwell said: "The two forms of the proposition seem to me substantially the same; in either case it is necessary to prove that a relation has been established between the person who complains and the master of the person who does the injury." And Lord Esher said: "I think that the authorities bear out the proposition laid down in the Exchequer Division—that in order to give rise to the exemption there must be a common employment and a common master." Applying that to the present case, if there was a common employment there certainly was no common master.

That, again, is explained in Warburton v. Great Western Railway Co., L. R. 2 Ex., at p. 33, where it is said "the ground upon which these decisions have been pronounced is, that it must be presumed that a servant takes upon himself the risk of any injury he may sustain by the negligence of another servant under the same master and in the same employment, and that such risk is part of the consideration for the wages which he is entitled to receive."

The plaintiff here never received any wages from Lindsay & Co., whether they were sub-contractors or independent contractors, and therefore the principle stated by Kelly, C.B., for the exemption of the master does not apply. And I cannot help observing that this is the first case in which the doctrine of common employment has been held to apply to a sub-contractor. In the other cases the person complaining has been employed by the sub-contractor, and the wrongdoer by the head contractor. Those authorities which are binding on me lead me to the conclusion that the defence of common employment ought not to succeed. I will go a little further, however, and admit that I feel great difficulty in understanding the grounds of many of the cases. The case of Wilson v. Merry seems to approach the matter from a different side, and if that were the only authority to be considered I might concur in the conclusion arrived at by my learned brethren. I should then say that negligence is the default in performing some duty to take care; and I should say that the duty of a master to the general public is to take care that they are not injured by himself or his men, and that the duty of a master towards those in his employment in any given work which the master does not personally execute is to select competent workmen and furnish them with adequate materials and resources, and that if he does that he has discharged his duty. Here we have this question. What is the duty of a master who does not personally execute the work towards a workman not employed by him, but who is a servant of another master who has taken part in the common enterprise? I know of no authority to answer that question. But I do know that in Wilson v. Merry Lord Cairns indicated the difference in this respect between a member of the general public and a workman. He said:—"A servant may choose for himself between serving a master who does and a master who does not attend in person to his business." Applying that principle to the present case, a man may choose between taking part in an enterprise in which there is the co-operation of masters who employ servants, and not taking part in such an enterprise. If he voluntarily takes part in such an enterprise he cannot complain of the master who does all he can, who chooses competent servants and supplies them with fitting materials and appliances. That view might have commended itself to me if there were no other decision on the subject but Wilson v. Merry. But it is obvious that that law of reason would have far-reaching consequences, and it would, in my opinion, overrule some of the cases which are binding upon me. I do not, therefore, feel myself at liberty to adopt it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Langlois & Biden.

Solicitor for the respondents, G. H. Finch.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Chitty, J. } Oct. 29, 30; Nov. 7.

NEATH PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY v. LUCE. (a.)

Building society—Mortgages—Ultrà vires—Subrogation—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 15, sub-section 2.

Under section 15, sub-section 2, of the Building Societies Act, 1874, the amount for the time being secured to a building society by mortgages from its members is not limited to the principal moneys thereby secured, but includes also all such other sums as at the date of borrowing may be due in respect of interest, fines or otherwise, and instalments not then accrued, but secured by the mortgages and outstanding.

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where moneys were borrowed ultrà vires by a building society and applied in advancing members who gave to the society mortgages to secure the repayment of the advances, it was held that the persons from whom the moneys were borrowed by the society in order to make the advances were entitled to follow their moneys into the hands of the advanced members, and claim against the mortgages held by the society for the amounts secured by the mortgages, notwithstanding that a premium was deducted from that amount by the society when advancing the members.

Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co., 29 Ch. D. 902, 34 W. R. Dig. 25, followed.

This was an action brought in the name of the above-named society by the official liquidator against the defendants to set aside certain mortgages by the society, on the ground that the mortgages were unauthorized and invalid as against the society. The borowing powers of the society were limited in terms identical with those of section 15 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, which, so far as material, is as follows:—

"15. With respect to the borrowing of money by societies under this Act, the following provisions shall have effect:—

"(1) Any society under this Act may receive deposits or loans at interest, within the limits in this section provided, from the members or other persons, or from corporate bodies, joint-stock companies, or from any terminating society to be applied to the purposes of the society.

"(2) In a permanent society the total amount so received on deposit or loan, and not repaid by the society, shall not at any time exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured to the society by mortgages from its members. . . ."

Certain questions of law were, in the course of the action, ordered to be set down to be heard and disposed of before the trial. The first question was, whether the word "amount," in the expression "the amount for the time being secured to the society by mortgages from its members" (Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 15 (2)), included the principal sum only or included also interest and other moneys outstanding and secured by the mortgages. From the rules of the society it appeared that when the society made an advance to one of its members the member paid a premium for the advance, and that in each case the premium amounted to £10 per cent. on the sum advanced, and was deducted by the society from the sum advanced to its members. It also appeared that the moneys which the society had borrowed from the defendants upon the security of the mortgages impeached in this action were applied in advancing members, and thereupon a second question was raised—namely, whether, in the event of the mortgages being invalid, the mortgagees would be entitled to follow their moneys into the hands of the members therewith advanced and to claim under the mortgages given by the advanced members to the extent of the moneys expressed to be secured by the mortgages, or only to that extent less £10 per cent., the amount deducted as premium.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiff society, on the first point referred to sections 15 and 49 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, and on the second point to the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co., 29 Ch. D. 902, 34 W. R. Dig. 25.

Romer, Q.C., and Levett, and Byrne, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the defendants, on the first point referred to Laing v. Read, 18 W. R. 76, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 4, and on the second point to Mainland v. Upjohn, 37 W. R. 411, 41 Ch. D. 126.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., in reply, referred on the second to Laing v. Read and to the terms of the judgment in the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society v. Cunliffe Brooks & Co., which was produced.

Chitty, J.—The first point relates to the borrowing power of the society, which has a rule expressed in terms of an Act of Parliament, so I will address myself to the general clause in the Act. The 15th section of the Building Societies Act, 1874, empowers the society to borrow money, but in the case of a permanent society such as this there is a limit imposed by the 2nd sub-section of the 15th section. Now two terms are there compared. There is, first, the total amount received on deposit or loan and not repaid, and as to that term no question has been, nor could I think be, raised.

I will, by way of illustration, assume that on a given day the society had a sum of £100 which it had, at some preceding time, received. If, then, the society repaid a portion of that sum, this first term would be the balance, but if they had repaid nothing, this first term would be the whole amount which they had received. The first term does not involve any computation of interest whatever on the amount received. Thus if the society had, six months before entering into the borrowing transaction now in question, received a sum of £100 and had agreed to pay interest, so that at the date of the borrowing the £100 and some interest were owing, the first term would not consist of £100 and the interest, but simply of the £100. That is plain, because the language of the Act is the amount received. If several amounts are received, the first term is the total amount received and not repaid.

Then a comparison has to be instituted between that term and the second term mentioned in the sub-section—namely, "the amount for the time being secured to the society by mortgages from its members." The object of the comparison is to preclude the society from borrowing beyond the limit of the two-thirds mentioned—that is to say, the sum that they can borrow is not to exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured by mortgages from its members.

The first point raised by the plaintiffs is, that the amount secured must be so interpreted as to exclude any interest owing on the security. The best way is to take a very simple case. Suppose, when the society receives a sum of money on loan, that a mortgage has been made to it for £100, payable six months after the date of the mortgage, with interest payable half-yearly. Suppose, also, that when the society receives money on deposit, that there is due to the society the £100 in respect of the principal, and, six months having elapsed from the date of the mortgage but a few days before the deposit, £2 10s. in respect of interest calculated at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum. The plaintiff's contention is that the amount secured does not include the interest. But why not? If the question is put in the popular or in the legal form what must the answer be? The question is, What is the amount secured? The answer is simple, the principal secured is £100, the interest secured is £2 10s., the amount is £102 10s. I can see no other answer. No reason can be suggested why these words should not have their simple meaning applied in a case like this.

Now I will suppose, by way of adding to my simple case, that there is a small fine due in respect of the non-payment of the £2 10s. interest. We will say there is accordingly a fine of 10s. What, then, is the amount secured? The answer is: £100, £2 10s., and 10s. I am unable to frame any other answer to that question.

of these terms, each party agreeing to be bound by his decision."

For the purpose of carrying this agreement into effect, Mr. Wolstenholme, after consulting with the respective solicitors of Mr. and Mrs. Burnaby, settled the following indentures of the 11th and the 18th of May, 1887.

By the indenture dated the 11th of May, 1887, Mr. and Mrs. Burnaby, in exercise of the power of joint appointment given by the marriage settlement, jointly and irrevocably appointed that, after the death of the husband and the death or remarriage of the wife, one moiety of the investments representing the sum of £10,000 should be held in trust for the daughter Ruby on her attaining the age of twenty-one years or marrying under that age, which should first happen, and to be then vested and not before; and also that, after the death of the husband and the death or remarriage of the wife, the remaining moiety of the investments representing the sum of £10,000 should be held in trust for the daughter Ruby on her attaining the age of twenty-one years or marrying under that age, which should first happen, and to be then vested and not before, but subject to the power of revocation thereinafter contained—viz., that it should be lawful for the husband by deed to revoke the appointment thereinbefore made as to all or any part of the moiety lastly appointed, and to permit such moiety, or the part thereof to which the revocation should extend, or any portion thereof respectively, to devolve as unappointed, or to make any new appointment thereof which would be made by him solely in case he had survived the wife. And it was thereby provided that, in case of any such revocation, the daughter Ruby should accept the moiety first thereinbefore appointed in satisfaction of the moiety to which she was or would be entitled assuming her to be the only child of the husband and wife, and that the moiety to which, or to any part of which, such revocation should extend should be taken as the moiety which, in default of appointment, and in case of there being only one child to take a vested interest, would devolve as if there were no child to take a vested interest. Also by the same deed the wife irrevocably appointed that, after her death, another sum of £10,000 (part of funds brought into the settlement by her) should be held on trust for the daughter Ruby.

The decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage was made absolute on the 17th of May, 1887, and by the indenture dated the 18th of May, 1887, Mr. Burnaby released his power of appointment over the funds brought into the marriage settlement by the now divorced wife, and the divorced wife released to the trustees all the interest, dividends, and income which under the marriage settlement she would, if she survived Mr. Burnaby, become entitled to receive from the investments representing the first mentioned sum of £10,000, to the intent that those investments, on the death of Mr. Burnaby, should be held on the like trusts as if she were also dead. And she also thereby released to Mr. Burnaby all power of appointment over the investments representing the first mentioned sum of £10,000.

On the 7th of June, 1887, Mrs. Burnaby was married to Sidney Willoughby.

By a deed poll dated the 30th of November, 1887, Mr. Burnaby revoked his appointment secondly made in the indenture of the 11th of May, 1887, of the moiety of the investments representing the sum of £10,000 in favour of the daughter Ruby, so that such moiety might (subject to any future appointment thereof which might be made by him) devolve as if the appointment in that indenture had not been made.

This was an action by Mr. Burnaby against the children Lancelot and Muriel, the child Ruby, Mrs. Willoughby, his divorced wife, and the trustees of the marriage settlement, in which action he alleged that the children Lancelot and Muriel were illegitimate, but admitted the legitimacy of his daughter Ruby, and claimed a declaration that one moiety of the investments representing the £10,000 ought to be held by the trustees of the marriage settlement upon the trusts affecting such moiety in case there was no child of his marriage with his divorced wife, or in the alternative rectification of the indenture of the 11th of May, 1887.

Mrs. Willoughby did not defend the action. The defendant Ruby in her defence upheld the appointment in her favour in the indenture of the 11th of May, 1887, and alleged that the deed poll of the 30th of November, 1887, was void.

At the trial of the action a great deal of evidence was given as to the proceedings of Mr. and Mrs. Willoughby (formerly Mrs. Burnaby) and the circumstances attending the births of the children Lancelot and Muriel, the effect of which appears from the various judgments in the case.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., C. A. Middleton, and A. Young, for the plaintiff.

Giffard, Q.C., and Methold, for the children Lancelot and Muriel.

Sefton Strickland, for the daughter Ruby.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., for the trustees of the settlement.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., called Mrs. Hook, and proceeded to put in evidence the conversations between Sidney Willoughby and the witness respecting the birth of Lancelot.

Giffard, Q.C.—These conversations are not admissible, as declarations of a husband and wife are not admissible to bastardize children born in wedlock, or to prove non-access: Goodright v. Moss, 2 Cowp. 591. The House of Lords did not upset this rule in admitting evidence in the Aylesford Peerage case, 11 App. Cas. 1, 34 W. R. Dig. 74.

NORTH, J.—I think the evidence of the conversations is admissible. I cannot distinguish these statements made in conversation from the letter of Lord Blandford, admitted as evidence by the House of Lords in the Aylesford Peerage case. I think the verbal statements of Willoughby are as admissible as if they had been put into writing. I do not treat them as evidence of the truth of the matters stated, but think them admissible as showing that he made arrangements for the expected confinement of Mrs. Burnaby, whom he was then living with and representing as his wife.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., for the plaintiff, proposed to tender as evidence an official French certificate of the entry in the register at the mairie at Hyères of the birth of the child Lancelot. A French witness named Roux proved that he had compared the certificate with the original entry, and that it was an accurate copy. There was evidence that the original book could not be removed from the mairie. [NORTH, J.—If the original book cannot be produced I think you are entitled to give secondary evidence of its contents, but I do not see how this document is evidence per se.] It is admissible under section 7 of Lord Brougham's Act of 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99). [NORTH, J.—I do not think that section applies. In my opinion the entry of the birth was not a "judicial proceeding of any court of justice" or a "legal document filed or deposited in any such court."]

Giffard, Q.C., for the children Lancelot and Muriel.—Secondary evidence of the contents of the register cannot be admitted: Taylor on Evidence, 7th ed., vol. 2 p. 1,328, plac. 1,593.

NORTH, J.—I think this document is admissible. The passage quoted from Taylor on Evidence does not apply. The learned author is there speaking of official documents which are admissible as such; documents which prove themselves. The witness says he has compared the document with the original book, and tells me what is in the book. The document is admissible, not as an official document, but because the witness has compared it with the original, and by that means is able to say what the original contains. I am not now deciding anything as to the value of the evidence, but only that it is admissible secondary evidence of the contents of a foreign official book which cannot be produced here.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., C. A. Middleton, and A. Young, for the plaintiff, proposed to call the plaintiff as a witness.—We submit that, on the question of legitimacy, the plaintiff's evidence is admissible: Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), s. 3.

They referred to In re Rideout's Trusts, L. R. 10 Eq. 41, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 36; In re Yearwood's Trusts, 25 W. R. 461, 5 Ch. D. 545; Guardians of Nottingham v. Tomkinson, 28 W. R. 151, 4 C. P. D. 343; The Aylesford Peerage Case.

Gifard, Q.C., and Method, for the children Lancelot and Muriel, were not called on.

North, J.—I cannot accept this evidence. In re Rideout's Trusts seems to be an authority against Mr. Higgins rather than in his favour. The view taken by Vice-Chancellor Hall in In re Yearwood's Trusts seems to me founded on a misapprehension of In re Rideout's Trusts. I should have hesitated to say so on my own authority only, but the Common Pleas Division took the same view in Guardians of Nottingham v. Tomkinson. I have a reference also to a case before Kay, J.—In re Walker, W. N., 1885, at p. 196. That was a summons for the maintenance of a female infant, who claimed, as a child of Cecilia Ann Jackson, to be entitled to a half-share of a fund of £1,500. The husband of Mrs. Jackson, on behalf of a child of the marriage, disputed the title of the applicant, alleging that she was born at a time when Mrs. Jackson was living separate from him, and that the applicant was proved by the dates to be illegitimate. The husband tendered an affidavit, in which he denied having had sexual intercourse with his wife for a period before the birth of the child exceeding the period of gestation. In re Rideout's Trusts and In re Yearwood's Trusts were cited. Kay, J., declined to follow In re Yearwood's Trusts, and held that the evidence of the husband to prove non-access could not be received, and on the other evidence he refused the application. That case appears to me to be exactly in point, and I cannot, therefore, receive the evidence of the plaintiff.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., C. A. Middleton, and A. Young, for the plaintiff.—The presumption in favour of legitimacy may be rebutted by evidence: The Aylesford Peerage case; Bosvile v. Attorney-General, 36 W. R. 79, 12 P. D. 177. In the present case there is sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption of legitimacy.

Gifard, Q.C., and Method, for the children Lancelot and Muriel.—When there is any reasonable doubt, the court will presume legitimacy: Plowes v. Bossey, 10 W. R. 332, 2 Dr. & Sm. 145; Morris v. Davies, 5 Cl. & F. 163; Foster v. Cook, 3 Bro. C. C. 347. The plaintiff must prove that it is impossible that he should have been the father. He has not done so.

Sefton Strickland, for the child Ruby.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., for the trustees.

North, J.—The question which I have to decide is whether two of the three children born during the marriage of the plaintiff with his divorced wife are or are not his children, and I have come to the conclusion that there is ample evidence that neither of the two is a child of the plaintiff. [His lordship, after stating the facts, continued:—] I do not entertain the slightest doubt that Mrs. Burnaby went to Weymouth by appointment with Mr. Willoughby, or that adulterous intercourse took place between them during that visit. It is clear that, during the time in which the family doctor was attending Mrs. Burnaby in September and October, 1884, she was in the family way, and yet she never mentioned this fact to him. Her silence is very significant, and I cannot conceive why she should have concealed her condition from him, unless the reason was that she knew the child of which she was then pregnant was not the child of her husband. During the same period Mrs. Burnaby was constantly seeing her husband's sister, Mrs. Manners Sutton, of whom she was very fond, and with whom she was very intimate, and yet she never mentioned the fact of her pregnancy to her. Why it should not have been mentioned, if the child was the child of her husband, I cannot conceive. On the 15th of December Mrs. Burnaby left her home, without having communicated her condition to anyone, and there can be little doubt that she went away with Willoughby. Within a month afterwards she was living with him as his wife at an hotel at Hyères, in France.

A certificate of the registration of the birth of the child Lancelot at the mairie was put in, and its admissibility was objected to. I think that what took place is fully proved without the certificate, for Willoughby could not speak French, and he made the registration through the medium of Mr. Hook as interpreter, who has given evidence as to what took place. In my opinion the certificate is admissible, because M. Roux proved that he had compared it with the original entry in the register, and that it is an accurate copy, and it stands in the same position as a copy made by himself to refresh his memory. I think it is also admissible as an examined copy of a French official document. All these facts, in my opinion, tend to only one possible conclusion—viz., that the two children, Lancelot and Muriel, cannot be other than the children of Mr. and Mrs. Willoughby. I treat the evidence of the statements which were made by them, not as evidence of the truth of the statements which they made, but merely as proving that they did make those statements, thus showing what their conduct was at the time.

The only question, then, is, whether there was such possibility of access by the husband to the wife as to displace the result of this evidence by reason of the legal presumption in favour of legitimacy. This applies only to the child Lancelot.

The 21st of July, 1884, the day on which Mrs. Burnaby left her home, was the 279th day before the day on which the child was born. A good deal of medical evidence was adduced as to the ordinary length of the period of gestation. The witnesses do not all quite agree on this point, but they agree in substance, with the exception of Dr. Barnes. He is the only medical witness who differs from the others, and I cannot accept his view in opposition to theirs. I must accept their views in preference to his. And the conclusion to which I have come upon their evidence is, that the usual period of gestation is from 273 or 274 days up to 279 or 280 days, though there is a good deal of evidence which shows that the period is sometimes longer or shorter—that there is sometimes a difference of eight or nine days in either direction. But, having regard to the normal or usual period of gestation, the medical evidence does not enable me to come to a positive conclusion that the child Lancelot was the child of Willoughby rather than of the plaintiff. But I do find this, that up to the 21st of July Mrs.

Burnaby was living in the same house with her husband. That, however, is not conclusive, and I have to decide the question of fact which was thus stated by Lord Lyndhurst in Morris v. Davies: "Whether the circumstances are such as to satisfy me that no sexual intercourse did take place between these parties at the period to which reference is had." Mr. and Mrs. Burnaby had for a long time been leading a very unhappy life. The cause of this I do not know. They had for some years occupied separate bedrooms, and the wife had invariably locked the door of her room at night when her husband was at home. Her whole object in doing so was to exclude him. She spoke of him in terms expressive of extreme dislike. Upon this evidence I find, as matter of fact, that no sexual intercourse had taken place between them for some time prior to the 21st of July. Her acts, to my mind, are clear and palpable, and I am satisfied that an arrangement had been made between her and Willoughby for the purpose of his taking the rooms at Weymouth to which she went on that day.

I hold, therefore, that the question whether the circumstances are such as to satisfy the court that no sexual intercourse took place between Mr. and Mrs. Burnaby within a period prior to the 21st of July to which the birth of the child Lancelot could be referred, must be answered in the affirmative.

There is, however, another point to be considered. The husband and wife were living together again in the same house after the 24th of September, 1884, and there is no evidence of non-access at that time. But the evidence of Mrs. Hook is clear and reliable that the child Lancelot was at his birth at least an eight months' child, and indeed that he was fully matured. This makes it clear that he could not have been begotten in the previous September. Evidence was adduced to show a strong likeness between the child Lancelot and Willoughby. But there was also evidence to the contrary, and I set the one against the other, and leave this element out of consideration in forming my opinion. I am satisfied with regard to the child Lancelot, and there is ample evidence that he is not the child of the plaintiff.

I do not think it is necessary to refer at any length to the law on the subject. It is fully stated in the Banbury Peerage case; Le Marchant's Gardner case, App. 389; and in Morris v. Davies. I will only refer to the recent case of Bosvile v. Attorney-General, in which Sir J. Hannen directed the jury in accordance with Morris v. Davies, and this ruling was approved by the Divisional Court, who said: "There is the highest authority for saying that the presumption in favour of legitimacy may be rebutted by evidence." The facts of that case were very like those of the present case, and, though there was nothing there to prove the impossibility of access by the husband, the court held that the jury were not wrong in regarding the evidence against the legitimacy of the child as conclusive. In my opinion the evidence against legitimacy is much stronger in the present case. In that case, again, the Divisional Court said: "The lady herself seems to have regarded the child as the child of Mr. Craven, and not of her husband. The time fixed by her for the attendance of the monthly nurse was obviously based on a calculation which placed the commencement of the period of gestation subsequent to the day on which she left her husband's house, from which day she was living in adultery with Craven." I think that what took place in the present case with regard to the attendance of the doctors and the nurse before the birth of Lancelot is very strong evidence to show that the calculation of the time at which Mrs. Burnaby's confinement was e[illegible] to take place referred to something which [illegible] after she left her husband's house on the 21st [illegible] With regard to the conduct of Willoughby Burnaby, it is said that they may have been mistaken in thinking that the child was the child of Willoughby. But their conduct is the strongest possible evidence that something had taken place between them which made it not only possible but probable that the child was Willoughby's child.

With regard to the child Muriel, I think the case is clear. The evidence satisfies me that there was no possibility of access by the husband during the period to which her conception can be referred.

Adopting the rules of law laid down in the cases to which I have referred, the evidence that the children Lancelot and Muriel are not the children of the plaintiff is ample and conclusive, and I must declare that the child Ruby was the only child of the marriage between the plaintiff and his late wife.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., C. A. Middleton, and A. Young, for the plaintiff.—The only question that now remains is as to the validity of the appointment of the 11th of May, 1887. By the arrangement which was made, the child Ruby has obtained the benefit of the appointment made in her favour by her mother, and the appointment of half the £10,000. If necessary the court can rectify the appointment. On the exercise of a joint power of appointment, a power of revocation may be reserved to one of the appointors: Brudenell v. Elwes, 7 Ves. 382, and Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 364, 365.

Sefton Strickland, for the child Ruby, was not called upon.

Cozens-Hardy, Q. C., for the trustees.

NORTH, J.—The statement of claim asks in effect for a declaration that the trustees of the settlement ought now to hand over one moiety of the £10,000 to the plaintiff. In my opinion he is not entitled to call for it now. No one suggests that the appointment of the first moiety to the daughter Ruby is not perfectly good, though, of course, it is contingent upon its becoming absolutely vested in her, but, so far as it goes, it is perfectly good. Then, by the same deed, the second moiety is appointed to her, subject to the power of the plaintiff to revoke the appointment. And, by the deed of the 18th of May, Mrs. Willoughby purported to execute a release of all powers of appointment over the £10,000.

Now, as regards the arrangement effected by these deeds, I am not satisfied that it was good at all, and for this reason: the object of it is admitted to have been to enable Mr. Burnaby to receive £5,000 out of the funds absolutely at once. That, in my opinion, was not a legitimate object for the exercise of the power. The power was simply to appoint for the issue of the marriage in such manner as the parents should jointly appoint. An exercise of that power, to be valid, must be for the benefit of the issue, and for no other purpose. I am not satisfied, therefore, that the attempted exercise was not wholly void. But, even if it was clearly good as to the first moiety, still, as to the second moiety, the appointment is to the daughter Ruby, subject to a power of revocation by one of the two joint appointors alone. No authority has been produced to show that such a delegation of a joint power to one of the two donees is admissible. What the settlement contemplated was a revocation by the two, or possibly by the survivor if one of the two had become by death incapable of acting; but there is nothing to show any intention that the power of revocation given to the two should be exercised by one of them alone during the lifetime of the [illegible]. In my opinion, therefore, this attempt to give [illegible] a power to revoke the joint appoint- [illegible] and I do not, therefore, see how he [illegible] the £5,000 under such a revocation.

Then I am asked to rectify the deed of the 11th of May, 1887, but I do not see any possible ground for rectification. I have read the clause by which the parties agreed to leave the settlement of the deeds which were to carry out the terms agreed upon to Mr. Wolstenholme. The matter was discussed with him by the solicitors of the parties, and the deed of the 11th of May was finally settled by him as the person to whom, by the 12th clause of the agreement of the 21th of October, the power of settling the terms had been delegated by the parties who had agreed to be bound by what he did. That power was vested in him, and I do not see how I can say that what he did was not done rightly, or that I have any control by way of rectification over what he decided to be right between the parties. Nor do I see that there was in fact any mistake in what was done. It was done deliberately for the purpose of giving effect to what he advised them would be the best way of carrying out the agreement between them. I cannot, therefore, make any order for rectification.

Sefton Strickland, for the child Ruby, asked for a declaration that the two appointments were good.

North, J.—I feel a difficulty in making a declaration that the appointments are good, because the matter has not been gone into so fully as to enable me to decide whether there was a fraud on the power or not. I simply refuse to make a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to have a moiety of the trust fund handed over to him now.

Solicitors, Sanderson, Holland, & Adkin; The Official Solicitor; Roy & Cartwright; Cookson, Wainewright, & Pennington.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Nov. 30; Dec. 3, 4, 1888; May 27, 1889.

Hamilton v. Baker. "The Sara." (a.)

Maritime lien—Disbursements—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 10—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 191.

*The master of a ship has no maritime lien on it for disbursements.

The Glentanner, Swa. 415; The Feronia, 16 W. R. 585, L. R. 2 A. & E. 65; The Mary Ann, 14 W. R. 136, L. R. 1 A. & E. 8; and The Ringdove, 34 W. R. 744, 11 P. D. 120, overruled.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 826, 12 P. D. 158, reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported 35 W. R. 826, 12 P. D. 158.

The respondent, the captain of The Sara, had drawn a bill on the owners for certain necessary disbursements, and the bill had been dishonoured by the owners.

The respondent, being liable on the bill, brought this action in rem in the Admiralty Division for the amount. The action was defended by the mortgagees of the vessel (the appellants) who had intervened, the question being whether the respondent had a maritime lien for his disbursements.

Finlay, Q.C. (A. E. Nelson with him), for the appellants.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. G. Barnes, Q.C., for the respondent.

The Henrich Björn, 11 App. Cas. 270, 34 W. R. Dig. 179; In re Rio Grande do Sul, 25 W. R. 328, 5 Ch. D. 282; The Pacific, Br. & L. 243, 12 W. R. Adm. Dig. 31; The Two Ellens, 20 W. R. 592, L. R. 4 P. C. 161; Bristow v. Whitmore, 9 W. R. 621, 9 H. L. Cas. 391, were referred to in addition to the cases mentioned in the headnote.

A. E. Nelson replied.

The House took time for consideration.

May 27, 1889.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In this case the plaintiff, William Baker, brought an action in rem against the owners of the steamship Sara as defendants. The plaintiff claimed for disbursements which had been supplied upon his order as master of the steamship Sara at St. Vincent, in March, 1885.

The appellants intervened in the action, and their case was that they had taken a mortgage of the vessel on the 23rd of April, 1884; and, stripped of the other questions which have been disposed of by the evidence, the only real question is whether, under the circumstances I have stated, the plaintiff Baker had a maritime lien for his disbursements.

I believe the question might be even more compendiously stated by saying that the question is whether the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Mary Ann can be supported by your lordships' House.

Now two propositions are absolutely certain: one is that before 1854 no such lien could be claimed; and the other, that neither the Act of 1854 nor the Act of 1861 created such a lien in express terms.

The arguments addressed to your lordships singularly enough, are in some of their aspects very effectively answered by some of the passages in the very judgment relied on.

It is not true to say that the mere enacting by the Admiralty Court Act that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction, purports to confer a maritime lien. Dr. Lushington himself says that the same enactment provides that the proceedings in that court may be either in rem or in personam. Further, he says that there is a clear distinction between a maritime lien and a claim, the payment of which, the court has power to enforce from the ship and freight.

The whole of the learned judge's reasoning upon which his judgment ultimately turned was this: He says, "Supposing before this Act this court had jurisdiction to deal with any subject-matter in certain cases, and those only, and that in those cases the court was bound to recognize the existence of a maritime lien, and supposing that by this Act the Legislature extended the jurisdiction so as to enable the court to deal with the same subject-matter in other cases also, then I think that in such other cases, and with regard to the same subject-matter, the Legislature must be taken, notwithstanding the absence of any express words, to have intended to create a maritime lien."

This is the whole of the reasoning upon which the judgment depends, and it is necessary to examine how it justifies the judgment when applied to the subject-matter with which we are dealing.

Is it true that the court was bound to recognise a maritime lien for disbursements before the statute? Certainly not.

The example given of the master here is certainly a very strange one, since it is in a sense expressly given

* By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889, 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, the master of a ship is given the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements as he now has for the recovery of his wages.

(a) Reported by Charles H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

by the combined operation of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112 and the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

The learned judge himself points out that the 10th section of the Act which he was construing cured the difficulty of forum in such a case by expressly giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to deal with any lien the master might have, and we have already seen that by the two former statutes the lien for the wages was actually and in terms created.

But how does the providing the forum for the special lien already created lead to any inference that the giving jurisdiction does create a lien?

It is true that where the contract was under seal, or where the terms were special and unusual, the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction, because it was said that the sailor's ordinary contract with the master was presumed to be on the credit of the ship, whereas other contracts were said to be on the personal credit of the owners, but whatever may be said as to the practical abolition of the distinction as regards wages "earned on board the vessel" under a special contract or an ordinary contract, what relation has such a provision to the case of disbursements? Where the subject-matter, whether collision or seamen's wages, had in its own nature a maritime lien, I can well understand that the extension of the jurisdiction to a case where the nature of the subject-matter was the same—e.g., collisions within the body of the county—carried with it, as inherent in the nature of the thing itself, a maritime lien, and it may well be argued that the Legislature did not intend to alter the incidents of the subject-matter thus submitted to a new jurisdiction.

The learned judge's own reasoning seems to me to lead to a different conclusion from that at which he arrived. Nor does the power to enter into the whole account given by the section already referred to, appear to me to carry the matter any farther.

The learned judge himself uses the most powerful argument against his own decision. A maritime lien, he says, springs into existence the moment the circumstances give birth to it, as damages, salvage, wages; and yet it is said here that whether there is a lien or not, is to depend upon whether the owners set up by way of set-off counter-claims by them against the master.

I share with many judges the difficulty of following the reasoning, and I am unable, therefore, to adopt the conclusions; but I do feel very strongly what has been forcibly expressed by Sir James Hannen in The Ringdove and by the Master of the Rolls in the present case—namely, the difficulty of the practical adoption in actual business of the decision in The Mary Ann, and I have striven to see whether it was possible to give effect to that practice; but I cannot omit to consider that we are construing comparatively modern statute law and not business documents merely. Your Lordships' House is asked to sanction a canon of construction that may extend more widely than the particular case now dealt with, and I am therefore constrained to move your lordships that the judgment be reversed and this appeal be allowed.

Lord WATSON.—There is but one substantial question raised in this appeal. Has the master of a British ship a maritime lien, enforceable in the Court of Admiralty, for disbursements made by him on account of the ship in a foreign port?

By the common law of England the master's claims, whether for wages or disbursements, did not carry with them any hypothecary interest in the ship; and, inasmuch as they rested upon contract alone, were not cognizable in the admiralty courts. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, gave the master in express terms the same lien which other seamen had for recovery of their wages by law or custom; and also conferred upon the Admiralty Court a limited jurisdiction to entertain other claims at his instance, whilst the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, extended its jurisdiction to any claim for disbursements made by him on account of ship. Neither statute expressly attaches a lien to his claims for disbursements; but it is said that the effect of their provisions is to give him the right by implication.

Section 191 of the Act of 1854, which creates a lien for the master's wages, concludes thus: "If in any proceeding in any court of admiralty or vice-admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due."

I am willing to assume that the accounting which the provisions contemplate must be confined to items connected with the ship, and I do not doubt that a claim for disbursements is one which the master might competently prefer in answer to any set-off or counter-claim pleaded in defence to his suit for wages. But it does not appear to me to be a necessary or natural inference that the Legislature meant to attach a maritime lien to every demand which a master may competently make in the accounting, or to his claim for disbursements. When a variety of personal and unsecured claims are dealt with in a single clause, and it is expressly declared that one of them shall bear a lien, there arises a strong presumption that a similar privilege is not to attach to the rest; and that presumption cannot be overcome except by very plain implication. A proper right of lien constitutes a nexus upon the ship, which suâ naturâ must exist and accompany the claim from its inception; and it is very improbable that the Legislature should have intended to create a maritime lien which does not come into existence unless and until a plea of set-off is judicially stated in answer to a claim for wages. The strongest argument to the contrary is to be found in the suggestion that section 191 necessarily contemplates a decree in rem, which is said to imply the existence of a maritime lien. But the clause enacts that, in the event of the balance of accounts being against the master, the court is to direct payment, which cannot be effected by a decree in rem; and, so far as I am aware, there is no authority for the proposition that there must be a proper maritime lien for every claim which the Legislature has made enforceable against the ship.

The Act of 1861 which provides (section 10) that the Admiralty Court shall have jurisdiction "over any claim by the master of a ship for wages earned by him on board the ship and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." But it also provides (section 35) that "the jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam." In the face of that enactment it would be difficult to hold that the submission of a merely personal or contractual claim to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty converted it into a real right against the ship from the time when it came into existence.

In The Mary Ann, which was decided by Dr. Lushington in 1865, that learned judge held that the master's claim for disbursements on account of ship does bear a proper maritime lien. In arriving at that result, I do not think the learned judge relied solely upon the provisions of the Act of 1861, although there are observations in his judgment which might admit of that construction. His reasoning leads me to infer that if, before the passing of the Act, claims for disbursements had been wholly excluded from the jurisdiction of his court, and had been unaccompanied by a lien, Dr. Lushington would have held that the provisions of the Act were, per se, insufficient to create the right. He said (L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 11):—"There is a clear distinction between a maritime lien and a claim, the payment of which the court has power to enforce against the ship and freight. A maritime lien springs into existence the moment the circumstances give birth to it as damages, salvage, and wages. But it does not follow that because a claim may by Act of Parliament be enforceable against the res, that therefore it created a maritime lien."

The law had already been laid down to the same effect by the learned judge in the case of The Pacific, which related to the claim of a material man. He there pointed out that in cases where statute gives to the creditor of an unsecured personal debt an action against the ship, and does not clearly prescribe that his claim shall override that of a mortgagee, such creditor in no case "obtains the ship as a security until he institutes his suit in this court." His right in that case is subject to any registered mortgage, and he must "arrest the ship, and then acquires the res as a security." So far I agree with the reasoning of the learned judge.

The real grounds of Dr. Lushington's decision in The Mary Ann are to be found in the fact that, before the Act of 1861, his court had a limited jurisdiction over claims for disbursement, and in the assumption that in such cases the master had a maritime lien. Upon these premises the learned judge argues, with considerable force, that it must have been the intention of the Legislature that, under the enlarged jurisdiction conferred by section 10 of the later Act, the master's claim for disbursements should have the same privileges which were attached to it under the limited jurisdiction established by the Act of 1854. Referring to section 191 of the earlier statute, and the effect which he attributed to it as creating a lien, pro tanto, for disbursements, Dr. Lushington says (L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 12):—"If this be so, then, under this Act—i.e., the Act of 1861—the master claiming his disbursements is to be preferred to the mortgagee, because, before the Act, his claim for disbursements was entitled to a similar preference in the only case where the court could take cognizance of such disbursements—namely, in the case of a set-off."

In my opinion, the ratio of the judgment in The Mary Ann fails, because I am unable to hold that the enactments of section 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act can be interpreted as creating a maritime lien for disbursements; and the enactments of the statute of 1861, even when tested by Dr. Lushington's own principles, are in themselves insufficient to create such a right.

In The Feronia the authority of The Mary Ann was followed by Sir Robert Phillimore, who refers to and adopts the views of his predecessor. It was again followed in the case of The Ringdove by Sir James Hannen, who stated that the reasoning of Dr. Lushington was not satisfactory to his mind. In the present case Butt, J., considered himself bound by these precedents, but intimated that, apart from their authority, he would have had considerable difficulty in holding that there is any maritime lien for master's disbursements.

None of these judgments in the Admiralty Court were brought under review; but in In re Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Co. the Court of Appeal, in a liquidation, gave incidental effect to a lien for disbursements. An observation is attributed to James, L.J., in that case, which, if it had been made causâ cognitâ, would have been entitled to great weight; but the report shows that the lien was conceded, and that the point which your lordships have now to decide was neither raised nor discussed.

It was strongly urged by the respondent's counsel that your lordships are now precluded, by a series rerum judicatarum, from denying effect to the principle laid down in The Mary Ann and The Feronia. But I do not think that these authorities, which have been followed but not approved in the most recent cases, are of sufficient weight to establish a latent security of an exceptional character against purchasers and mortgagees.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The main question argued in this case, and the only question upon which it is necessary to pronounce an opinion, is reduced to a narrow point.

It is clear that at the time of the passing of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, disbursements made by the master of a ship in the ordinary course of his employment, did not create any lien in his favour. It is equally clear that neither the Act of 1861, nor any subsequent Act, has in terms conferred a maritime lien for the master's disbursements. Section 10 of the Act of 1861 declares that "The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over . . . any claim by the master of any ship for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." That section gave the court jurisdiction to entertain suits falling within its scope, and of itself it did nothing more. The jurisdiction, as the Act declared, might be exercised, either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. It thus became competent for the Court of Admiralty, on the master preferring his claim for disbursements, to arrest the ship on account of which the disbursements were made. But in the absence of a maritime lien, the arrest could not affect a subsisting mortgage or any other valid charge upon the ship.

So far the matter seems clear. And if the question depended solely upon the general law before the Act of 1861, and upon the language of that Act, there would be no ground for the contention put forward on behalf of the master in the present case. It cannot, however, be disputed that ever since the year 1865 it has uniformly been held that the claim of a master for his disbursements is to be preferred to the claim of a mortgagee. Dr. Lushington arrived at that conclusion without any hesitation in the case of The Mary Ann. His view was adopted and approved by Sir R. Phillimore. It was accepted by the Court of Appeal in the case of In re Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Co., and it had been followed in The Ringdove by Sir James Hannen, who observed that he did not feel at liberty to disregard the authority of The Mary Ann, though he could not say that Dr. Lusington's reasoning was altogether satisfactory to his mind.

The appellants challenge the decision in The Mary Ann and the course of practice which has followed it. The respondent contends that the decision was right. But whether it was right or not he says that it is too late now even for this House to interfere. I am sensible of the inconvenience of disturbing a course of practice which has continued unchallenged for such a length of time, and which has been sanctioned by such high authority. But if it is really founded upon an erroneous construction of an Act of Parliament, there is no principle which precludes your lordships from correcting the error. To hold that the matter is not open to review would be to give the effect of legislation to a decision contrary to the intention of the Legislature, merely because it has happened, for some reason or other, to remain unchallenged for a certain length of time. I propose, therefore, as briefly as I can, to examine the decision in The Mary Ann, and the circumstances under which it was pronounced.

Originally the master had no right to resort to the Court of Admiralty for his wages, or for anything due to him from the owners. The first alteration in this respect was made by the Merchant Seamen Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16), which gave the master, for the recovery of his wages, all the rights, liens, and remedies of an ordinary seaman, but only in the case of the bankruptcy of the owner. As however an ordinary seaman had no right to come to the Admiralty Court when his wages were due under a special contract, this provision did not much improve the master's position.

Then came the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which in section 191 re-enacted the provision in the Act of 1844 as regards the master's wages, omitting all reference to the bankruptcy of the owner, and then went on to enact that "if in any proceeding in any court of admiralty . . . touching the claim of a master to wages any right to set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into, and adjudicate upon, all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due."

The first case of importance under this section was The Caledonia, 4 W. R. 183, Swa. 17, decided in 1855. There the master preferred a claim for wages, and arrested the ship for a sum sufficient to cover his disbursements as well. The mortgagees intervened. They declared that they had no intention of setting up any right of set-off or counter-claim, but they tendered a sum less than the amount claimed in respect of wages, on the ground that payments had been made on account of wages both by themselves and by the owners. Dr. Lushington held that, under the Act of 1854, if the owners chose to avail themselves "of any advances or anything in the nature of a set-off," the whole account between the owner and the master was opened, and he thought that the mortgagees could be in no better position than the owners. There the general account between the master and the owners was not taken as against the mortgagees, apparently because they disclaimed any intention of setting up a right of set-off. But as the general account was not opened, they did not get the benefit of payments made by the owners on account of wages. They were only liable through the master's lien; but they had to pay more than the lien covered.

In the case of The Glentanner, which was decided in 1859, the mortgagees were less discreet or less fortunate. They declared that they would set up a right of set-off or counter-claim. The master was then directed to bring in his accounts. The mortgagees did not file a counter-claim or set-off, but they objected to all the items in the master's account except those relating to the payment of wages. Dr. Lushington, in giving judgment, stated that he adhered to every word he said in The Caledonia. He thought that the general account, if opened at all, must be gone through and a balance made. He was of opinion that the accounts spoken of in the Merchant Shipping Act meant "the accounts between the master and the ship, exclusive of any private account between the master and her owners for merely extraneous purposes," and that a mortgagee taking possession of the ship, and claiming the benefit of items in the account against the master's claim for wages, thereby made himself a party to the whole account. Why, he asked, should the master be prejudiced by the sale or mortgage of the ship? He was of opinion that, as the mortgagees had declared to set up a counter-claim, and had opened the account, an item of £400 claimed for disbursements belonged to "the account arising and outstanding and unsettled between them and the master," who were, he said, "the parties to the proceeding."

It is to be observed that the learned judge does not in terms say that the master had a maritime lien for his disbursements. His argument, if I understand his judgment aright, rather seems to be that a mortgagee intervening and setting up a right of set-off or counter-claim took upon himself the personal liability of the owner for debts due in connection with the ship.

Then followed, in order of date, the Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1861, which gives the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over any claim by the master for wages, whether due under a special contract or not, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship. Soon afterwards the question arose as to the effect of that Act on the master's claim for disbursements as between the master and a mortgagee. The point was raised directly in The Mary Ann, in which Dr. Lushington gave judgment on the 7th of November, 1865. In that case, dealing with the language of the Act, the learned judge expressed the view which has since been established in the Privy Council and in this House. He thought that the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction" meant "only what they purport to say—neither more nor less—that is, that the court shall take cognizance of the cases provided for." But he considered that, in determining whether in these cases of extended jurisdiction it was meant to create a maritime lien, or what was the intention of the Legislature, the court would look to the law as it stood before the late Act. And he came to the conclusion that, under the Act of 1861, the master claiming for disbursements was to be preferred to the mortgagee, "because before the Act his claim for his disbursements was entitled to a similar preference in the only case where the court could take cognizance of such disbursements—namely, in the case of a set-off."

I may observe that in that case also, the learned judge, while holding that the claim of the master was to be preferred to that of the mortgagee, does not say in terms that the effect of the Act was to give the master a maritime lien for his disbursements. However, in The Feronia, which was decided in 1868, Sir Robert Phillimore expressly stated that in the case of The Mary Ann it was decided that under the Act of 1861, "the master has a maritime lien both for his wages and disbursements, and that upon this ground his claim was preferable to that of a mortgagee." No doubt that was the practical result of the decision, and it has been so treated ever since.

Under these circumstances the question whether the decision in The Mary Ann, and the practice of the Admiralty Court, which rests upon it, can be supported, depends, I think, on the answer to be given to one or both of these further questions, (1) whether the decision in The Glentanner was right, and, if so (2), whether the existence of the rule there laid down justified Dr. Lushington's inference as to the intention and effect of the Act of 1861. It is not, I think, necessary to go into the latter question, because I am of opinion that the decision of The Glentanner was based on a construction of the Act of 1854 which is plainly erroneous.

Did the Act of 1854, as against a mortgagee or purchaser, give the master of a vessel a maritime lien for his disbursements in the event of his instituting a suit in the Admiralty Court for wages (which at that time he could only do in the absence of a special contract), and in the event of the mortgagee or purchaser thereupon setting up a right of set-off or counter-claim? The question, I think, answers itself. "A maritime lien," as was observed in The Two Ellens, "must be something which adheres to the ship from the time that the facts happen which gave the maritime lien, and then continues binding on the ship until it is discharged. It commences, and there it continues, binding on the ship until it comes to an end." A lien or preference, which is supposed to have its origin in a certain transaction, and yet has no binding force or effect unless and until two things happen, neither of which has any connection with the original transaction, is certainly not a maritime lien in the ordinary sense of the term. But then, did Parliament intend to create this anomalous preference or privilege—whatever it may be called—in the particular case of the concurrence of the two events contemplated by section 191 of the Act of 1854? It would be strange if it did. The Act gave the master a maritime lien for wages; that is, I suppose, for the amount of his wages for the time being due and owing. Now, a man is bound to pay his own debts, and he is also bound to discharge a preferential claim on property upon which he has a security, if he means to make his security available. But even an honest man, without any disparagement to his honesty, may object to pay another man's debt, and may wish to investigate the amount of a preferential claim on property belonging to him as purchaser or mortgagee. Is it conceivable that it could have been the intention of Parliament that if the master brought a suit for wages, for which the statute gave him a maritime lien, a mortgagee or purchaser intervening for the protection of his own property, should not be at liberty to investigate the extent of the lien—to see both sides of the special account with which he is concerned—except at the risk of having to pay a claim which, up to that time, was neither a debt of his nor a charge upon his property? I cannot imagine that even in hard cases—and these are all cases of hardship — Parliament meant to encourage excessive claims by masters, or to set a trap for unwary mortgagees. Is there anything in the language of the Act of 1854 to countenance such a notion? I do not think there is. The Act speaks of accounts "outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding." When a mortgagee intervened "the parties to the proceeding," as Dr. Lushington said in The Glentanner, were the master on the one hand, and the mortgagee on the other; the master's claim for disbursements could not enter into the account between the mortgagee and the master. The claim for wages might properly come in, because it was a preferential claim on property belonging to the mortgagee. If Parliament had intended by the Act of 1854 to give the master a maritime lien or a preferential claim for his disbursements, nothing would have been easier than to have said so. And it is to be observed that in the very section in question a lien is given in plain terms for the master's wages.

In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the Act of 1854 did not in any event give the master a maritime lien or preferential claim for his disbursements. It follows that in my judgment the decision in The Glentanner proceeded on an erroneous construction of the Act, and that the decision in The Mary Ann, and the practice of the Admiralty which rests upon it, cannot be supported.

Your lordships, on the one hand, were warned of the disastrous consequences of disturbing the practice of the Admiralty Court. On the other hand, it was urged that the disadvantages resulting from allowing such a lien more than counterbalance any possible advantage, and it was said that the facilities of communication which exist now-a-days between all parts of the world make it unnecessary to give the master a power which certainly may be abused. Between these conflicting views I do not venture to express any opinion. I have only to state what, in my judgment, the law really is. It is for the Legislature to alter the law if Parliament in its wisdom thinks an alteration desirable.

I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

Orders appealed from reversed; with costs here and below.

Solicitors for the appellants, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ingledew, Ince, & Colt.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 20.

In re SHEPHARD.

ATKINS v. SHEPHARD. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Death of judgment debtor—Abatement—Appointment of receiver of interest of deceased judgment debtor in real estate—Heir not served—Jurisdiction — "Equitable execution," nature of—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, rr. 1, 4; ord. 42, rr. 3 23, 28.

The appointment of a receiver of the interest of a judgment debtor in real estate, though sometimes inaccurately called "equitable execution," is not a mere form of execution, but it is relief, producing the same benefit as execution properly so called, but obtainable, and obtainable only, by means of an order of the court in that behalf, based on the fact that execution, properly so called, cannot be had.

After the death of a judgment debtor the court has no jurisdiction, on the ex parte application of the judgment creditor, to make an order appointing a receiver of the interest of the deceased judgment debtor in real estate, for the purpose of satisfying the judgment debt, when the person on whom the real estate has devolved is not a party to the proceedings.

So held, affirming (but on different grounds) the decision of Chitty, J.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

On October 25, 1888, the present appellant, R. W. Cory, who was the plaintiff in an action (Cory v. Mark Shephard & Son) in the Queen's Bench Division, obtained judgment for the payment of a sum of money by the defendants in that action, who were a solicitor firm consisting of Mark Shephard (since deceased) and his son, Herbert Shephard.

On August 3, 1889, the judgment debt being still unsatisfied, R. W. Cory took out a summons in that action for the appointment of a receiver over certain freehold property in which Mark Shephard had an equity of redemption. The hearing of this summons was adjourned by Pollock, B., to August 15, 1889, and again further adjourned to August 22, 1889.

On August 17, 1889, Mark Shephard died intestate, leaving another son, Stuart Shephard, his heir-at-law.

On August 20, 1889, the present action for administration of the estate of Mark Shephard was instituted in the Chancery Division by G. J. Atkins, a creditor of Mark Shephard's. The son, Stuart Shephard, was made a defendant in this action.

On August 21, 1889, on the application of the plaintiff Atkins, an order was made in the Chancery action by the vacation judge, acting for Chitty, J., whereby H. J. Pratt was at once appointed receiver of the real and personal estate of Mark Shephard (deceased), until a legal personal representative of Mark Shephard should be constituted or until further order, the receiver to give security on or before September 4, 1889, and the plaintiff in the action meanwhile undertaking to be answerable for all sums received by the receiver.

On August 22, 1889, the adjourned summons in the Queen's Bench action came on again before Pollock, B., and he made an order—which purported to have been made on hearing the defendants in that action in person—whereby the said H. J. Pratt was appointed receiver, upon first giving security, of the interest of Mark Shephard in the freehold property therein mentioned, and the receiver was thereby directed, out of the rents and profits or the proceeds of sale of the said freehold property, to pay the judgment debt due to Cory.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On September 17, 1889, letters of administration of the estate of Mark Shephard were granted to his son, the said Stuart Shephard; and on the same day an order was made in the Chancery action directing that the receiver appointed in the Chancery action by the order of August 21, 1889, be continued until further order, and directing notice of this order to be given to R. W. Cory, the plaintiff in the Queen's Bench action, with liberty to him to apply in the Chancery action.

On September 25, 1889, the usual administration decree was made in the Chancery action.

On October 25, 1889, R. W. Cory applied by way of motion (under the liberty to apply) in the Chancery action that the receiver appointed in the Queen's Bench action, by the order of August 22, 1889, might be directed forthwith to receive the rents and moneys receivable in respect of the interest of Mark Shephard in the freehold property therein mentioned, and to appropriate the same in payment of the judgment debt due to Cory, or that such further or other order might be made as might seem fit, for the purpose of enforcing the security of the applicant Cory.

Chitty, J., refused this application, on the grounds (1) that the order of August 22 in the Queen's Bench action only appointed a receiver of the freehold estate therein mentioned upon the receiver first giving security, and as no security had as yet been given that there was, in fact, no receiver competent to act under that order; and (2) that the receiver appointed by the order of August 22 in the Queen's Bench action could not have entered into possession of any part of the deceased debtor's estate without committing a contempt of court on account of the receivership order made previously—namely, on August 21—in the Chancery action.

The learned judge also expressed an opinion that Pollock, B., had no jurisdiction to make the order of August 22, appointing a receiver over what was then in fact the property, not of the judgment debtor, he being then dead, but of another person who was not then in any way before the court, and without any proceedings having been taken to continue the Queen's Bench action against such person.

The applicant, R. W. Cory, appealed.

Romer, Q.C., and Haldane, for the appellant.—First, Chitty, J., was wrong in holding that when an order is made appointing a receiver upon his first giving security, the receiver is not competent to act until the security is given. Ex parte Evans, In re Watkins, 28 W. R. 127, 13 Ch. D. 253, a decision of the Court of Appeal, is directly in conflict with that view. [Dibdin.—We do not contest that now; that case was overlooked in the court below.] Secondly, the action in the Queen's Bench Division did not abate by the death of the defendant, Mark Shephard: ord. 17, r. 1. Then, by ord. 42, r. 23, a judgment creditor is entitled, notwithstanding the death of the judgment debtor, to apply for and obtain ex parte leave to issue execution against the chattels of the deceased judgment debtor; one mode of enforcing payment of a judgment debt is by obtaining equitable execution by means of the appointment of a receiver: Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 27 W. R. 3, 9 Ch. D. 275; and an order appointing a receiver by way of equitable execution may be obtained ex parte if the judge consider it "just or convenient" that such order should be made: Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. v. Parkinson, 37 W. R. 264, 22 Q. B. D. 173. Pollock, B., had, therefore, jurisdiction to make the order of August 22, 1889, notwithstanding the death of Mark Shephard. Order 17, r. 1, is not to be limited to matters happening before judgment, but it is general in its application. In re Parker, Cash v. Parker, 12 Ch. D. 293, shows that after the death of a sole defendant after judgment, a receiver may be appointed over the property of the deceased defendant, though no personal representative of the defendant had been then constituted. [FEY, L.J.—But in that case the plaintiff was a person entitled to take out the administration, and was, therefore, before the court.]

Roundell v. Currer, 6 Ves. 250; Eldridge v. Burgess, 26 W. R. 435, 7 Ch. D. 411; and Jackson v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 25 W. R. 518, 5 Ch. D. 844, were also referred to.

Byrne, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the respondent (the plaintiff in the Chancery action), were not called on.

P. A. Kingdon, for the administrator of Mark Shephard.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J. The facts are shortly these. There had been a judgment obtained in an action in the Queen's Bench Division against Mark Shephard and his son Herbert Shephard. Then Mark Shephard dies, and after his death an administration action was instituted in the Chancery Division and an order appointing an interim receiver was made. On the day after this order was made, the judgment creditor in the Queen's Bench action applied to, and obtained from, Pollock, B., an order appointing the same person receiver, upon his first giving security, over Mark Shephard's interest in certain real estate, although Mark Shephard was in fact then dead.

Chitty, J., decided that the judgment creditor could obtain no priority by this appointment of a receiver, on the ground that it was only effectual on the receiver giving security, which he had never done. That view has now been admitted to be erroneous, and was not contested on this appeal. But the learned judge also expressed an opinion that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order appointing a receiver against an estate, which, at the time the order was made, was no longer the estate of Mark Shephard, for he was then dead—but had become the estate of his heir-at-law, who was not a party to the Queen's Bench action. In my opinion there was no jurisdiction to make that order.

It was said that the order was an equitable execution, and that, as legal execution might be had after the death of a judgment debtor, there was no reason why equitable execution should not be granted after death of the judgment debtor as well as legal execution.

I by no means assent to the proposition that legal execution could have been obtained after a judgment debtor's death at once, without any other step being taken. I think there are strong reasons for saying that it could not. But, assuming that it could, can an order for the appointment of a receiver be likewise made after the judgment debtor's death? In my opinion the whole argument in favour of that view arises from a confusion in the use of the term "equitable execution." The term itself is an erroneous expression. It is merely a term which has often been used as a short mode of expressing the fact that, by a receivership order, the same benefit might be obtained in equity as in common law was obtained by legal execution, but it is quite a different thing from execution at common law. A receiver was appointed by way of equitable relief only when difficulties existed in the way of obtaining legal execution. Under the old practice of the Court of Chancery a plaintiff came into equity in order to obtain the same benefit which he might have got by means of his legal right if there had been no impediments in his way. It is, however, wrong to say that the Judicature Acts gave any right to obtain this equitable relief against the estate of a legal debtor when there was no difficulty in obtaining execution at law, and if any practice contrary to this has grown up of late, such practice is, in my opinion entirely wrong.

But, passing from that, does the appointment of a receiver stand in the same position as legal execution? By the appointment of a receiver the judgment creditor obtains relief, arising not from the mere fact of having obtained judgment at law, but relief to which, under the circumstances, he is entitled in equity against the estate of the judgment debtor; the appointment of a receiver, therefore, cannot be obtained without an order of the court, a new order giving the applicant equitable relief. Such an order can only be obtained against a person over whom the court has jurisdiction.

In the present case the order was obtained against property which, by reason of the death of the judgment debtor and by operation of law, had then become the property of his heir, and the order was obtained without notice to the heir. It is against the heir this order is made, and the court had no jurisdiction over him, he not being a party to the action.

It is said that the rules and orders admit of this being done. It is said that by ord. 17, r. 1, the action is kept alive, because it was brought against father and son. The action no doubt is alive against the son, but not against the deceased father. That rule applied when, by reason of the death of a party, there was a devolution of his interest upon a person who was a party to the action, but it did not apply when the devolution was upon a person who was not a party to the action. The action was not alive against him. The right to make an order against the father was gone by reason of his death, and no order could be made against the property which had been his, until the person on whom it had devolved had been made a party to the action.

Reference has been made to the order made by Fry, J., in Cash v. Parker, 12 Ch. D. 293. There the plaintiff was a person entitled to take out administration if no one else did, and there, by analogy to the practice in the Probate Division of appointing a receiver pendente lite, the plaintiff, on his undertaking to take out administration, was appointed receiver in order to protect the property until a legal personal representative was constituted. In that case, therefore, a person who was entitled to invest himself with a legal right to the property was before the court, and the object of the order was to protect the property until he had done so.

The argument is based on a misconception of ord. 17, r. 1.

That rule does not enable the court to make an order adverse to a person not a party to the action without hearing what such person may have to say, or without taking the legal means to bring such person before the court.

In my opinion this receivership order was made per incuriam, the court having no jurdisdiction against the heir.

The decision of Chitty, J., is therefore right, though he decided the case on different grounds.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A judgment had been obtained against Mark Shephard and his son Herbert in the Queen's Bench Division; Mark Shephard died and departed this world and the suit at the same time; afterwards the plaintiff in the Queen's Bench action obtained an order ex parte (drawn up erroneously stating that the defendants appeared in person) for a receiver of the rents and profits of the property of the dead man. That property had been his, but by his death and by law it had passed to somebody else, and it is suggested that an order may be made ex parte against property which no longer belongs to the dead debtor, but which belongs to somebody else who has not been served with notice of the application. That, I think, cannot be right, for it seems contrary to natural justice.

But that is not all. It is said that this can be done because the appointment of a receiver is only equitable execution, and that at common law execution might issue as of right without anyone being served. I doubt if it is the practice at common law that you may as of right execute a judgment, obtained against a debtor who has since died, against his executor. If such is the practice I am not aware of it. There are certain statutory provisions which allow execution after death, but I think notice is required for these proceedings. Certainly this is not a case in which at common law execution could issue as of course.

Now equitable execution is not merely execution, but it is relief granted because execution at law could not be obtained; it is a substitute for legal execution where that cannot be had. It is wrong to say that an order for a receiver may be obtained in the Chancery Division ex parte without notice being served on the person entitled to the property to be affected.

But it is said that it can be done under ord. 17, r. 1. To my mind that is not so; rule 1 must be read with rule 4. [The Lord Justice read the rules, and continued:—] The fact that there was a co-defendant who survived, kept alive the action against him, but not as against the dead man, so as to enable proceedings to be taken against the persons entitled to the property of the dead man without notice to them. Ord. 42, r. 23, does not govern this case, as it deals with execution, not with the appointment of a receiver, and if it did, still the order could not be made ex parte.

FRY, L.J.—The appellant appears to me to assert that the appointment of a receiver is a kind of execution which may be had against a dead man's estate without notice to his executors, and giving priority to the person obtaining it over other creditors.

The idea that the appointment of a receiver is a kind of execution is entirely erroneous. It is quite true that the old Court of Chancery exercised this jurisdiction where a legal judgment had been obtained, but only when the applicant had shown that he had obtained judgment and had sued out the appropriate writs of fi. fa. or elegit, and was then met by certain difficulties arising from the nature of the property of the debtor, then and then only did the Court of Chancery grant a receiver in aid of the enforcement of legal judgments for legal debts. Relief by way of appointment of a receiver proceeded on the view that no execution could be had on the writ.

Further, the appointment of a receiver was an act requiring the exercise of judicial power on the part of the court. The circumstances I have referred to, would have to be proved before the court would make the order. The relief therefore granted by the Court of Chancery was not an execution of the judgment, but was relief granted because legal execution could not be obtained. All this has been summarized by judges at different times, under the expression "equitable execution," but I am apprehensive that the condensed expression has led to misapprehension, and to the idea that the obtaining the appointment of a receiver is a mere form of execution which can be obtained without the attention of the court being called to the circumstances which creates the equity on which alone the jurisdiction arises.

It has been said that in all cases at common law execution could be had against the estate of deceased persons without notice to the executors. On that point I will confine myself to expressing great doubt whether it is so.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Deacon, Gibson, & Medcalf.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, R. J. Witty.

Solicitors for the defendant, Mark Shephard & Son

From Lancaster Palatine Ct. of Chan. } Aug. 2, 3, 5, 1889.

HEAP v. HARTLEY. (a.)

Patent—Exclusive licence for limited period and district—Whether exclusive licence amounts to assignment of patent—Right of licensee to sue in his own name—Notice—Patents, &c., Act, 1883, ss. 23, 36, 87.

An exclusive licence to use a patented invention in a particular district for a limited term does not amount to an assignment of the patent rights for that district, and does not confer any rights which enable the licensee in his own name to maintain an action without joining the patentee as a co-plaintiff against a person who has infringed the licensee's rights under his licence by using the invention within the said district and term.

M., a patentee, gave H. by deed an exclusive licence to use M.'s patent within a specified district for four years, and covenanted that he would not during the term sell the invention or grant other licences to use it within the district, and that, in case M. failed to take steps effectually to protect the patent against any infringement which should take place, H. should be at liberty to take such steps in M.'s name. The deed was duly registered under the Patents Act, 1883, and shortly afterwards M. sold one of his patented machines to S., carrying on business outside the district, and S., two or three weeks later, sold the machine to J., who used it within the district.

Held, that H., having a mere licence to use the patent, and no property in it, could not maintain an action against J. without joining M. as a co-plaintiff; and, further, that H., having failed on the evidence to satisfy the court that J., at the time he bought the machine, had actual notice of H.'s rights, the action failed on that ground also, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., affirmed.

Whether registration under the Patents Act, 1883, is notice to all the world, quære.

Appeal from Bristowe, Vice-Chancellor of the Lancaster Palatine Court of Chancery.

Charles Edward Moser, to whom letters patent (No. 11,640) had been granted in September, 1885, for "improvements in gig-mills employed in the finishing of woven fabrics," granted by deed in 1886 to Mr. Heap, the plaintiff, the full and exclusive licence to use and exercise the said patented invention at all places within the borough of Rochdale and the local board districts of Norden, Wardle, Littleborough, and Milnrow for a term of two years, which was extended to four years by a subsequent deed. Moser also covenanted with Heap that, subject to a right for Moser to sell the invention, and grant licences to certain specified firms to use the same for themselves, but not to resell or transfer it, Moser would not, during the term, sell the invention, or grant licences to any company or person to use it within the aforesaid limits, and that if there should be any infringement of the patent, Moser would, as soon as he had notice thereof, take steps at his own expense effectually to protect the invention, and if he failed to do so that the plaintiff should be at liberty to do so in Moser's name. This deed, and also that extending the term, were duly registered under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883.

Early in 1888 Moser sold two of his patented machines to firms in Manchester, who resold them two or three weeks later to the defendants, Israel Hartley and his son Edward Hartley, who put them up for use within the district subject to Heap's exclusive licence. The defendants having been informed of the rights claimed by the plaintiff, and threatened with proceedings, did not discontinue the use of the machines, and the plaintiff, accordingly, in May, 1888, commenced this action in the Lancaster Palatine Court as assignee or exclusive licensee of Moser's patent for that district, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing his rights. He also claimed damages, an account, and other relief. The plaintiff alleged, and the defendants denied, that the defendants had notice of the plaintiff's rights under the licence before they purchased the machines. The evidence on this point was not conclusive, but it was shown that Stephen Hartley (a brother of Israel Hartley), who had written to Moser asking for one of the machines, had received a letter in reply, before the date of the purchase, informing him that the plaintiff had the exclusive use of the patent in that district. There was also an affidavit by a workman named Lord as to what took place at a subsequent interview between Stephen and Israel Hartley and himself before the purchase. The hearing of a motion for an interim injunction was by consent treated as the trial of the action before the Vice-Chancellor.

Bristowe, V.C., decided that registration under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, of an exclusive licence was not notice to the world, that actual notice to the defendants of the licence before the date of their purchase had not been proved, and that the defendants, as purchasers without notice, were not affected by the priority of the plaintiff's licence. He therefore dismissed the action with costs, without deciding the question whether an exclusive licensee could, in his own name, maintain an action for an injunction against an infringer without joining the patentee as a co-plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., and Staffurth, for the appellant.—(1) The plaintiff, as exclusive licensee, is entitled to bring this action. (2) The defendants were perfectly aware of the plaintiff's rights when they bought the machines. The rights of a patentee are by law assignable, and the effect of giving a person an exclusive licence is to pass those rights. Why, then, should the patentee be a necessary party to an action to restrain infringement of them? This was in effect an assignment of the exclusive right to make and sell the patented machines. Suppose the patentee disappeared, would the licensee be deprived of his rights? [LOPES, L.J., referred to Renard v. Levinstein, 13 W. R. 382, 2 H. & M. 628.] Under section 36 the patentee can effectually assign all his rights. [FRY, L.J.—Is this licence an assignment of the patentee's right to sue?] Yes. As far as the licence extends, the assignee has all the rights of the patentee. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Newby v. Harrison, 9 W. R. 849, 1 J. & H. 393.] In that case the Lord Chancellor would have granted an injunction if there had been an exclusive licensee. [COTTON, L.J.—Would a judgment in this action as constituted bind the patentee?] No, it would only be binding inter parties. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Edison & Swan, &c., Co. v. Holland, 37 W. R. 699, 41 Ch. D. 28.] In Hassall v. Wright, 18 W. R. 821, L. R. 10 Eq. 509, a licence was treated as equivalent to an assignment. Actual notice is not necessary. [COTTON, L.J.—Notice raises the equity against the wrongdoer. He is not a wrongdoer unless he has had notice.] The defendants' user of these machines within the district is an infringement of the patent, and if they are doing it by the permission of the patentee he has no right to give that permission, because he has given the plaintiff an exclusive right. The patentee cannot derogate from his own licence. [FRY, L.J.—Then it is possible for a patentee to infringe his own patent?] Yes, if he has assigned it, or given an exclusive licence to use it. As to notice by registration, the object of the registration is that the public may be perfectly safe if they examine the register, which is notice to all the world as to where the rights of the patentee are. Moreover, the defendants had actual notice of our rights before they purchased.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to Muskett v. Hill, 5 Bing. N. C. 694; Webber v. Lee, 30 W. R. 866, 9 Q. B. D. 315; Deroene v. Fabrie, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 155; Dunnicliff v. Mallet, 8 W. R. 260, 7 C. B. N. S. 209; and to the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, ss. 23, 36, and 87.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Maberly, for the respondents.—[COTTON, L.J.—We need only trouble you upon the question whether there was actual notice here, Mr. Hardy.] It was not suggested even at the bar that the two Manchester firms, who bought these machines from Moser, had notice of the plaintiff's licence. They had, therefore, full power to deal with them, and exercised it by selling to us. It would be contrary to all analogies if you could prevent purchasers for value without notice from selling to persons in the district who had notice. Mere notice as distinct from fraud is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief, and there is no allegation of fraud in the pleadings. Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, is a leading case on the equitable doctrine of notice. The defendants themselves, moreover, had no notice. On such evidence as that given in this case it is impossible to affect the defendants with notice. The suggestion that the purchase was really made by the defendants from Moser, the Manchester firms being only used as the medium as being outside the district, is quite without foundation.

Stafforth, in reply, referred to De Mattos v. Gibson, 7 W. R. 514, 4 De G. & J. 276 3; Messageries Imperiales v. Baines, 11 W. R. 322; Catt v. Tourle, 17 W. R. 662, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 654; Werdermann v. Société Generale D'Electricité, 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 240; Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. Cas. 191.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case the point as to notice was dealt with last by Mr. Moulton, but I will deal with it first, in order that it may be disposed of before the question whether a licensee can sue for infringement of a patent is considered. The Vice-Chancellor has found that the plaintiff has not made out that the defendants bought these machines with notice of the agreement made between the plaintiff and the patentee. Now it was for the plaintiff to make that out as the essential basis of his right to relief, and to do so in such a way as to enable the court to act upon it, or else to show that an exclusive licensee can as licensee sue for infringement without proving that the defendant had such notice. In my opinion the plaintiff has not made out that the defendant had notice, though I agree that the case is one of some little suspicion. That, however, is not sufficient. The case was not, in the first instance, brought forward as one of notice, though the plaintiff does mention and support by affidavits, the agreement between himself and the patentee. Then, in answer to those affidavits, the defendant says, "I had no notice of that"; though he subsequently admits in cross-examination that Stephen Hartley had said something to him about it. Then the strongest point against the defendants is this: There is an affidavit by the Lords (husband and wife), and that is answered by an affidavit of one of the defendants. But there was no cross-examination on the question of notice so far as referred to in those affidavits (which is rather a striking circumstance), and, therefore, it would, in my opinion, be wrong to hold upon that that the defendant had notice of the agreement. We come, then, to the question whether the exclusive licensee for a particular district could maintain an action alone, without proving notice of the agreement, against a person whom he alleged to be infringing his rights under that agreement. In my opinion he could not. It has been contended that this, being an exclusive licence, must be treated exactly the same as a grant or assignment of the patent for the specified period and district. But it is quite a different thing, and one of the cases referred to goes to show the distinction. In the ice case, Newby v. Harrison, Wood, V.C., pointed out what the distinction is, that where there is only a licence which does not entitle the licensee to any property, it remains simply a licence—that is to say, an authority from the licensor to the licensee, enabling him to do lawfully something he could not otherwise lawfully do; but that where the licence entitles the licensee to take something away or acquire some property in it, then it amounts to a grant. Wood, V.C., said, 1 J. & H., at p. 398: "With regard to the word 'licence,' there is some little ambiguity. It is, however, well defined in the case of Muskett v. Hill, and I prefer stating it in the language there cited by Tindal, C.J., to giving my own. It is thus stated: 'A dispensation or licence properly passes no interest, but only makes an action lawful which without it had been unlawful; as a licence to go beyond the seas, to hunt in a man's park, to come into his house, are only actions which, without licence, had been unlawful; but a licence to hunt in a man's park and carry away the deer killed to his own use, to cut down a tree in a man's ground and to carry it away the next day after to his own use, are licences as to the acts of hunting and cutting down, but as to carrying away the deer killed and the tree cut down, they are grants.' So here a licence to enter upon a canal and take the ice is a mere licence, and the right of carrying it away is a grant of the ice so to be carried away." In that particular case there was a licence to enter upon a canal and take the ice. In my opinion here a licence granted to a licensee, though exclusive for a particular time and in a particular district, could not be treated as a grant, but simply as a licence to do that which otherwise could not be done without violating the rights of the patentee. To my mind it is clear that this licence could not have been a grant of any right to sue, because the licence itself contains a conditional contract that, if there was any infringement within the district, the licensee should be allowed to use the patentee's name for the purpose of suing the infringer. It is not contended that there has been any violation of the agreement between the patentee and the licensee. If there had been, the licensee could have sued the patentee. What the licensee contends is that, being an exclusive licensee, his licence is in effect a grant, and that he can, therefore, without the concurrence of the patentee, and without any violation of the licensee's agreement with the patentee having taken place, sue the person who is infringing his rights. That is turning what is merely a licence into a grant of the letters patent. It is not necessary to go into the question argued by Mr. Moulton whether section 87 of the Patents Act renders this act of the defendants an infringement or not. If the plaintiff cannot sue except in the name of the patentee, it is immaterial to consider whether, as against the patentee, this is a right which he could not grant; and therefore an infringement. In my opinion the judgment was right, and the appeal fails.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff here is suing under an exclusive licence to use a certain invention for a specified period of time within a specified district. He puts his case in a twofold manner. First, he says, "I am in the position of an assign of the patent for that period in that district, and I have, therefore, a right to restrain any person who infringes the patent within the district." That argument seems to me to be based on an entire error as to the nature of a licence. The true nature of a licence is this: it is a leave to do a thing, and a contract not to allow anyone else to do it. But it confers in itself no interest or property, though it may be, and often is, coupled with a grant of an interest in property. It only enables a person to do lawfully what he could not otherwise do, except unlawfully. I think, therefore, that an exclusive licensee has no right to sue. Then, secondly, the plaintiff says the exclusive licence implies a contract not to grant to anyone else within the district, and that the defendants took the machines with notice of the contract, and therefore ought not to be allowed to violate it. But had they notice? In my opinion that was not proved. I agree that there are many circumstances of suspicion which might reasonably call for investigation. But, in fact, the plaintiff did not launch his case as regards the question of notice, and such ragged evidence as there is upon that question entirely fails to satisfy me. [His lordship then adverted to the evidence on the question of notice, and concluded:—] I therefore agree with Cotton, L.J., that this appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not desire to add anything.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Church, for Jacksons & Godby, Rochdale.

Solicitors for the respondents, Radford & Frankland for Bowden & Walker, Manchester.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 19.

SMITH v. WOOD. (a.)

Penalty—Sale of coals in London—Deficiency in weight—Liability of seller—Method of weighing prescribed by statute—Sacks to be weighed with and without coals in them—Metropolis Coal Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi.), ss. 54, 57.

In an action by a purchaser of coals to recover penalties from the seller for deficiency in weight under the Metropolis Coal Act, it is necessary to show that the sacks of coal were weighed in the particular manner prescribed by the Act.

Meredith v. Holman, 16 M. & W. 798, approved.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 37 W. R. 800, 23 Q. B. D. 380, affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Denman and Charles, JJ.), reported 37 W. R. 800, 23 Q. B. D. 380.

The action was brought to recover penalties under the Metropolis Coal Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi.), s. 57, from a vendor of coals for delivering sacks of coal deficient in weight.

By section 54 of the Act if the purchaser require the sacks to be weighed they are to be weighed with the coals therein, and also afterwards without any coals therein.

By section 57 a person requiring the coals to be weighed shall procure the attendance of a policeman or other credible person, "and the said sacks, both with and without the coals therein," shall accordingly be weighed in his presence, and in case the coal in any sack shall be deficient in weight the seller shall forfeit for every such sack a sum not exceeding £5.

The plaintiff, having ordered coal from the defendant, who was a coal merchant, ten sacks of coal each purporting to contain two cwt. were sent to his residence. He desired to have them weighed, and, having procured the attendance of a policeman, the sacks were weighed by the carman in charge of the coal. Instead, however, of weighing the sack first with the coal in it and then empty in the manner required by the Act, the carman weighed each sack by placing it in one scale and placing in the other an empty sack together with the weights. Seven of the sacks being in this way discovered to be deficient in weight the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to penalties. At the trial, before Wills, J., and a common jury, the penalties were fixed at £10 10s., and judgment was given for the plaintiff for that amount. The Divisional Court set this aside, considering that they were bound by Meredith v. Holman, 16 M. & W. 798, which decided that the method of weighing prescribed by the statute must have been followed in order to entitle a person to sue for penalties under it.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. B. Walker and Bassel Hopkins, for the appellant.—Meredith v. Holman was wrong, and must be overruled.

Cock, Q.C., and Chester Jones, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord EBHER, M.R.—I am not in the least prepared to overrule the case of Meredith v. Holman. On the contrary, I think it is obviously a right decision. The reason why the method of weighing adopted both in the present and in that case is objectionable is because it probably results in a wrong weight being arrived at. Unless the coal is weighed in the accurate and careful manner prescribed by the Act, people might be made liable to penalties who had not really incurred them. No doubt the Legislature were aware when they passed the Act that the weighing would have to be done by persons who were not very familiar with such a duty, and that was the reason that the method of weighing is so specifically provided. The statute is a penal statute, and it is an established rule that such statutes shall be construed strictly in favour of the people on whom penalties are imposed. In my opinion it is a condition precedent to the recovery of the penalty that the coal should be properly weighed—weighed, that is, in the mode prescribed by the Act in sections 54 and 57. I therefore think that the case of Meredith v. Holman, which was decided as long ago as 1847, is right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On a true construction of the Act the plaintiff cannot possibly succeed. I regret it, for there is no doubt that the coals were deficient in weight. But the statute is a penal one, and must be construed strictly. It prescribes a particular method of weighing which has not been adopted, but a rougher and more inaccurate method has been followed. That, as was held in Meredith v. Holman, with which I entirely agree, will not do. The penalty, therefore, is not payable.

LOPES, L.J.—It is an inflexible rule that a penal statute is to be construed strictly, and, therefore, if the mode of weighing prescribed by the Act is not followed no penalty is incurred. It is clear that it was a condition precedent to the recovery of the penalty that the sacks should be weighed first full and then empty. They were not so weighed, and, therefore, not only according to Meredith v. Holman, with which I agree, but also in accordance with the universal rule of construction of penal statutes, the plaintiff cannot recover the penalty.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, S. Roberts.

Solicitors for the respondent, Lewis & Sons.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From Q. B. Div. Aug. 9, 1889.

CORNISH v. ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance (accident) — Exception — "Exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury."

A policy of insurance against death or injury caused by accident contained an exception in the case of "the exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury." The insured was killed by a train while he was attempting to cross the main line of a railway in daylight. There was no regular crossing at the spot: there was nothing to prevent a person about to cross from seeing an approaching train. The insured was neither short-sighted nor deaf.

Held, that the risk would have been obvious to him if he had been paying reasonable attention to what he was doing, and that therefore the exception applied.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the trial.

The action was brought by the legal personal representative of the insured upon a policy of insurance against death or injury from accidental and external violence. The insured was killed by a train while crossing a railway under circumstances mentioned in the judgment. The policy contained an exception from the risks insured against in the case of "death or disability arising from fighting, duelling, the hands of justice, intentional self-injury, whether under the influence of insanity or not, injuries sustained on a railway whilst travelling otherwise than in a passenger carriage, or whilst getting into or alighting from any carriage in motion, or whilst acting in violation of the bye-laws of a railway company, or occasioned by poison, or happening by exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury," &c.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., directed the jury that the insured had lost his life by exposure to obvious risk of injury within the meaning of the exception, and the jury found a verdict that they were compelled by the ruling of the Lord Chief Justice to find that the deceased lost his life by incurring obvious risk, but that they were of opinion that it was an ordinary misadventure. Lord Coleridge, C.J., gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the appellant.—"Obvious risk" means obvious in fact to the man himself, and does not include a risk which, if he had taken reasonable care, he might have seen. It does not apply to mere negligence. There must be an intentional exposure to the risk.

They referred to Schneider v. Provident Life Insurance Co., 1 Amer. Rep. 157; Burkhard v. Travellers' Insurance Co., 48 Amer. Rep. 205.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Fooks, for the respondents.—"Obvious" means obvious to a man using ordinary care. Here the risk would have been obvious to a prudent man.

They referred to Lovell v. Accident Insurance Co. (not reported).

Jelf, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) was delivered by

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought by the legal personal representative of the late Richard Cornish to recover the sum of £1,000, being the amount for which he had effected a policy with the defendants.

Mr. Cornish was a farmer in Herefordshire. He had a farm which was intersected by a railway. He was in the habit of crossing the railway to get from one part of his farm to the other, and was killed whilst so doing in broad daylight one day in July, 1887. He had crossed the line to get a match from a man in a field on the other side. He had got the match and was recrossing. He had just got on the line of rails nearest to him—i.e., the down line—and was recrossing, when a train on that line knocked him down and killed him. At the place in question there was no station; no proper crossing; no obstruction to prevent a person about to cross from seeing an approaching train. There was no evidence that the deceased was short-sighted or deaf. A train on the up line had passed shortly before the accident happened, and the deceased, who was then on the other side of the line, had seen this train coming and had waited for it. Whether he saw or heard the down train, which killed him, or whether he did not, it is impossible to say. But if he did not see or hear it, he would, nay, he must, have done so if he had been paying attention to what he was doing. There is no ground for imputing negligence to the persons in charge of the train which knocked him down.

Under these circumstances the deceased met his death by what may be properly called an accident, although his own want of care unquestionably contributed to his death, and the jury in effect found that he was killed by accident, as will be seen presently. But the policy excepts from the risks insured against, cases of death happening by "the exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury," and the defendants contend that this case falls within this exception, and that consequently they are not liable on the policy. The Lord Chief Justice was of this opinion, and he so directed the jury. The jury found as follows: "We are compelled by the ruling of the Lord Chief Justice to find that Mr. Cornish lost his life by incurring obvious risk, but we are of opinion that it was an ordinary misadventure." The question we have to determine is whether the direction of the Lord Chief Justice was right.

The exception on which the defendants rely is so worded as to leave several important matters in doubt. The words are "exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury." These words suggest the following questions: Exposure by whom? Obvious when? Obvious to whom? It is to be observed that the words are very general; there is no such word as "wilful," or "reckless," or "careless"; and to ascertain the true meaning of the exception the whole document must be studied, and the object of the parties to it must be steadily borne in mind. The object of the contract is to insure against accidental death and injuries, and the contract must not be construed so as to defeat that object; nor so as to render it practically illusory.

A man who crosses an ordinary crowded street is exposed to obvious risk of injury; and if the words in question are construed literally the defendants would not be liable in the event of an assured being killed or injured in so crossing, even if he was taking reasonable care of himself. Such a result is so manifestly contrary to the real intention of the parties that a construction which leads to it ought to be rejected. But if this be true, a literal construction is inadmissible, and some qualification must be put on the words used. In the American cases cited by Mr. Jelf the language of the policy was different, but the foregoing reasoning was adopted by the court. The real difficulty is to express the necessary qualification with which the words must be taken. In a case on the line, if a case of real doubt, the policy ought to be construed most strongly against the insurers; they frame the policy and insert the exceptions. But this principle ought only to be applied for the purpose of removing a doubt, not for the purpose of creating a doubt or magnifying an ambiguity, when the circumstances of the case raise no real difficulty. Without attempting to paraphrase the language so as to meet all cases, it is, we think, plain that two classes of accidents are excluded from it isks insured against—viz. (1), accidents which arise from an exposure by the assured to risk of injury, which risk is obvious to him at the time he exposes himself to it; (2) accidents which arise from an exposure by the assured to risk of injury, which risk would be obvious to him at the time if he were paying reasonable attention to what he was doing. This last qualification is in accordance with the ruling of Cockburn, C.J., in Lovell v. Accident Insurance Co., a note of which was furnished to us, and is warranted by the language used and by the objects to be attained. Any construction short of this would be going too far in one direction, just as a literal construction would be going too far in the other.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

We accept the view of the jury that this accident may be called an ordinary misadventure, but the question is whether the policy covers it. We think not. We are not prepared to say that injuries occasioned by the negligence of the assured are in all cases excepted. Such a construction would render the policy little better than a snare to the assured. But there are degrees of negligence, and we are unable to read this policy as protecting a man against the consequences of running risks which would be obvious enough to him if he paid the slightest attention to what he was doing. In the present case the deceased did in fact expose himself to risk of imminent death. That is quite clear. If he looked and saw the train coming, the risk to which he exposed himself must have been obvious to him at the time. If the risk to which he exposed himself was not then obvious to him, that circumstance can only be accounted for on the supposition that he was not attending to what he was doing—i.e., not looking to see if a train was coming and was near. We cannot construe the policy as covering a risk so run, and we agree with the Lord Chief Justice that there was no question of fact to leave to the jury.

The appeal, therefore, ought to be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I concur in the judgment. I should even go further, and say that the risk which the insured incurred was evident to his own senses. The line was a main line, which was not to be crossed like a street, and any person who attempted to cross it at such a place without looking to see if a train was coming incurred a risk which was evident to himself.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Lovell, Son, & Pitfield for Dayman & Walsh, Oxford.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wynne-Baxter & Keeble.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Oct. 31.

In re BLACKBURN.

SMILES v. BLACKBURN. (a.)

Will—Codicil—Construction—Power of appointment—Exercise.

A testator, having under his marriage settlement a power of appointment jointly with his wife during her life, and, in case of her predeceasing him without any joint appointment being made, a power of appointment as survivor by deed or will among the children of the marriage, by his will, made in the lifetime of his wife, after making certain specific devises and bequests, provided that any other estate or property of which he might be possessed at the time of his decease, or over which he might have a power of bequest or disposal, should be held in trust for the benefit of any younger child or children of the marriage as therein mentioned; and by a codicil, made after the decease of his wife, after making certain specific devises and bequests, and giving the residue of his real and personal estate to his second son, confirmed his will in all respects so far as it was capable of taking effect.

Held, that the power of appointment was well exercised by the effect of the codicil in republishing the will.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 4th of February, 1853, and made in consideration of the marriage of Joshua and Mary Ann Blackburn, two sums of Bank Annuities of £10,000 and £2,000 respectively were settled upon trust, after the death of the survivor of Joshua and Mary Ann Blackburn, for the children of the marriage in such shares and proportions as Joshua and Mary Ann Blackburn should jointly appoint, and in default of such joint appointment as the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint, and in default of any appointment for the children equally as therein mentioned.

The marriage was solemnized on the 5th of February, 1853.

By his will, dated the 11th of August, 1854, Joshua Blackburn, after making certain specific devises and bequests, declared that any other estate or property whatsoever, whether real or personal, of which he might be possessed at the time of his decease, or over which he might have the power of bequest or disposal, should be held in trust for the benefit of any younger child or children as therein mentioned.

By another indenture of settlement, dated the 15th of August, 1854, indorsed on the indenture of settlement of the 4th of February, 1853, a further sum of £2,000 Bank Annuities, being after-acquired property of Mary Ann Blackburn, was settled subject to a general power of appointment in her favour, which was never exercised, upon the same trusts as declared by the settlement of the 4th of February, 1853, concerning the moneys thereby settled.

Mary Ann Blackburn died in May, 1882, intestate, no joint appointment of the settled property having been made, leaving all the issue of the marriage, two sons and three daughters, her surviving.

By a first codicil, dated the 10th of July, 1883, Joshua Blackburn, after making certain specific bequests and devises, and giving the residue of his real and personal estate to his second son, proceeded: "In all other respects I confirm my original will so far as it is still capable of taking effect," and by a second codicil of the same date he appointed an executor and confirmed his will and first codicil.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees of the settlement for the determination of the question whether the settled moneys were appointed by the will or codicils of Joshua Blackburn, or whether they devolved as in default of appointment. The defendants were the five children of the marriage.

W. C. Druce, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

T. Rolls Warrington, for the defendant Joshua J. B. Blackburn, the eldest son of the marriage.—The testator could only exercise the power of appointment as survivor of his wife, and his will, made in her lifetime, could not operate as an exercise of the power by him as survivor: Cave v. Cave, 8 De G. M. & G. 131, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 63. The fact that it was confirmed by two codicils made after her death cannot make it a valid exercise of the power: Hope v. Hope, 2 W. R. 674, 4 Giff. 13; Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. 499, 12 Ves. 20. On the true construction of the will and codicils the power has not been exercised: In re Cotton, 37 W. R. 232, 40 Ch. D. 41. This view is supported by the maintenance clause.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Swinfen Eady, for the younger children.—The first codicil, executed after the death of the testator's wife, when he could make the appointment, brings down the will to the date of the first codicil, which must be regarded as incorporating the will. The power was in existence at the date of the will. Hope v. Hope is in my favour. The will and codicils must be construed as exercising the power: In re Teape's Trusts, 21 W. R. 780, L. R. 16 Eq. 442.

He also referred to Sheldon v. Sheldon, 1 Robertson, 81.

North, J.—I think that in this case the power of appointment was well exercised by the effect of the will and codicil. I quite concur in the decision in Cave v. Cave; and I do not think that the power could have been exercised by the will alone. I think that the codicil had the effect of republishing the will and making it a good exercise of the power of appointment, as if the words of the will had been repeated in the codicil. The will indicates an intention by the testator of exercising every power existing at his death. When the codicil was made that intention still existed. The effect is as if the codicil had said at its date what the will said at its date, and the codicil has the effect of exercising the power which the testator had at the date of the codicil. On the construction of the will and codicil, I think this is the true view. The case of Cotton v. Cotton is distinguishable. In the maintenance clause the testator gives maintenance out of income, and it would be absurd to make it apply to the settled funds in which his wife had a life interest. I think that the codicil republished the will, and exercised the power of appointment.

Solicitors, Druces & Attlee; Pretor W. Chandler.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } July 25, 26, 1889.

Blore v. Ashby. (a.)

Practice—Third party—Appearance—No pleading—Right to take part in trial—Indemnity—Costs of unsuccessful defence—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 16, rr. 52, 53.

The defendant in an action for specific performance of a contract served a third-party notice upon another person, alleging that he signed the contract as agent for that person. The third party appeared, but obtained no directions as to delivery of pleadings or defending the action. The defendant obtained an order that the question of liability between himself and the third party should be tried as soon as might be after the trial of the action.

Held, that the third party might appear by counsel and take part in the trial, and might have the question of his liability tried immediately after the trial of the action.

The defendant being held liable to the plaintiff on the contract, but entitled to an indemnity from the third party,

Held, that the third party must pay the costs of the third-party proceedings between him and the defendant, but that the defendant must pay the costs of his unsuccessful defence.

This was an action for specific performance of a contract to purchase two houses at Nottingham.

The defence was that Ashby signed the contract as agent for one Shepperson. Ashby served a third-party notice upon Shepperson, who appeared, but took no further steps in the matter. Ashby made an application to the court by summons under ord. 16, r. 52, for directions, and on March 6, 1889, it was ordered that the question of Shepperson's liability to indemnify Ashby should be tried as soon as conveniently might be after the trial of the action. No directions under ord. 16, r. 53, had been given.

The defendant was called as a witness, and was examined by his counsel and cross-examined on behalf of the plaintiff.

On counsel for Shepperson proposing to cross-examine the witness, defendant's counsel objected.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Warrington, for the plaintiff.

J. G. Wood, for the defendant.

Swinfen Eady, for Shepperson.

Kekewich, J.—This third-party practice is not quite settled yet, and it is desirable that one should know how far one ought to go. Mr. Wood contends that because Mr. Shepperson, who appears on a third-party notice, has not applied, as he might have done on the hearing of defendant's summons, for directions as to delivery of pleadings and so forth, he has admitted his liability, and is not entitled to have the question between him and the defendant tried at all. But the order of March 6, 1889, states that there is a question to be tried between the defendant and Mr. Shepperson; it says that "the question whether the said Frederick Shepperson is liable to indemnify the defendant to any and what extent under the notice shall be tried as soon as conveniently may be after the trial of this action, or after the defendant shall have submitted to judgment." It is therefore clear that there is a question to be tried. Then it is said that Mr. Shepperson ought to have got directions, and that he is in default for not doing so. To my mind it is the defendant who is in default. He made the proper application under ord. 16, r. 52, and now he says that the proper directions were not given under that order. If that be so he ought to have appealed and got the proper directions. If the order is not sufficient it is the defendant's fault. But it seems to me that it is sufficient. I know from the order, that I have to try the question of liability between the defendant and the third party, and that it is to be tried as soon as may be after the trial of the question between the plaintiff and the defendant—that is, in my opinion, immediately after the trial of this action. As there are no pleadings as between the defendant and the third party, I must try it as best I can upon the evidence with the assistance of counsel, and to help me to do so I think it right that the defendant should be cross-examined by Mr. Eady now.

At the close of the trial his lordship held that, as between plaintiff and defendant, the defendant was liable upon the contract. The question between the defendant and Shepperson was then tried, and it was held that the defendant entered into the contract as Shepperson's agent and was entitled to indemnity from him in respect of it. Upon these findings it was contended on behalf of the defendant, that Shepperson must pay the costs, both of the third-party proceedings and of the action.

Kekewich, J.—As to the costs of the third-party proceedings, there is no reason for departing from the ordinary rule. Mr. Shepperson must pay them. As to the costs of the action, the case is peculiar. As a rule, in the case of an action by a vendor for specific performance if the purchaser claims to be indemnified by a third party either as sub-purchaser or, as here, principal, the third party, if the case goes against him, ought to pay the whole costs of the action, which has presumably been defended for his benefit. But here there is no such presumption. Mr. Ashby said "I am not liable to Blore at all; I have a right of indemnity against Shepperson, but I have what is better than an indemnity, I have the absence of liability to the vendor." This contention was made for Ashby's own benefit; it did not help Shepperson. On the contrary, if this contention had been correct Shepperson would have been made the principal in the contract in the first instance and liable directly to the plaintiff instead of by a circuitous process. I think that Mr. Ashby defended this action for his own benefit, and whatever benefit he has derived from it he must pay for by bearing his own costs—that is to say, he has got an order against him in the action, and he has no right of indemnity against Mr. Shepperson as regards those costs.

(a.) Reported by T. R. Colquhoun Dill, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Marsland & Co., for W. B. Smith, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the defendant, Harvey & Capron, for H. H. Carter, Nottingham.

Solicitors for Shepperson, Aldridge, Thorn, & Morris, for Acton & Marriott, Nottingham.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Nov. 22.

SCHWARTZ v. LOCKET. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Tenancy from year to year—Eviction by superior landlord—Implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.

In a tenancy from year to year there is no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment against eviction by title paramount on the determination of the landlord's interest, and if, on such determination, the tenant is evicted by the superior landlord, he has, in the absence of an express agreement, no claim against his landlord for damages for such eviction by the superior landlord.

Appeal from Bloomsbury County Court.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages for eviction from certain premises which she had held as tenant from year to year from the defendant.

In 1877 the defendant, who held the premises in question by lease, let the premises to a certain tenant for a term of three years. Before this term expired the tenant assigned his interest to the plaintiff, who entered into possession, and, on the expiration of the term in 1880, the plaintiff continued on in possession of the premises as tenant from year to year under the defendant as landlord.

About the year 1887 the defendant's lease expired, and both he and the plaintiff were soon afterwards evicted by the superior landlord in the middle of one of the years of the tenancy.

The plaintiff then brought an action for damages for such eviction against the defendant, as landlord, upon the ground that there was incident to the tenancy from year to year an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment. It was admitted that there was no express covenant for quiet enjoyment.

The learned county court judge held that in an ordinary tenancy from year to year there is no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment to protect the tenant against eviction by title paramount on the expiration of the landlord's interest, and he nonsuited the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ashton Cross, for the plaintiff.—It is said that, as the lessor's interest had expired before the end of the year, there was no implied covenant for title or for quiet enjoyment to protect the tenant from eviction after the landlord's interest had determined. The case of Stranks v. St. John, 15 W. R. 678, L. R. 2 C. P. 376, shows that that is not so, as there it was held that by agreeing to let, a lessor impliedly promises that he has a good title. Each year's letting is a fresh letting, and according to Stranks v. St. John, at the beginning of each year's tenancy there is an implied promise that the lessor has a good title to let for the whole of that year; there is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment whether the lessor's title and interest continue for the year or not. The case of Penfold v. Abbott, 11 W. R. 169, relied on by the defendant, is peculiar, and is easily distinguishable from the present case. In that case the tenant knew that the landlord had only an unexpired term of a limited duration, but in this case there is no suggestion that the tenant knew of the limited interest of the defendant. The case of Penfold v. Abbott depends on Adams v. Gibney, 6 Bing. 656, where the lessor was tenant for life, and it was held that the tenant, having been evicted by the remainderman after the death of the lessor, could not maintain an action against the executors of the lessor; but there the tenant had notice that the lessor had only a life interest in the premises, so that the principle of that case does not apply to the present case. There is no suggestion here that the tenant knew of the limited interest of the defendant, and since the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, we are not entitled to call for the lessor's title. If a person lets premises to me, and I know nothing of his title, there is an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment: Stranks v. St. John.

W. S. Goddard (Cock, Q.C., with him), for the defendant.—The covenant for quiet enjoyment, even if there were one, came to an end when the defendant's interest expired, and the plaintiff is not protected against eviction by title superior. Penfold v. Abbott shows that. Wightman, J., there says:—"The present is the case of an agreement for a lease from year to year so long as both parties please, and the agreement on the part of the lessor implies no more than that the lessee shall have quiet enjoyment so long as his, the lessor's, interest in the premises lasts." That is precisely the case here. We give the covenant for quiet enjoyment so long as our interest lasts; when our interest ends our covenant for quiet enjoyment ends with it: Adams v. Gibney. So in Woodhouse v. Jenkins, 9 Bing. 431, there was, as in the present case, eviction by title paramount, and it was held that the lessor was not liable for damages for such eviction, the eviction being by title paramount, which he had no means of defeating. [He was stopped.]

Cross replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case it seems to me that the judgment of the learned county court judge must be affirmed. A demise from year to year does not imply a covenant against an eviction by a superior landlord. The principle is laid down over and over again, and there are five or six cases to that effect given in Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant. It would be most unreasonable to assume that the law imposes any such condition as this. No reason has been suggested why we should throw doubt on well-established law.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. Where there is a tenancy from year to year, if the tenant wishes to protect himself against eviction by the superior landlord, he must have an express agreement to that effect. It would not be right to imply any such agreement.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal refused.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Behrend.

Solicitor for the defendant, Leonard Nevill.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) Nov. 1.

Ex parte BOARD OF TRADE.
In re GEE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Leasehold premises—Onerous covenants—Assignment by way of mortgage—Bankruptcy of lessee—Disclaimer—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55.

Where the owner of leasehold premises, burdened with onerous covenants, assigns such premises by way of mortgage for the whole of the residue of the term granted by the lease, and subsequently becomes bankrupt, the equity of redemption which vests in the trustee in bankruptcy is not property burdened with onerous covenants within section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and an application for leave to disclaim the lease need not be made by the trustee.

Special case stated by his Honour Judge Chalmers from the Birmingham County Court for the opinion of the High Court of Justice, under section 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

On January 4, 1889, the debtor presented a bankruptcy petition in the Birmingham County Court, and a receiving order was made against him on the same day. On January 16, 1889, the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt, and on January 18 an order was made for the summary administration of his estate, whereby the official receiver became trustee of the bankrupt's property.

The bankrupt was a builder, and by an indenture dated September 20, 1886, made between one W. Crowson as lessor and the bankrupt as lessee, the said lessor demised to the bankrupt, his executors, administrators, and assigns, a piece of land in the parish of Handsworth for a term of ninety-nine years at a ground-rent of £17, payable quarterly. In this indenture were contained covenants by the lessee to pay the ground-rent, to pay all rates, taxes, and outgoings chargeable upon the demised premises, to build on the demised land six houses according to plans and specifications to be approved by the lessor and to cost at least £900, to construct drains for the intended buildings, and to paint and keep in repair the houses and premises when built, and to yield up the buildings and premises in good repair to the lessor at the end of the term. The indenture also contained covenants by the lessee to insure, and to repair after notice, and negative covenants not to permit the premises to be used in a manner forbidden by the said indenture.

By an indenture dated July 27, 1887, made between the bankrupt and the said W. Crowson, reciting, amongst other things, the said indenture of September, 20, 1886, and also reciting—as was the fact—that the bankrupt had built on the demised land six houses, five of which were occupied and one of which was unlet, and that there was due to the said W. Crowson from the bankrupt a sum of £810 for advances and interest on such advances, the bankrupt assigned to the said W. Crowson the demised land with the buildings then erected or thereafter to be erected thereon for the whole of the residue of the term of ninety-nine years created by the indenture of September 20, 1886, subject to a proviso for the redemption of the said premises by the bankrupt on payment to the said W. Crowson of the sum of £810 and interest thereon at the rate of five guineas per cent. per annum on January 25, 1888.

The equity of redemption in the demised premises was of no value, and the bankrupt's estate was without any assets, and on June 28, 1889, the official receiver, as trustee of the bankrupt's property, applied to the county court for its directions as to whether it was, under the circumstances of the case, necessary, in order to free the bankrupt's estate and the trustee from all liability under the indenture of September 20, 1886, for the official receiver, as such trustee, to apply for leave to disclaim the equity of redemption and his interest in the demised property. For the purpose of obtaining leave to disclaim such equity of redemption and interest it would be necessary to incur the expense of an application to the court, and for the official receiver to give notice to W. Crowson.

The question of law which arose upon the application was whether the interest which the bankrupt had in the demised premises at the commencement of the bankruptcy consisted of lands burdened with onerous covenants, or binding the possessor thereof to the performance of any onerous acts, or to the payment of any sum of money, within the meaning of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and, such question being one which might frequently arise, the county court judge thought it desirable to have it determined in the first instance in the High Court of Justice.

Muir Mackenzie stated the case.—The question is of importance, because if, in cases of summary administration where there are no assets, the official receiver must apply for leave to disclaim, the expense has to be paid out of the public funds. There was an assignment here for the whole term, and there are no affirmative covenants left to the trustee. There is no necessity to apply for leave to disclaim, because the whole liability to perform the covenants is vested in the assignee. The liability of the bankrupt on his personal covenants does not devolve on the trustee, and the covenants which run with the land pass to the assignee.

He referred to Titterton v. Cooper, 30 W. R. 866, 9 Q. B. D. 473; Wilson v. Wallani, 28 W. R. 597, 5 Ex. D. 155; Mayor of Carlisle v. Blamire, 8 East, 487; Collyer v. Isaacs, 30 W. R. 70, 19 Ch. D. 342; Morgan v. Hardy, 35 W. R. 588, 18 Q. B. D. 646; Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403.

CAVE, J.—In my opinion in this case no disclaimer under section 55 is required. The section enacts that "where any part of the property of a bankrupt consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants," and so on. The question here is whether the bankrupt had amongst his property land burdened with onerous covenants. Now at the time when the lease was executed he undoubtedly had, because he was lessee, and as such was bound to perform the covenants of the lease, and if he had continued to be lessee up to the time of his bankruptcy, the effect of the bankruptcy would have been that the trustee would have become assignee of the lease, and, as such assignee, bound to perform those onerous covenants. It was with the view of enabling the trustee to get rid of the liability in such a case that section 55 was framed. In this case, however, previous to the bankruptcy the bankrupt had assigned the lease. Undoubtedly in an ordinary case of an assignment for value the assignor after the assignment remains liable on his covenants by virtue of the privity of contract. The assignee is also liable on them by virtue of the privity of estate. It is only on the ground of privity of estate that the trustee would have ever become liable on those covenants, and inasmuch as the previous assignment has transferred the liability to the assignee, leaving on the bankrupt only the liability under the covenant arising out of privity of contract, he ceases to have the land burdened with onerous covenants. It is true that some years ago a question did arise as to whether, in the case of a mortgage, the general rule applied. This, however, has been decided in the affirmative, and it cannot be doubted at this day, where there is an assignment to a mortgagee, the mortgagee becomes, by virtue of the assignment, the owner of the lease burdened with the covenants, and the assignor no longer possesses any land burdened with onerous covenants which can, by virtue of the statute, become vested in the trustee. It is true that the assignor, where the assignment is by way of mortgage, retains the equity of redemption, but that is a right which is not burdened with onerous covenants. It is not because he is owner of the equity of redemption that he can be compelled to perform the covenants, but solely by virtue of the privity of contract that exists between him and the lessor, and that liability cannot be transferred by bankruptcy to the trustee. The right to call for a reconveyance, no doubt, is conferred, and does pass to the trustee, and if the trustee chooses to exercise that right, and have a reconveyance or a reassignment executed to him, he would then become the owner of the land burdened with onerous covenants. He is not compelled to exercise that right. Therefore the object of the statute, which is to free him from a liability which he is compelled to take on himself, cannot apply to the mere case of the transfer to him of the equity of redemption, which is accompanied by no burden unless he chooses to take the burden on himself, which he is not compelled to do.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I am therefore of opinion that there was in this case no land belonging to the bankrupt within section 55, and consequently that no disclaimer under that section is necessary.

Solicitor, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } July 16, 1889.

Gillet v. Gillet. (a.)

Divorce — Aggravated assault—Summary conviction—Order—Wife not bound to cohabit—Order for weekly payment—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 19), s. 4—Enforcing order—No jurisdiction in High Court.

The High Court has not power to enforce an order made by a court of summary jurisdiction under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, for a weekly payment of money by a husband convicted of an aggravated assault upon his wife.

On a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage, on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and adultery, two orders were made for payment by the husband, of £16 and £45, the wife's costs, which he had not complied with. The cruelty alleged was an aggravated assault, for which the husband had been convicted, and the court of summary jurisdiction had, under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, made an order that the wife was no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and that the husband should pay her a weekly sum. The husband was £58 in arrear of such payments. The husband was entitled to a sum of money under a will. The petitioner obtained an ex parte injunction to restrain the husband from receiving the money payable to him under the will, on the ground that he had not paid to his wife the amounts before stated.

The court (Butt, J.), on an application to continue the injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver, continued the injunction till the hearing of the petition as to the two sums of £16 and £45 payable under the order of this court; but refused to continue it in respect of the sum of £58 payable under the order of the court of summary jurisdiction.

Motion to continue an injunction which the petitioner had obtained on an ex parte application to restrain the respondent, her husband, from receiving a sum of £1,400 to which he was entitled under the will of Sarah Oakes, deceased, and for the appointment of a receiver.

On the 27th of June, 1887, the respondent was convicted before Mr. Chance, one of the metropolitan police magistrates, sitting at Lambeth, of an aggravated assault on his wife, and the magistrate made an order, under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, that the wife should be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and that the husband should pay his wife £1 weekly. A sum of £58 was now due under this order.

In October, 1888, the wife filed her petition praying for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of cruelty and adultery committed since the separation, the cruelty alleged being the aggravated assault of which the husband was convicted. In this suit two orders were made, one that the husband should pay into court £16 5s. 7d., the amount of the wife's taxed costs up to the date of the order, the other that the husband should pay into court or give security for £45, the estimated amount of the wife's costs for the hearing.

The husband had not obeyed either of these orders.

Walter, for the petitioner, in support of the motion.—The magistrate has made an order for the payment of money in a matrimonial cause, and his order has the same effect as a judicial separation granted by this court. We are compelled to come to the High Court because the magistrate has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction, and as there is now a suit for dissolution of marriage pending in this division, the application should be made here. The Court of Chancery has enforced the decision of the Divorce Court by appointing a receiver under section 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873: Oliver v. Lowther, 28 W. R. 381; Sidney v. Sidney, 17 L. T. N. S. 9. This was a case where we were obliged to apply ex parte in the first instance or the object of the application might have been defeated: ord. 52, r. 3. This case differs from Newton v. Newton, 34 W. R. 123, 11 P. D. 11, where no order to pay had been made against the husband.

Searle, for the respondent.—The petitioner is entitled to nothing more than the statute gives her. The order for alimony was made under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, and sub-section 1 expressly states how that order is to be enforced—viz., "in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation." This court has no jurisdiction to deal with or enforce that order, and cannot treat the magistrate's order as a decree of judicial separation made by this court. I admit this court can enforce the payments for costs ordered by this court, but as there was no dispute on our part as to that, the petitioner ought not to have her costs, as the respondent would have paid those amounts.

Butt, J.—I think this injunction was properly granted as to the sums of £16 and £45, for the wife's costs, to be paid by the respondent under the order of this court, but I do not think it ought to have been granted as to the claim under the magistrate's order. I shall continue the injunction until the trial and allow the petitioner her costs of this motion. If the respondent pays the two amounts he can always apply to the court.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Maynard & Sons.

Solicitors for the respondent, Alfred Hicks & Arnold.

(a.) Reported by J. Gerard Laing, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England) May 13, 1889.

Membery v. Great Western Railway Co. (a.)

Negligence—Breach of duty—"Volenti non fit injuria."

Where a workman is engaged by an employer to do work which the employer has contracted with a third person to do on the premises of that third person, and the work is dangerous without help, it is not the duty of the third person to furnish such help.

The maxim Volenti non fit injuria considered.

The appellant was employed by a man named Younghusband, who had contracted with the respondents to supply men and horses for the shunting of trucks upon their line. When engaged, in the course of his employment, in shunting trucks the appellant sustained injuries which led to the loss of one of his feet, and he brought this action against the railway company for damages, imputing negligence to them in not providing a boy to assist in unhooking the trucks.

It appeared that the railway company were to provide boys if they had them; otherwise the shunting was to go on without them. To do so was dangerous, but the plaintiff, the present appellant, had shunted trucks sometimes with, sometimes without, boys, and had been at this work for years. There had been constant complaints to the company's servants of the want of boys. Upon the evening in question he had asked the foreman for a boy, and was told he could have one when there was one disengaged, but he proceeded to do the work alone, in the course of doing which the accident happened.

The railway company called no evidence, and submitted that there was no evidence of liability, but Manisty, J., left the case to the jury, who found that there was negligence in the railway company, which was the sole cause of the injury sustained, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £50. A new trial was refused by a divisional court.

On appeal the Court of Appeal set aside the verdict and judgment, and entered judgment for the defendants.

The present appeal was against this order.

W. Lynden Bell (Waddy, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—The railway company were bound to use due precautions for people coming to do work on their premises and for their advantage, and they failed to do so: Indermaur v. Dames, 15 W. R. 434, L. R. 2 C. P. 311; per Brett, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503, 509. The question of volens is a question of fact.

Woodley v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 2 Ex. D. 384, 388, 25 W. R. Dig. 155; Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 W. R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685; Yarmouth v. France, 36 W. R. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647, were also referred to.

F. Lockwood, Q.C., and John Digby, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord Halsbury, C.—In some respects this is certainly a very remarkable case, because the ground upon which the original verdict for the plaintiff was obtained has been abandoned by the learned counsel who has appeared in support of the judgment of the learned judge and the verdict of the jury.

Manisty, J., upon the facts with which we are now familiar, appears first to have rested the liability of the company on the ground of a duty cast upon them by a contract with their contractor. He says that it was a term of the contract that the company should find a boy, and he proceeds upon that assumption to rest the whole liability of the company upon their neglect in that respect in not fulfilling the obligation of the contract; and that, undoubtedly, is consistent with the statement of claim which the plaintiff brought and upon which the case was decided. We have now an admission that that fact, cardinal to the case as it was conducted at the trial before the jury, is to be abandoned and that there is no evidence to justify that allegation. We are therefore remitted to what is practically an application by the learned counsel who appears in support of the verdict that, upon another ground and upon a different cause of action, this case should be submitted to another jury in order to see whether they can found a verdict upon such cause of action, on which the plaintiff can retain what he claims against the defendants.

Now, it appears to me that, the original ground of the action having been abandoned, and the verdict of the jury upon that theory being perfectly immaterial to the facts which are now put in proof under your lordships' review, it would be almost enough for the purpose of disposing of this case to say that the whole ground of action as insisted upon at the trial has absolutely failed, and that it is perfectly impossible to maintain the right either to have a new trial or to have the verdict entered for the plaintiff. But I am unwilling to treat the case upon that ground, because it appears to me that, upon much broader grounds, it is impossible to maintain the right of the plaintiff in this case; and, in truth, one is embarrassed by the abundance of materials for showing that he has no case. The commencement of one's embarrassment in that respect is to ascertain in what way the obligation of the company is supposed to arise—What is the duty cast upon the railway company which the railway company have neglected?

The learned counsel has quoted a variety of cases establishing a proposition which I think at this time of day nobody will dispute—namely, that apart from a contract, apart from contractual relations, either with the plaintiff himself or with the plaintiff's employer, if any individual is brought upon premises belonging to the person charged with negligence, and some act is done or omitted by that person, or he omits to inform the person who is brought upon the premises of something in the nature of a trap from which he may suffer injury, there is a duty cast upon all such persons. Those cases commenced with the case as to the Princess's Theatre, and continue down to very recent cases where it has been established that such an obligation does arise. I am not aware of any case in which there is a charge, not of entrapping a person into a dangerous hole, but where it is supposed that there is some positive duty to do something which is omitted without some obligation cast either by law or by contract upon the owner of the premises. I am not aware that any case has ever been heard of in which such an obligation as is now insisted upon has been maintained. In the case of Woodley v. The Metropolitan District Railway Co., where Mellish, L.J., pointed out the circumstances under which in his view the defendants were liable, the defendants themselves did the negligent act which occasioned the injury; the defendants themselves ran the train at its ordinary speed, without notice, without giving warning to the man who was working in their tunnel, or the opportunity of getting out of the way. Whether or not it would have been found one way or the other that the man himself was so careless as to disentitle himself from recovering, the fact remains that they did the act which caused the injury—they ran him down with their train, which was going at an undue speed at the particular point by which they were passing, when they knew that a person was there who might be injured. What analogy has that case to the case now before your lordships? It is almost reducing the thing to an absurdity by the mere statement of the proposi-

(a.) Reported by Charles H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ment unauthorized by the terms of the trust, which the cestuis que trustis must accept or reject, and which could only be rejected when the cestuis que trustis ascertained the circumstances under which the investment was made. The realization of the property was merely a carrying out of the authority handed over by the former trustee to the new trustees in respect of this mortgaged property.

It is like a sale of mortgaged property by the mortgagee under a power, without the concurrence of the mortgagor. If the sale is improperly made, it may be impeached, but the mortgagor is bound by it if made with reasonable prudence, and is answerable for what remains due on the mortgage after deducting the proceeds of sale.

In my opinion in this case the former trustee handed over what was really trust property to the new trustees, with this power of sale, and therefore no duty arose in the cestuis que trustis to say whether they would accept or reject it, and the former trustee is liable for the deficiency.

Thornton v. Stokill was referred to in support of the case of the former trustee. In that case a testator, who had been a trustee, had invested part of the trust funds in buying cottage property, which was entirely outside the scope of his power of investment. The cestuis que trustis wanted to take the cottage property at a certain sum and prove against the estate for the residue of the trust funds. Lord Hatherley held that they had a claim to the houses as against general creditors, but that they had no right to set a value on them and then prove for the deficiency. That case has no bearing on the present case.

In my opinion the former trustee remained liable for the deficiency, though no notice was given to him by the cestuis que trustis that they would hold him liable.

Again, the plaintiff is not open to the objection raised against him that he directed a sale. He did not, in fact, direct a sale. The trustees referred to him, and he merely said he could not suggest anything better than a sale by auction. He was merely passive. I cannot, therefore, agree with the view taken by Kekewich, J., and there must be a decree against the former trustee for the loss occasioned to the plaintiff by this improper investment.

FRY, L.J.—I have been requested by Bowen, L.J., to deliver judgment before him.

The first question we have to consider is whether the investment was proper? whether it was one which a prudent man would make? I am of opinion that it was improper. A trustee who disregards the well-known rules of court as to the amount which may be lent on mortgage of a property—though they are not hard and fast rules—takes upon himself a considerable amount of risk.

The investment here was in cottage property, and the trustee invested on mortgage of it more than two-thirds of its value, as ascertained by his own valuer. Again, the character of the property was such that it depended for its value on shifting circumstances—e.g., the character of trade in the locality; and the fact that at the time of the mortgage some of the houses were unfinished and unlet strongly corroborates the view that the investment was improvident.

The second question is whether the plaintiff has in any way lost his primâ facie right to call on the defendant to make good the loss.

Two arguments were brought forward to show that he had. First, that the plaintiff had become a purchaser of the interest of one of the cestuis que trustis with full knowledge of the investment, and, therefore, could not impeach it. The facts hardly support this argument. The plaintiff was a mortgagee before the investment was made, and he only bought the equity of redemption afterwards, and the only information he had even then was that contained in the letter of the 30th of January, 1883, which only told him what the trust funds were then invested in, and which gave him no reason for questioning the propriety of the investment. I think, therefore, there is no reason for holding that, on this ground, the plaintiff is deprived of any right he had.

Secondly, it is urged that the plaintiff was a party to the sale, and that he concurred in the sale of April, 1887. I do not think he did anything of the sort. What took place was this: the solicitor of the new trustees informed the plaintiff's solicitor of their intention to offer the property for sale, and, on the 19th of April, wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor that they would do so "unless you can suggest some other course"; and to this the plaintiff's solicitor replies:—"As we presume there is no prospect of the property in question improving in value, we presume the best course will be to offer it for sale by public auction." There is nothing in that; the plaintiff was not a person who was bound to concur or who was asked to concur in the sale, and what was done merely amounted to a consultation between the solicitors, and did not make the plaintiff in any way a party to the sale. The substratum on which the judgment of the learned judge was based is, therefore, erroneous.

But then it is said that the conduct of the new trustees has released the former trustee from his liability, because, as it is urged, a return—or an offer of return—of the property to the former trustee, who had improperly invested upon it, is a sine qua non if it be sought to make him liable for the investment. In my opinion, however, a defaulting trustee has no such right, nor can the right of the cestuis que trustis be lost in that way. I think that the liability of the defaulting trustee is to make good the loss sustained by the improper investment. How that is to be made good depends on the circumstances of each particular case.

In some cases justice will be best done by realising the security and making him pay the deficiency; but in some cases it may be right to make him pay at once the full amount and let him take the benefit of the security; but there is no general principle as to a preliminary condition for relief.

In the present case all the new trustees did was this. The former trustee had lent on a mortgage which contained a power of sale. On his retirement he transferred that mortgage to the new trustees, who afterwards exercised the power of sale. How can it be said that they thereby debarred the cestuis que trustis from claiming relief against the former trustee? They sold under the power which the former trustee had himself given them by transferring the security to them.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not propose to add anything as to the law of the case, because I am of opinion that the question of law decided by Kekewich, J., does not arise at all. I do not see that there is any evidence that the plaintiff directed the sale or did anything more than merely stand by.

I do not, however, differ from anything said as to the law by the Lords Justices, but I am myself clearly of opinion that the question of law does not arise.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. Hocombe.

Solicitors for the defendant Uppleby, Hicks & Son, for Brown & Son, Barton-on-Humber.

Solicitors for the new trustees and the beneficiaries T. H. Bird, for H. C. Lisle, Nantwich.

unreasonable. The master says, Here is the work, do it or let it alone. If you do it, I pay you, if not I do not. If he has engaged him he says, I discharge you if you do not do it, I think I am right, if wrong I am liable to an action. The master says this, the servant does the work and earns his wages, and is paid, but is hurt. On what principle of reason or justice should the master be liable to him in respect of that hurt? On this ground, also, I am of opinion the judgment should be affirmed. I may observe that the Court of Appeal thought that neither of the cases where this novel notion was entertained bore on the present.

Lord FITZGERALD.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed and this appeal dismissed; and I rest my decision upon one, as it appears to me, solid ground, without entering into some of the questions which have been discussed in the course of the argument. I think that, having regard to the statement of claim in the case which was before the learned judge who presided at the trial, it was his duty at the close of the plaintiff's case to have yielded to the requisition of the defendants' counsel, and to have directed either a nonsuit upon the case then made, or a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Bell could not alter the plaint which is before us into any form which would give a substantial cause of action without abandoning the whole case, both made upon the present statement of claim and also made at the trial, and upon which the jury decided, and upon which the learned judge gave his judgment in favour of the plaintiff. That is a thing not to be allowed, because although I would be far from tying any suitor down to mere technicalities, he ought to succeed, if he succeeds at all, upon the case, in substance, which he has raised. Now I turn to the statement of claim, and it consists really of two allegations, both of which, in the amendment proposed, will have to be abandoned; that is, first, that there was a contract between this company and the present Mr. Younghusband, Mr. Younghusband, jun., that the company, in consideration of his performing this duty of shunting, would provide him on all occasions with a boy to assist in it; and the second allegation is that, in breach of that duty and that obligation, the company failed to supply that boy. I have already pointed out, in the course of the discussion, that that entirely fails. There was not any such contract with the present Mr. Younghusband; there was an arrangement with him which had been followed out by his father for several years and by his father's workmen, not that the company should absolutely provide boys to assist, but that they should be relieved from that obligation; and in place of it another was substituted, the new arrangement being that if a boy was available upon the premises they would give Mr. Younghusband the benefit of his services. To state these propositions is to show that, as the case was originally stated, it entirely and absolutely fails; and upon that ground I think the learned judge should have nonsuited the plaintiff.

It is further to be remarked that this calamity to this unfortunate man, for whom one cannot but express pity, was really occasioned how? By his doing for Mr. Younghusband, his employer, the duty which Mr. Younghusband had undertaken to perform with reference to the company, that is, to do the shunting without the aid of a boy if there was not a boy whose services were at the moment available. It is also plain that there was an absence of any compulsion. Membery had been doing this duty without the aid of a boy for at least seven years before the time of this calamity. Very likely he had sometimes asked for and sometimes got, and at other times did not get, such assistance. Upon the occasion in question he asked for the services of a boy, possibly not unreasonably, but the answer which he got was in substance this: "I am not bound to give you one—if a boy becomes disengaged and is available I will send him to you, but at present I have no boy." There is no compulsion there. The plaintiff goes to do the work which he has been previously doing for many years, and in the manner in which he has been previously doing it, and in the course of so acting he meets with a calamity.

I therefore rest my judgment upon this solid ground, that the learned judge at the trial ought either to have directed a verdict for the defendants or to have nonsuited the plaintiff—it is immaterial which—and I think that upon this ground the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. There are some other questions which are questions of difficulty and are not free from doubt, but upon which, as I do not think that they arise in the case, I forbear expressing any opinion.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly clear that in the present case the plaintiff has no right of action founded upon any contractual relation between him and the defendant company. But his case is, that upon the occasion in question he was, with the assent or at the invitation of the defendants, upon their premises engaged about work in which they had an interest, and that he was damaged by their negligence. I think that whenever there is a charge of negligence it is of the utmost importance, in order to avoid confusion and the danger of mistake, to remember that negligence is the allegation of a breach of duty, a duty to take care, and to inquire at once what duty (if any) there was on the part of the persons charged with negligence to take care, and if there was any such duty what was the extent of it at the time and under the circumstances which existed on the occasion when negligence is alleged to have been committed.

Now, I do not for a moment doubt that there was a duty incumbent upon the defendants towards the plaintiff at the time when he was upon their premises. They were not without duty towards him. But it is not enough to arrive at the conclusion that there was a duty or even a duty to take care; the extent of that duty requires to be determined. I cannot doubt that they were bound to take care that the machinery or appliances or tackle of theirs which he had to use in the course of his discharge of these duties in which they were interested were in a reasonably fit and proper condition; and certainly if they were not in such a condition, and if the defect in them was unknown to the plaintiff, I cannot doubt that the plaintiff would have his remedy against them. In addition to that, I think they were under the duty to him, having invited him upon their premises, not to permit their premises to be in such a condition that he unwittingly might fall into a trap of the existence of which he, unacquainted with their premises, would be ignorant, by which he might sustain an injury. Further than that, it might be (and I confess that I should myself be disposed to think that it was) their duty to take due and reasonable care that in the carrying on of their business they did not subject him to unreasonable risk owing to the acts which they did in the carrying on of their business. If they were carrying on a dangerous business, and one which would subject people employed upon their premises for their benefit to risk, they must take reasonable care, as it seems to me, that they do not do any act (I emphatically use the word "act") which would endanger the safety of the persons who thus, to their knowledge, are employed about their business upon their premises.

Assuming all that in favour of the plaintiff, his case goes much further, because his allegation amounts and must amount to this, that the defendants were bound to take care to supply all the assistance, by means of the employment of other persons in addition to himself, which was necessary in order to free his employment from risk. That is really, when you analyze it, what the allegation of the plaintiff really amounts to. Now I am unable to see any authority for such a proposition; nor am I able to see that it is to be derived by analogy from any decided cases, or that it is really supported by any principle. It is utterly unlike that which in Woodley's case established the cause of action—namely, you must take care that the acts which you do are not done in such a way as to endanger others. That is very far indeed from supporting the proposition, that because a person is employed by somebody else upon your premises, you come under the obligation to afford to him all the assistance of additional persons which will render his employment free from danger.

It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff fails in making out the duty the breach of which alone would establish his case here and would enable him to maintain his action against the defendants.

Taking that view, it appears to me to be unnecessary to consider the further question whether this is a case to which the maxim Volenti non fit injuria applies, although I do not mean for a moment to suggest that I entertain any doubt that in this case it would be applicable; and I should not have alluded further to the question but for some observations which have been made by Lord Bramwell with regard to the extent of this maxim. It is certainly not necessary on the present occasion to determine the limits to the application of that maxim; but, after what has been said, I desire to say a word or two further with reference to it, because it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that what he has stated is in conflict with opinions, at all events, which have been expressed by learned judges in the courts below. I do not propose on the present occasion to express any opinion with regard to them. They have not been argued before us, at all events, exhaustively, inasmuch as they did not arise in the present case, and I do not desire to bind myself in any way in future, but I want to make distinct that which I consider to be left absolutely open by the present discussion.

Lord Bramwell has suggested that in no case can the maxim be said to be inapplicable unless the person who has done the act was under some physical constraint or compulsion at the time when he did it, and that the consideration whether he would have come in conflict with his employer if he had refused to do it, or might have been dismissed from his employment, or would have been compelled to throw up his employment, is in no case a material consideration.

Now, the question which has arisen in former cases, and may arise again, appears to be this, whether a person employed in a manufactory, with the obligation on the part of his employer to use reasonable care to have his machinery in a suitable condition, who finds during the term of his employment, and in the course of his employment, that the machinery has, from want of care, become more dangerous than it otherwise would be, who, nevertheless, continues making the best of it and doing his work and performing his contract of service, would be precluded from maintaining an action against his employer for his undoubted breach of duty, because there would be a complete answer to it on the part of the master in saying:—"You proceeded with your contract of service and to fulfil the obligations into which you had entered to serve me, notwithstanding that you knew of this defect." Views have been expressed that in such a case the answer Volenti non fit injuria would not be a complete or sufficient answer on the part of the employer. I desire distinctly to say that nothing which has fallen from me to-day is to be considered as throwing any doubt upon that proposition. At the same time I refrain altogether from expressing any opinion upon it which could be supposed to be an affirmance of it. I desire to have the matter left open for argument if hereafter the question should arise and should be thought worthy of argument. It is sufficient to say that, even supposing the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria could not be set up in such a case as that, that has no application to the present case, where the circumstances which alone will prevent its being an answer do not exist.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely agree in the result at which your lordships have arrived.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I desire to concur in what Lord Herschell has said in reference to leaving open the question as to the doctrine Volenti non fit injuria. It was, in truth, upon that ground that I thought it right to call attention to the facts in this case affecting the employer and the employed.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Edward Boyle & Sons.

Solicitor for the respondents, R. R. Nelson.

Court of Appeal.

App. Bankruptcy. Nov. 8.

Ex parte BAIRD.
In re HECQUARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Debtor domiciled abroad — "Dwelling-house in England"—Single creditor—Action pending between same parties—Grounds for staying proceedings —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6, sub-section (1) (d).

A debtor, a Frenchman domiciled in France, and having apartments in Paris, against whom a judgment had been obtained in France by an English creditor, which judgment had not been satisfied, came over to London to conduct an action upon an entirely distinct claim against the said creditor. He rented per month five furnished rooms on different floors in a house occupied by an agency office on the ground floor, and in which the lessor retained another room for his own use. He brought his wife and some servants, and stayed for three months. Subsequent to the date of the issue of the writ in the second action the creditor, brought an action in this country against the debtor to enforce the French judgment. He obtained judgment in that action, and, upon the failure of the debtor to comply with a bankruptcy notice, the creditor presented a petition against him. The debtor's action against the creditor was still pending, and the debtor alleged that there was no other creditor than the petitioner, and that there were no assets. The registrar made a receiving order.

Held, that the debtor "had a dwelling-house in England" within the meaning of section 6, sub-section (1) (d), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that, provided he had such a dwelling-house within a year of the date of the presentation of the petition, no extent of the time of such occupation was necessary to make him liable to bankruptcy proceedings.

Held, further, that there was no principle of law that the fact of there being no other creditor and no assets must be a bar to bankruptcy proceedings; that such facts must be shown upon the examination of the debtor, and not upon the making of the receiving order; and that such facts and the fact of other legal proceedings being pending were merely grounds for the exercise of the registrar's discretion.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the debtor against a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Hazlitt.

The debtor, the appellant, was a Frenchman, domiciled in France, against whom the creditor Baird, the present respondent, had obtained judgment in France in November, 1886, upon a bill of exchange of which the debtor was the acceptor. The judgment was not satisfied.

On March 18, 1889, the appellant came to London to commence an action against Baird in the Chancery Division, and for that purpose he rented five rooms in a furnished house. He brought his wife over and some servants, and took the rooms by the month. His whole stay extended to three months.

On April 26, 1889, the respondent commenced an action, in the Queen's Bench Division, upon his French judgment, and obtained judgment on June 6. The writ in the appellant's action against the respondent was issued in March, 1889, and the litigation was still pending. It was for the specific performance of an agreement relating to an alleged concession of ruby mines in Burmah by the late King Theebaw's Ambassador to Hecquard, under which he alleged a large sum was recoverable by him from Baird.

The respondent served a bankruptcy notice upon the appellant in July, 1889, and upon his failure to comply filed a petition in September, 1889.

The appellant alleged that he was not liable to bankruptcy proceedings in England on the ground that he had no residence or dwelling-house there, that he had no other creditors nor any assets, and that other proceedings were pending which would affect the respondent's claim as a creditor against him. The registrar held that the debtor had "ordinarily resided, or had a dwelling-house, in England" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6 (1) (d), overruled the other objections, and made the receiving order, against which the debtor now appealed.

Sidney Woolf and Bingwood, for Hecquard, the appellant debtor.—The debtor did not "ordinarily reside or have a dwelling-house in England." The word "ordinary" qualifies dwelling-house as well as residence: Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 6 (1) (d); In re Norris, Ex parte Reynolds, 5 Morrell Bank. Reps. 111. The question whether the fact of there being no other creditors has not yet been decided, but was mooted in In re Bullen, Ex parte Arnaud, 36 W. R. 836, 5 Morrell Bank. Reps. 143, and Ex parte Ball, In re French, ante, p. 52. The fact of there being other proceedings pending in which the debtor may recover far more than sufficient to meet the creditor's claim is sufficient cause for the exercise by the registrar of his power to dismiss the bankruptcy petition under section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The dates of the proceedings taken by the creditor upon a judgment obtained some years ago, show a desire to obstruct the other litigation of the debtor to which he is a party.

H. Reed, for Baird, the respondent creditor.—Under the old bankruptcy law residence in England for one day was sufficient to make a debtor liable to proceedings. A man's residence or dwelling-house is where he ordinarily sleeps, and no extent of time is mentioned in section 6 (1) (d), as a necessary qualification: In re Williams, 21 W. R. 451, L. R. 8 Ch. 690. The registrar had a right to exercise his discretion in overruling the other objections.

Sidney Woolf replied.

Lord EXMOUTH, M.R.—The question for us here is, Whether the debtor was, under the circumstances proved, liable to be subjected to bankruptcy proceedings? He was a French subject not domiciled in England. The question depends on section 6 (1) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by which it is enacted that "a creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless (inter alia) he is domiciled in England, or, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England." It is clear the time of such occupation need not be for a whole year. It is stated to be "within a year" before the date of the petition. If he has had a dwelling-house in England within a year the time of such occupation is not subject to any specified extent. The point is whether he had a dwelling-house and was not a mere visitor in this country? What is a dwelling-house is not stated in the Act. The question, therefore, for us, is to say whether, upon the facts as found, this debtor had a dwelling-house upon a reasonable construction of the words? He was clearly not a mere passing visitor in this country, come for the purpose of sight-seeing or what not. He came, as is acknowledged, for the purpose of helping on some litigation in which he was engaged. He took, not a mere room in a hotel by the day or under the ordinary circumstances of a voyager, into which the landlord can put someone else the moment it is empty, but say five furnished rooms (there seems a dispute about the exact number), three on one floor, two on another, in a building belonging to to an agent of a railway company. The agent lived in part of the premises, whether occupying an office there or not, I do not know. There was a common staircase. The agent is not alleged to have had exclusive use of the outer door and key. A Mr. M—— had taken these five rooms and another one, and furnished them. He had exclusive use of them. There was an entrance to the rooms on each floor from the staircase. M—— keeps one room and lets the other five to the present appellant. He reserves no right to shut the appellant out of any of these rooms or to control the outer door. He keeps no servant to look after the appellant's rooms, nor does he treat him in any sense as a mere lodger. The appellant becomes a tenant of these rooms for a definite time, for one month first and extending to three months finally. He has exclusive use and absolute control of them. He engages two, three, or four servants. There seems, again, a dispute as to the exact number. At any rate there were a cook and a butler. He brings his wife. His children were left at school in France. Under such circumstances he must be held to have had a dwelling-house in England within a year previous to the bankruptcy petition, and must, therefore, be taken to have become liable to be proceeded against under the Bankruptcy Act of 1883.

The other points urged on the appellant's behalf do not seem to me any more maintainable. The fact of the judgment debt on which the bankruptcy proceedings were taken being two years old is immaterial. The judgment creditor was an Englishman. The debtor was a Frenchman, up to this year residing in France. The creditor obtained judgment against him in France, but could not act upon that. Upon the debtor coming to England, the creditor obtains judgment on his French judgment, and serves the bankruptcy notice upon him owing to his failure to pay. It is said, further, that the creditor is the only creditor of the appellant. How do we know that? Other creditors may come forward when the notice is duly advertised. At any rate it is no duty of the creditor to show that there are other creditors, and the mere fact of a debtor saying he has no other creditor is not sufficient for the court to take any action to protect the debtor from being harassed by alleged unnecessary proceedings, even should it be their opinion that they ought to do so. It is said, again, the debtor has no assets. Again, we must ask, How can we know that, on the present occasion? It is quite possible that there may be property which can be made available as assets, but which can only be reached through bankruptcy proceedings. That must be shown in the examination before the registrar. The time for the making of the receiving order is not the time when such a plea can be advanced. It must be ascertained by means of the further proceedings. As to the plea that other proceedings are pending, which would affect the same parties, and in which, if successful, the appellant would have ample assets to meet the respondent's claim, that is not sufficient to bar the bankruptcy proceedings as of right. If it had been shown that the creditor put the bankruptcy proceedings in motion upon a judgment obtained two years ago, but left dormant, and that he had only revived it for the purpose of preventing the appellant, the debtor, securing a fair trial upon another claim, that would be a fair ground upon which to ask us, or the registrar, to exercise our discretion in staying or dismissing the proceedings. But here the creditor has obtained an honest judgment for a debt. He has taken every step to enforce that judgment that was in his power. He has taken the first opportunity he has had of making the debtor amenable to that judgment, and upon his failure to pay the creditor takes apparently honest proceedings to secure what he can of a just debt. Why should he be prevented from following that course because the debtor shows a very vague and shadowy claim against other persons which he is endeavouring to establish in another division of the court? There is certainly no right to a stay or dismissal of the petition, there being only a discretion. I think, under the circumstances, the registrar exercised a wise discretion in refusing to dismiss or grant a stay. The appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The only point in this case really is whether the debtor may be said to have had a "dwelling-house" in this country within the ordinary meaning of those words? A dwelling-house need not be a detached residence. Nor does the fact of its being vertical (such as a flat) as distinct from horizontal, make any difference. Upon the facts of this case, as shown in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, I think it would be unduly restricting the language of the statute to hold that he did not occupy a dwelling-house.

As to the suggestion that there are no assets of the debtor to distribute and no other creditors, there is no principle of law laid down, that because that is so, no bankruptcy proceedings can be instituted. We know nothing about such a state of things here beyond the statement of the debtor. Under bankruptcy proceedings assets may be evolved which could not otherwise be reached or even be treated as assets apart from such proceedings. Those are matters to be gone into in the examination of the debtor, and may form grounds for the exercise of the registrar's discretion, but it is premature to ask us to exercise any discretion on those grounds. As to the argument that other proceedings are pending, it has not been established that they relate to the previous action of the creditor against the debtor. The creditor is entitled to say that the object of the pending action has no relation to the object of his action, which was simply to obtain money which has been now properly adjudicated to him, in failing to get which, he is entitled to pursue his remedy in the bankruptcy court.

LOPES, L.J.—It is clear that the debtor could not be described as a mere traveller passing through London without any intention of remaining for any length of time. He had exclusive possession of certain rooms for three months. He brings some servants. The fact that he had not the run of the entire house seems immaterial under the circumstances. I think the debtor had a dwelling-house in this country within the meaning of section 6, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The fact, if it is one, of there being no other creditor, and no assets, is not sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the registrar, though it might be a ground for a stay of proceedings. At present no opportunity has been given for such fact to be proved.

There seems no substance in the contention that another action is pending. That action has nothing to do with the particular judgment debt due to the respondent by the appellant. If the bankruptcy proceedings had been shown to have been instituted for the purpose of ousting the debtor's proceedings in the the pending action, that would be ground for our interference. The fact that judgment was obtained by the respondent in his action at a date subsequent to the pending action of the appellant is explained by the fact that the respondent was thereby simply enforcing the judgment in his favour already obtained in France in 1884, but which he could not enforce before, owing to the absence of the debtor from this country. When the debtor comes over to start his pending action, the creditor simply takes advantage of the debtor's presence here to enforce the creditor's properly obtained judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Lumley & Lumley.

Solicitors for the respondent, Smiles, Binyon, & Ollard.

From Chan. Div. May 13, 14; June 18, 19, 1889.

In re SALMON.

PRIEST v. UPPLEBY. (a.)

Trustee—Investment—Improvident investment in authorised security—Realisation of security by new trustees—No offer of the security to retired defaulting trustee—Liability of retired trustee—Practice—Third-party procedure—Appeal by plaintiff from order dismissing action against the defendant—Notice of appeal to third party—By whom such notice should be given—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 2.

U., a trustee, authorised by the terms of the trust to invest in real securities, invested a sum of £1,300 on a mortgage of freehold property, consisting of cottages, some of which were at the time unfinished, and the remainder of which were let at weekly rents to labourers. The property at the time of the mortgage had been valued at £1,750. U. afterwards retired from the trust, and new trustees were appointed, and the mortgage security was transferred to them. The new trustees, with the assent of the plaintiff, who was an assignee of one of the cestuis que trusts, sold by public auction the mortgaged property under the power of sale contained in the mortgage. The property realised a loss on the £1,300, but the sale itself was not in any way impeached. No offer had been made to U. to take the security for himself on paying the trust fund the amount lent on the security. The plaintiff by his action sought to make U. liable for the loss realised by the plaintiff.

Held, that, though the mortgage investment was an investment authorised by the terms of the trust, yet, having regard to the value and the nature of the property, it was an improper investment; that U. was liable to make good to the plaintiff the loss occasioned thereby; and that U. was not relieved from that liability by reason of the fact that he had been given no opportunity of electing to keep the security for himself.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Where a defendant in an action had brought in a third party for the purposes of indemnity, and the action of the plaintiff against the defendant was at the trial dismissed, but the plaintiff had appealed,

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (per Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, LJ.; Cotton, L.J., dissentiente), that, on the true construction of ord. 58, r. 2, the third party was not a party "directly affected" by the appeal, and that it was not the duty of the plaintiff as appellant to serve the third party with notice of the appeal, but that the proper course would be for the defendant to apply to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve the third party with notice of the appeal.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was brought by the assignee of a beneficiary entitled to a reversionary share of residuary personal estate under the trusts of the will of the testatrix, Eliza Salmon.

The defendants to the action were George Charles Uppleby, a former executor and trustee of the will, and two new trustees, who had been appointed, under a power in that behalf contained in the will, on the retirement of Uppleby.

The action was for an alleged breach of trust said to have been committed by the defendant Uppleby, when sole trustee of the will, by reason of his investing part of the trust funds on a mortgage in fee of cottage property in Kingston-upon-Hull.

The material facts are as follows:—The testatrix had bequeathed her residuary personal estate to the defendant Uppleby on trust to invest the same (inter alia) on real securities in England, with power to vary investments, and to hold the trust premises for Annette Bower for life, with remainder for such of the children of Annette Bower as should attain twenty-one or marry.

Annette Bower had six children, all of whom attained twenty-one.

In 1877 one of these six children mortgaged his reversionary share in the trust premises to the plaintiff. On the 18th of July, 1881, the defendant Uppleby invested a sum of £1,300, part of the trust funds, on a mortgage in fee of real estate consisting of a number of cottages, some of which were not finished at the time, and the rest of which were let at weekly rents to dock labourers. The property in question had been valued by a local valuer at a sum of £1,750. On the 10th of November, 1883, the plaintiff purchased the equity of redemption of his mortgagor's share in the trust premises. On the 15th of November, 1884, the defendant Uppleby retired from the trusts of the will, and, under a power in that behalf contained in the will, two new trustees were appointed, and the mortgage investment of the £1,300 was transferred to them.

On the 17th of November, 1884, some of the cestuis que trusts of the trust premises released the defendant Uppleby from all claims in respect of the trust estate and covenanted to indemnify Uppleby against all cost he might incur on account of any acts or proceedings in relation to the trusts. On the 19th of April, 1887, the solicitor of the new trustees wrote to the solicitor of the plaintiff that the £1,300 mortgage had proved a bad security, and that the trustees proposed to sell the same unless the plaintiff's solicitor could suggest some other course, and the plaintiff's solicitor replied on the 22nd of April, "As we presume there is no prospect of the property in question improving in value, we presume the best course will be to offer it for sale by public auction." On the 14th of May, 1887, the mortgaged property in which the £1,300 had been invested was sold by auction by the new trustees, under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, and realized only £840, leaving £820 net after deducting the costs of sale. The defendant Uppleby, the former trustee, had no notice given him as to this sale.

In February, 1888, this action was instituted.

The defendant Uppleby served a third-party notice claiming indemnity against the cestuis que trusts who had executed the deed of release of the 17th of November, 1884, and the third parties entered an appearance and denied such liability. On the 1st of May, 1888, Stirling, J., made an order on a summons for directions taken out by the defendant Uppleby that the third parties should be at liberty to put in a defence, and that the question of indemnity should be dealt with at, but immediately after, the trial of the action, and that the third parties should be at liberty to appear at the trial and take such part therein as the judge might think proper, and also to apply generally as there might be occasion.

The action was transferred for trial to Kekewich, J., and was tried on the 22nd and 23rd of February, 1889.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the action, on the ground that the plaintiff was a party to the sale of the mortgaged premises made by the new trustees in 1887, and that the plaintiff could not call on the defendant, the former trustee, to make good the loss realized by the sale, when the former trustee had not, previously to the sale, been given the option of taking the property himself and making good the £1,300 to the trust estate.

The plaintiff appealed.

May 13, 1889.—On the appeal being opened,

Warmington, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant Uppleby, took the preliminary objection that the appellant had not served the third parties with notice of the appeal.

They referred to ord. 58, r. 2.*

S. Hall, Q.C., and P. Stokes, for the appellant, contended that it was not the duty of the plaintiff as appellant to serve the third parties with notice of the appeal.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The defendant in this action brought in third parties on the ground that he claimed to be entitled to indemnity from them, and he desired that the liability of the third parties to him might be tried at the same time as the question between him and the plaintiff, so that if he were made liable to the plaintiff he might insist on his rights against the third parties.

I cannot quite agree with what Kekewich, J., is stated to have done at the trial of the action. It is stated that he refused to allow counsel for the third parties to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses, and that he said he would try the case as between the plaintiff and the defendant first, and as between the defendant and the third parties afterwards. If the learned judge meant that he would try the question of the liability of the defendant to the plaintiff over again as between the defendant and the third parties, he was, in my opinion, going contrary to the theory and the intention of the Judicature Act and the third-party rules. However, in the result he gave judgment for the defendant as against the plaintiff, and if that judgment stands the third parties will be relieved from liability. But the plaintiff has appealed, and if, on the appeal, the plaintiff should succeed, the original question as to indemnity will arise again between the defendant and the third parties. The position of the third parties therefore may be that the case would have to be tried all over again, and thus the position of the third parties may be less favourable than it was before the appeal. In that sense, therefore, the third parties are interested in the appeal.

When the appeal was opened, however, the defendant

* Ord. 58, r. 2.—"The notice of appeal shall be served upon all parties directly affected by the appeal, and it shall not be necessary to serve parties not so affected; but the Court of Appeal may direct notice of the appeal to be served on all or any of the parties to the action or other proceeding, or upon any person not a party, and in the meantime may postpone the hearing of the appeal on such terms as may be just . . ."

takes the preliminary objection that the third parties had not been served with notice of the appeal by the plaintiff. What is the position of the plaintiff? He cares nothing about the claim of the defendant against the third parties, that is wholly immaterial to him. Yet, as the plaintiff is the appellant, and as the third parties are interested in the appeal, it may be that the appellant should bring in all persons interested in the appeal, and the defendant says that the plaintiff ought to have served the third parties with notice of the appeal, although not himself interested in the third party claim. The question depends on the right construction of ord. 58, r. 2. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] Having regard to the rule immediately preceding—viz., rule 1 of the same order—I think that in every case under rule 2 the appellant is the person who ought to serve the notice of appeal. But the rule does not say the notice is to be served on all parties affected by the appeal; it is only to be served on all parties "directly affected."

Now, it must be remembered that this rule applies to the Queen's Bench Division as well as the Chancery Division, and, therefore, does not depend solely on the former practice of the Court of Chancery, but it is to govern appeals from both divisions of the High Court.

Now, in common law courts there never could have been such a thing as the introduction of a third party. I think the rule must be construed according to the words used in it, and ought not to be construed as if the word "directly" were struck out and then applying the old rule of practice in chancery, under which all parties interested were served.

I cannot think that a third party, brought in on the ground that he has undertaken to indemnify the defendant, can be properly said to be "directly affected" within the meaning of this rule. The appeal, if successful, would not determine the whole case against him, but only one point in the case.

I have, therefore, though with some doubt, come to the conclusion that the third parties are not, and never can be, "directly affected" by the appeal, and, consequently, that the preliminary objection taken by the defendant fails.

I think, however, that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, ought not to hear this appeal without the presence of the third parties. The plaintiff does not want the third parties here, and therefore it was the defendant—who does want them—that ought to have applied to the Court of Appeal under the latter part of the rule for leave to serve them with notice of the appeal. If the defendant should now make such application, the court will be ready to assist him, but as the defendant, for his own purposes, asks for that which is wholly immaterial to the plaintiff, and solely for the benefit of the defendant, he must pay the costs of the adjournment.

COTTON, L.J.—I differ from the Master of the Rolls, except on the point that the third parties ought to be present when this appeal is argued and decided. It is necessary, in order to carry out the intention of the third-party rules, that the third parties should be present when the court decides, if it should so decide, that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff.

The defendant is said to be liable to the plaintiff for a breach of trust; the defendant denies his liability, but says that if he is liable, the third parties have agreed to indemnify him. The third parties having been summoned, an order was made, on the application of the defendant for directions, "that the third parties be at liberty to appear at the trial." What is meant by "at the trial"? It must mean the trial of the question between the plaintiff and the defendant. It is said that Kekewich, J., refused to allow the counsel for the third parties to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses. If counsel for the third parties desired to cross-examine the witnesses on the question of indemnity, which was to be tried afterwards between the defendant and the third parties, I think the judge was right in refusing to allow it. But Kekewich, J., seems to have made use of some expressions which might be construed to mean that he should try the whole case over again between the third parties and the defendant. That would defeat the intention of the third-party rules, and I think, therefore, that the learned judge must have been misunderstood, and that what he meant was this, "When the question of the liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is settled, then I must decide the question of the liability of the third parties to the defendant." The third parties had liberty to appear at the trial, and if they desired to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses on the question whether the defendant was liable to the plaintiff, they were, in my opinion, entitled to do so, and Kekewich, J., would have been wrong in refusing to allow them to do that. I do not think, however, that the learned judge intended to do that.

Then as to the question of the service of the notice of appeal. The third parties were present at the trial. The rules, however, contain no direction as to the defendant serving the third party with notice of the trial between the plaintiff and the defendant.

It is the duty of the plaintiff, however, to make his action perfect for trial, and it is his duty to serve all persons who ought to be present at the trial. The plaintiff was not successful at the trial, and he has appealed. The judgment at the trial entirely swept away the case of the plaintiff against the defendant, and with it the case of the defendant against the third parties. On the hearing of the appeal (subject to the rule of the court as to hearing only two counsel on each side) the counsel for the third parties must have the same right, to bring forward any point in favour of the defendant as against the plaintiff, as he would have had at the trial. Who is to see that all persons should appear on the hearing of the appeal? It is the duty of the appellant—in this case the plaintiff—to make his appeal perfect as regards parties, and there being no rule to require a respondent to serve a third party with notice of an appeal, I think it is the duty of the appellant to do so.

I doubt whether rule 2 of order 58 refers to the case of third parties at all. The third-party procedure was new in both divisions of the court, and if I am right in thinking that rule 2 does not apply, then in the absence of any rule we must be guided by this principle—that it is the duty of an appellant to bring before the court those who are necessary to make his appeal perfect. But even if rule 2 of order 58 does apply to third parties, still I think that the third party is "directly" affected by the appeal, for the judgment of the court below has destroyed all foundation for the claim of the defendant against him, and the appeal may possibly restore it. The Court of Appeal ought not to decide the question of indemnity, as it has never yet been tried, but it may send it back to the judge below to be tried.

As regards the costs caused by this objection I think they ought to depend on the result of the appeal.

FRY, L.J.—On this appeal the defendant raises the preliminary objection that the appellant—the plaintiff—has not served the third parties with notice of the appeal. Now are the third parties, within rule 2, order 58, persons "directly affected" by the appeal? Two questions arise in this action. First, whether the defendant is liable to the plaintiff; and secondly, if so, whether the defendant has a right over against the third parties for contribution or indemnity. It is only when both these questions are answered in the affirmative that the third parties become liable. The question of the original liability of the defendant to the plaintiff affects the third parties only through the intervention of the right over; it is only through the intervention of the right over that the first question becomes material to the third parties. Therefore, I think the third parties are only indirectly affected by the appeal. The language of rule 2, order 58, is emphatic; it not only says that the notice of appeal is to be served on all parties directly affected by the appeal, but it adds that it "shall not be necessary to serve parties not so affected"; it also provides that "the Court of Appeal may direct notice of the appeal to be served on all or any parties to the action or other proceeding, or upon any person not a party." I think the proper course was for the plaintiff to serve with notice of the appeal the defendant, who was directly affected by the appeal, and then the defendant, if he wished to preserve his rights over against third parties, should apply to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve them.

The scheme of the rules appears to me to be to make proceedings against third parties independent proceedings in which the defendant is really to be the actor. It is he who serves the third parties, obtains judgment, and gets execution against them.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the preliminary objection fails; but if the defendant desires to have the third parties here, the appeal will stand over, he paying the cost of the adjournment.

At the request of the defendant Uppleby's counsel, the appeal stood over to allow the defendant to serve notice of the appeal on the third parties, and it came on for hearing again on the 18th and 19th of June, 1889.

Hall, Q.C., and P. Stokes, for the plaintiff, the appellant.

Warmington, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant Uppleby.

Desimus Sturges, for the third parties.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments.

The following cases were referred to on behalf of the appellant:—Macleod v. Annesley, 1 W. R. 250, 16 Beav. 600; Fry v. Tapson, 33 W. R. 113, 28 Ch. D. 268; Smithurst v. Hastings, 33 W. R. 496, 30 Ch. D. 490; Olive v. Westermann, 34 Ch. D. 70, 35 W. R. Dig. 213; Life Association of Scotland v. Siddall, 9 W. R. 541, 3 De G. F. & J. 58; Francis v. Francis, 5 De G. M. & G. 108; Knott v. Cottee, 16 Beav. 77; and Ex parte Norris, 17 W. R. 452, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 280.

For the defendant, Thornton v. Stokill, 1 Jur. N. S. 751, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 101; Mant v. Leith, 15 Beav. 524; and In re Godfrey, 23 Ch. D. 483, 31 W. R. Dig. 205, were relied on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of Kekewich, J., dismissing an action brought against Uppleby, a former trustee of the will of Eliza Salmon, to make him responsible for an improper investment.

There are two questions to be considered. The first is, whether the investment in question was wrongful. The investment was an investment of part of the testatrix's property on a mortgage of freehold estate, and an investment of that kind was authorized by the terms of the trust; so far, therefore, it was in accordance with the terms of the trust, and if the trustee took the ordinary precautions as to the sufficiency of the investment there would be no breach of trust, even though the investment ultimately proved insufficient. The case, therefore, differs from that of an investment not within the terms of the instrument, which is, of itself, necessarily a breach of trust. The only question we have to consider is whether Uppleby took proper care in seeing to the sufficiency of the security.

As regards the rule, which has been much discussed, as to the amount which may be lent on a given security, I cannot do better than read what was said by Lord Watson as to that, in Learoyd v. Whiteley, 36 W. R. 721, 12 App. Cas., p. 733: "As a general rule, the law requires of a trustee no higher degree of diligence in the execution of his office than a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own private affairs. Yet he is not allowed the same discretion in investing the moneys of the trust as if he were a person sui juris dealing with his own estate. Business men of ordinary prudence may, and frequently do, select investments which are more or less of a speculative character, but it is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to the class of investments which are permitted by the trust, and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard. So, so long as he acts in the honest observance of these limitations, the general rule already stated will apply. The courts of equity in England have indicated and given effect to certain general principles for the guidance of trustees in lending money upon the security of real estate. Thus it has been laid down that in the case of ordinary agricultural land the margin ought not to be less than one-third of its value; whereas in cases where the subject of the security derives its value from buildings erected upon the land, or its use for trade purposes, the margin ought not to be less than one-half. I do not think these have been laid down as hard and fast limits up to which the trustees will be invariably safe, and beyond which they can never be in safety to lend, but as indicating the lowest margins which in ordinary circumstances a careful investor of trust funds ought to accept."

That statement recognizes the rule—which has been impeached by Mr. Warmington and Mr. Wood—as to the amount which ought to be advanced, primâ facie, on agricultural land and on buildings respectively. In the present case the value of the property was mainly derived from buildings. I do not think the valuation of the property has been successfully impeached. The valuation was £1,750, and the amount advanced on the property by the trustees was £1,300. Now, we must have regard, not only to the value of the property and the amount advanced, but we must also consider the nature of the property. It consisted of small house property occupied by small weekly tenants attracted there by the labour at the docks at Hull. In my opinion it certainly was not a prudent act of the trustee to lend £1,300 on property only valued at £1,750 when much of that value depended on the fact of labourers being employed in that part of Hull and living there. The investment, therefore, in my opinion, was not a proper investment.

The second point raised is new, and no authority is to be found on it. It was contended that, as the plaintiff was cognizant of, and took part in, the sale of the mortgaged property by the new trustees, he could not call on the former trustee to make good any deficiency arising, because he did not give that trustee the opportunity of taking the mortgaged property for himself and paying the trust fund the amount lent on it.

If that be the law, the former trustee is not liable. But there is a fallacy in this argument; it is founded on treating the mortgage as not being part of the trust estate. In my opinion, however, that view is wrong. The money was invested according to the terms of the trust, though without due care, and the mortgage was from the first a part of the trust estate; then the former trustee handed over this investment so made, to the new trustees to be held upon the trusts of the will, but, unless their acceptance of it exonerated the old trustee from his liability for taking an insufficient security, I do not see how he was exonerated from the consequences of his neglect of duty.

The case is entirely distinct from that of an investment unauthorized by the terms of the trust, which the cestuis que trustis must accept or reject, and which could only be rejected when the cestuis que trustis ascertained the circumstances under which the investment was made. The realization of the property was merely a carrying out of the authority handed over by the former trustee to the new trustees in respect of this mortgaged property.

It is like a sale of mortgaged property by the mortgagee under a power, without the concurrence of the mortgagor. If the sale is improperly made, it may be impeached, but the mortgagor is bound by it if made with reasonable prudence, and is answerable for what remains due on the mortgage after deducting the proceeds of sale.

In my opinion in this case the former trustee handed over what was really trust property to the new trustees, with this power of sale, and therefore no duty arose in the cestuis que trustis to say whether they would accept or reject it, and the former trustee is liable for the deficiency.

Thornton v. Stokill was referred to in support of the case of the former trustee. In that case a testator, who had been a trustee, had invested part of the trust funds in buying cottage property, which was entirely outside the scope of his power of investment. The cestuis que trustis wanted to take the cottage property at a certain sum and prove against the estate for the residue of the trust funds. Lord Hatherley held that they had a claim to the houses as against general creditors, but that they had no right to set a value on them and then prove for the deficiency. That case has no bearing on the present case.

In my opinion the former trustee remained liable for the deficiency, though no notice was given to him by the cestuis que trustis that they would hold him liable.

Again, the plaintiff is not open to the objection raised against him that he directed a sale. He did not, in fact, direct a sale. The trustees referred to him, and he merely said he could not suggest anything better than a sale by auction. He was merely passive. I cannot, therefore, agree with the view taken by Kekewich, J., and there must be a decree against the former trustee for the loss occasioned to the plaintiff by this improper investment.

FRY, L.J.—I have been requested by Bowen, L.J., to deliver judgment before him.

The first question we have to consider is whether the investment was proper? whether it was one which a prudent man would make? I am of opinion that it was improper. A trustee who disregards the well-known rules of court as to the amount which may be lent on mortgage of a property—though they are not hard and fast rules—takes upon himself a considerable amount of risk.

The investment here was in cottage property, and the trustee invested on mortgage of it more than two-thirds of its value, as ascertained by his own valuer. Again, the character of the property was such that it depended for its value on shifting circumstances—e.g., the character of trade in the locality; and the fact that at the time of the mortgage some of the houses were unfinished and unlet strongly corroborates the view that the investment was improvident.

The second question is whether the plaintiff has in any way lost his primâ facie right to call on the defendant to make good the loss.

Two arguments were brought forward to show that he had. First, that the plaintiff had become a purchaser of the interest of one of the cestuis que trustis with full knowledge of the investment, and, therefore, could not impeach it. The facts hardly support this argument. The plaintiff was a mortgagee before the investment was made, and he only bought the equity of redemption afterwards, and the only information he had even then was that contained in the letter of the 30th of January, 1883, which only told him what the trust funds were then invested in, and which gave him no reason for questioning the propriety of the investment. I think, therefore, there is no reason for holding that, on this ground, the plaintiff is deprived of any right he had.

Secondly, it is urged that the plaintiff was a party to the sale, and that he concurred in the sale of April, 1887. I do not think he did anything of the sort. What took place was this: the solicitor of the new trustees informed the plaintiff's solicitor of their intention to offer the property for sale, and, on the 19th of April, wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor that they would do so "unless you can suggest some other course"; and to this the plaintiff's solicitor replies:—"As we presume there is no prospect of the property in question improving in value, we presume the best course will be to offer it for sale by public auction." There is nothing in that; the plaintiff was not a person who was bound to concur or who was asked to concur in the sale, and what was done merely amounted to a consultation between the solicitors, and did not make the plaintiff in any way a party to the sale. The substratum on which the judgment of the learned judge was based is, therefore, erroneous.

But then it is said that the conduct of the new trustees has released the former trustee from his liability, because, as it is urged, a return—or an offer of return—of the property to the former trustee, who had improperly invested upon it, is a sine qua non if it be sought to make him liable for the investment. In my opinion, however, a defaulting trustee has no such right, nor can the right of the cestuis que trustis be lost in that way. I think that the liability of the defaulting trustee is to make good the loss sustained by the improper investment. How that is to be made good depends on the circumstances of each particular case.

In some cases justice will be best done by realising the security and making him pay the deficiency; but in some cases it may be right to make him pay at once the full amount and let him take the benefit of the security; but there is no general principle as to a preliminary condition for relief.

In the present case all the new trustees did was this. The former trustee had lent on a mortgage which contained a power of sale. On his retirement he transferred that mortgage to the new trustees, who afterwards exercised the power of sale. How can it be said that they thereby debarred the cestuis que trustis from claiming relief against the former trustee? They sold under the power which the former trustee had himself given them by transferring the security to them.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not propose to add anything as to the law of the case, because I am of opinion that the question of law decided by Kekewich, J., does not arise at all. I do not see that there is any evidence that the plaintiff directed the sale or did anything more than merely stand by.

I do not, however, differ from anything said as to the law by the Lords Justices, but I am myself clearly of opinion that the question of law does not arise.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. Hocombe.

Solicitors for the defendant Uppleby, Hicks & Son, for Brown & Son, Barton-on-Humber.

Solicitors for the new trustees and the beneficiaries, T. H. Bird, for H. C. Lisle, Nantwich.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 21.

GLASSCOCK v. BALLS. (a.)

Promissory note—Discharge—Indorsement—Bonâ fide holder for value.

The defendant gave W. a promissory note as security for a debt due by him to W. He subsequently gave W. a collateral security for the same debt, which W. transferred for value. W. subsequently indorsed the promissory note to the plaintiff, who had no notice of the collateral security, to secure a debt due from W. to the plaintiff.

Held, that the note was not discharged, and that the plaintiff was a bonâ fide holder for value entitled to sue the defendant on the note.

Appeal from the decision of Lord Coleridge, C.J.

The action was brought upon a promissory note for £239 9s. 9d., made by the defendant on the 11th of October, 1882, in favour of one Ephraim Wayman or order, and indorsed by Wayman to the plaintiff.

It appeared that in May, 1883, the defendant was indebted to Wayman to the extent of £641 11s. 9d., as security for part of which sum Wayman held this promissory note. He, however, required further security, and the defendant, on the 11th of May, executed a mortgage to him of certain property as a security for the whole debt, which by the mortgage deed he also covenanted to pay. A memorandum was made stating that the mortgage was an extra security for the amount of the promissory note.

On the 12th of May, 1883, Wayman transferred by a statutory transfer, this mortgage to a man named Hall for £700, which was then paid to him by Hall.

In 1884 Wayman was indebted to the plaintiff to the extent of £200, and on the 6th of May he indorsed the promissory note to him as security for this debt. Subsequently Wayman paid the plaintiff £60, and the present action was brought to recover the balance of £140.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, for the appellant.—The payment by Hall on the transfer of the mortgage to him, extinguished the note. Therefore, although the plaintiff is a bonâ fide holder, the note cannot be sued upon. The indorsement to the plaintiff by Wayman was really a reissue of the note, and could pass no title to sue: Freakley v. Fox, 9 B. & C. 130; Bartrum v. Caddy, 9 Ad. & E. 275.

He also cited Roberts v. Eden, 1 B. & P. 398; Beck v. Robley, 1 Hy. Bl. 89n; Thorogood v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 351; Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 86 (3).

Horace Browne, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff sues as the indorsee of a promissory note made by the defendant and payable on demand. It is admitted that the plaintiff was a bonâ fide indorsee for value without notice of anything that had occurred. At the trial it was said that he must be taken to have had notice, because he was suing on a note which he had taken when it was overdue. The note, however, is not shown to have been overdue. It is not shown that payment of it was ever demanded, and the law is clear that such a note is not to be treated as overdue merely because it is a note to pay on demand and bears date some time back. Under these circumstances, therefore, primâ facie the indorsee is entitled to recover against the maker of the note, and in order to escape this primâ facie liability the defendant must bring himself within some recognised principle of law which would prevent the plaintiff from suing. No doubt it has been held that where the maker of a note has paid it and it has come back into his hands, and he reissues it, a bonâ fide indorsee for value cannot sue on the note so reissued. But that does not rest on any merits on the part of the defendant. It rests entirely on the provisions of the Stamp Acts. The provisions of those Acts were evaded by the reissue of the note. The effect of that reissue was as if it had been issued without a stamp, and, therefore, it was no longer a negotiable instrument and did not pass by indorsement. The defence raised there, therefore, only turned on the Stamp Acts. The principle so laid down would only be applicable if there were a reissue of the note, and there can be no reissue unless the note comes back into the power and control of the maker of the note. It might be sufficient if it came into the hands of the agent or servant of the maker, but it must, in order to be reissued, come into the maker's power or control. If the note is still current, even though it has been paid, there is nothing to prevent a bonâ fide indorsee for value from suing upon it. In this case there is nothing which could amount to a plea of payment.

It is said that, although the note had not been paid, it had been extinguished. I cannot understand that suggestion. I think, therefore, that the defendant fails to bring himself within the ratio decidendi of Bartrum v. Caddy, and that, therefore, he is liable to a bonâ fide holder for value. I think, therefore, that the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case there seems to me to be, on the facts, no defence, either at law or in equity. It is true that the defendant gave Wayman a collateral security for his debt in May, 1883; but the memorandum that was then made prevented any merger from taking place. That mortgage has never been realized. It certainly was not realized by the transfer to Hall, and therefore, in no sense of the word, has there been any payment of this promissory note. No doubt, as between the defendant and Wayman, the latter could not effectively sue the former upon the note, because, by the transfer to Hall, he had parted with all his interest in the defendant's debt to him. The only capacity in which he could sue on the note would, I think, be in that of trustee for Hall, and he might be restrained from suing in any other capacity. In my opinion, the decision of the Lord Chief Justice is perfectly right, and must be affirmed.

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, F. & T. Smith & Sons, for W. Peed, Cambridge.

Solicitors for the respondent, Torr, Janeways, Gribble, & Oddie, for Lyon, Cambridge.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From Prob. Div. and Adm. Div. July 10, 1889.

"THE CALLIOPE." (a.)

Ship—Damage—Negligence of wharfowner—Obstruction in bed of river leading to wharf.

It is the duty of wharfowners to keep the frontage of their wharf, over which vessels must necessarily pass in order to lie at their wharf, in a reasonably safe condition, or to warn vessels using the wharf of its danger.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the decision of Butt, J.

The ship Calliope, which was the property of the plaintiffs, was chartered by the Decido Iron Ore Co. to load a cargo of iron ore and take it to Newport, Mon., and deliver it when and as directed by the consignees or their agents. By the bill of lading, which incorporated all the conditions of the charter-party, the cargo was to be delivered to the Decido Iron Ore Co. or their assigns. They indorsed the bill to the defendants, who were the owners of a wharf on the River Usk at Newport and the leaseholders of the part of the river fronting the wharf.

On the arrival of The Calliope at Newport on the 29th of May, 1886, the defendants ordered her to their wharf to discharge her cargo. The captain was, however, informed that there would not be sufficient water to reach the wharf, and delayed till the 31st of May, when he was directed by a man named Griffith at the wharf that he could bring the vessel in with safety. He then endeavoured to bring The Calliope alongside, but she grounded on a ridge of mud, which had been raised between the two berths at the wharf by the action of vessels lying in the berths, and sustained serious damage, for which this action was brought.

Butt, J., gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., and Robson, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants were liable as wharfingers to have the approaches to their wharf in a safe condition: The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 439, 14 P. D. 64.

Finlay, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.—The Moorcock only referred to the actual place in which a ship lies, and not to the approaches to it.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the action is an action of negligence, and not merely one for misrepresentation by a person for whom the defendants are responsible. It is necessary, therefore, for the plaintiffs to establish a duty on the part of the defendants and a breach of that duty. The defendants, who were the assignees of the bill of lading, ordered The Calliope to go to their wharf. If they had ordered her to go to a place to which she could not get they would have been liable to pay demurrage, but they ordered her to go to their wharf. They were leaseholders of the bed of the river in front of the wharf. The frontage of a wharf which is necessary to a wharf consists of that part of the river through which vessels must necessarily come to the wharf, and of the space in which they lie. In this case there were two berths at the wharf, one close against the side and another outside it. The part between those two berths was necessarily part of the frontage of the wharf. The question then arises as to what is the duty of the owner of the wharf with regard to such frontage. In the case of The Moorcock we held that a wharfinger must take care that the front of his wharf is reasonably safe, or that he must warn persons using it that it is unsafe. This case is stronger than The Moorcock, because in this case the ship was bound by contract to go to the defendants' wharf. In my opinion the duty of the wharfinger extends, not only to the place close to the wharf, but to places over which the vessel must necessarily go to get into the berth at the wharf, and for these reasons I think that the defendants are liable for the damage caused to The Calliope, and that the appeal must be allowed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the part of the bed of the river on which The Calliope grounded must be treated as a portion of the frontage of the wharf, and, therefore, that the defendants had a duty towards people using their wharf to keep it in a safe condition, or to warn persons using it of their danger. The accident happened in consequence of a breach of this duty, and the defendants are therefore liable.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I entirely agree. I think Butt, J., failed to attribute sufficient weight to the fact that the vessel grounded on part of the bed of the river which was leased by the defendants. That part of the bed was liable, as the defendants knew, to become uneven from the action of vessels lying in the berths on either side of it, and it was their duty to remove the inequality thus caused.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Downing, Holman, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pritchard & Son.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } May 3; June 5, 1889.

In re THURSO NEW GAS CO. (a.)

Company—Voluntary winding up—Right to damages established against company before winding up—Right of creditor to assert the same as against other creditors—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 133, 163.

Section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides that, on the voluntary winding up of a company, its property shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, has the effect of disentitling a person who has established a right to damages against the company, but has not enforced it by execution, before the date of the winding up, from obtaining priority over the creditors of the company, although, under section 163 of the Act, proceedings to recover such damages against the estate and effects of the company would not be void, that section applying only to the case of a company being wound up by the court, or subject to its supervision.

Adjourned summons.

The company had its registered office in England, but carried on its business at Thurso, in Scotland. In June, 1887, the widow and children of a man who had been killed in the company's employment brought an action in Scotland against the company for damages. In August the company passed a resolution for a voluntary winding up and appointed liquidators. In October the plaintiffs took proceedings in Scotland, by letters of inhibition, to restrain the company from disposing of their real estate to the prejudice of their claim, whereupon the liquidators gave them notice of the winding-up resolution, but the action was proceeded with, and a verdict was given for £850 damages, which was enforced by judgment in January, 1888. In April 1888, letters of arrestment, which had the effect of a writ of attachment, were issued against the company's personal estate in Scotland to prevent the debtors of the company from paying their debts to the liquidators. In June a petition was presented for winding up the company, on which an order was made continuing the winding up under the supervision of the court. The plaintiffs' costs in their action had been ascertained at £138 2s. 5d. There were two summonses before the court—one by the plaintiffs in the Scotch action for a declaration that they had a paramount charge on the estate and debts of the company both for the £850 and the £138 2s. 5d.; the other by the liquidators to restrain the plaintiffs from enforcing the inhibition and arrest ment, and from preventing the liquidators from getting in the property and debts of the company in Scotland.

(a.) Reported by H. F. AMBRIDGE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Renshaw, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the liquidators.—Although a voluntary winding up is not included in section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, section 133 has the effect of bringing a voluntary winding up within the principle of section 163. The proceedings on the judgment in the Scotch action are therefore void.

They referred to Thomas v. Patent Lionite Co., 29 W. R. 596, 17 Ch. D. 250; Buckley, 5th ed., p. 374.

Martin, Q.C., and Birrell, for the plaintiffs in the Scotch action.—Section 163 does not apply; therefore, a creditor may enforce his rights against the company at any time before a winding-up or supervision order. The liquidators should have applied before we obtained the letters of inhibition and arrestment, and we ought now to be allowed to proceed: Parry's case, 12 W. R. 139, 4 De G. J. & S. 63; In re Exhall Mining Co., 12 W. R. 727, 4 De G. J. & S. 377; In re London Cotton Co., 14 W. R. 575, L. R. 2 Eq. 53; Budow v. Great Britain Society, 29 W. R. 585, 17 Ch. D. 600. [Kay, J., referred to In re Hull Forge Co., 15 W. R. 474, and In re Sablonière Hotel Co., 15 W. R. 85, L. R. 3 Eq. 74.] At any rate, our costs should be paid in full out of the assets: Bailey and Leetham's case, 17 W. R. 1079, L. R. 8 Eq. 94; Ex parte Smith, L. R. 3 Ch. 128; In re Dominion and Canada Plumbago Co., 32 W. R. 425, 27 Ch. D. 33.

Kay, J.—It seems to me that the only result the court can come to upon the Act is simple and clear. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] I have now before me two summonses, one was taken out on the 21st of November, 1888, by the plaintiffs in the Scotch action, asking, in effect, for leave to proceed with the action, the necessity for the application arising from the provisions of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, which says that "where any company is being wound up by the court, or subject to the supervision of the court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents."

Now, the commencement of the winding up of this company was, as I have said, on the 22nd of August, 1887, therefore the letters of inhibition of the 17th of October, 1887, and the letters of arrestment of the 20th of April, 1888, if they are within the words of the section, are "void to all intents." But, notwithstanding that section, it has been held that, under section 87 the court has power to give leave to continue proceedings which were pending at the commencement of the winding up, and that is the reason why this summons was taken out by the plaintiffs in the action.

Is it within the scheme of the Act that the plaintiffs should be allowed to continue their proceedings? Of course the object of the plaintiffs in making this application is to get a priority over every other creditor of the company for their judgment debt and costs. Now, the Act says, in so many words in section 133, "The following consequences shall ensue upon the voluntary winding up of a company: (1) The property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu." If, therefore, the court were, in the exercise of its discretion, simply to permit this action to proceed and execution to be levied, it would be giving to these creditors, the plaintiffs, a priority over other creditors which section 133 says expressly shall not be given. It appears that no proceeding in the nature of execution was taken, no judgment was obtained, and no verdict was obtained against this company by the plaintiffs, until after the actual commencement of the winding up, therefore, primâ facie, the scheme of the Act makes it improper that these creditors should have priority. No doubt there are many circumstances which would induce the court not to exercise its discretion by interfering with proceedings continued after the commencement of a winding up, for instance, where there has been great delay or negligence on the part of the company in allowing the proceedings to go on, the court might say it was unreasonable to stay the proceedings, and that it was too late to interfere, or where, in an action for debt, execution had been actually obtained, the court would not, in the exercise of its discretion, interfere. This, however, is not an action for debt, but for damages.

The question whether any damages were payable, and, if so, to what amount, was eminently a question to be determined by a court. Therefore it is quite proper that the action should go on; and if an application were made by the liquidators to stay the action the court would say, "No; it is proper that the action should be tried." But the question whether the court would allow the creditors, the plaintiffs in the action, priority for the fruits of their judgment would be another question. It seems to me that there is no reason why I should stay the action itself, which was a most proper and convenient mode of ascertaining whether damages should be obtained, and, if so, what. This is not a case in which I can say that any creditor of the company has been guilty of negligence in not applying to the court to stay the proceedings. The supervision order, which was made on the 16th of June, 1888, made all proceedings subsequently taken absolutely void, subject only to the power of the court, under section 87, to allow the proceedings to go on. There does not appear to me to be any sufficient reason to induce me to give the plaintiffs priority over other creditors in the face of section 133, which says that, as a consequence of a voluntary winding up, the property of the company shall be applied in payment of its liabilities pari passu.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that this is a case in which, in the exercise of the discretion given to the court, I ought not to allow these creditors to obtain priority over the other creditors, or to disturb the imperative rule laid down by section 133.

Then it is said that, whatever the case may be as to the damages, the plaintiffs are entitled to have their costs of the action paid in full. All the cases upon this point are referred to by Mr. Buckley in his work on the Companies Acts, 5th ed., p. 229, where they are summed up as follows:—"The intention of the Act, where there is a resolution passed to wind up voluntarily, is (section 133) that all the creditors shall be paid pari passu, and the court will therefore interfere by injunction to restrain one creditor from seizing an undue share of the assets for his own benefit. And if a creditor commence or proceed with an action for his debt after the winding up commences, he can at most only add his costs to his debt." Then the authorities are stated in a note. That appears to me to be the rule I must follow in this case—namely, that the plaintiffs must add the costs of the action to their debt.

One of the authorities cited to me on behalf of the plaintiffs was Parry's case, in which not only was the action begun before the winding up, but judgment was obtained in the action, execution was issued, and the sheriff went into possession and was about to sell, all before the presentation of the petition to wind up; and on those grounds it was held that the execution creditor ought not to be deprived of the fruits of his execution, because, as it was said, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would take the state of circumstances into consideration.

In Smith, Fleming, & Co.'s case, 15 W. R. 78, L. R. 1 Ch. 538, Turner, L.J., said:—"The main purpose of the Act, as I understand it, is the collection and distribution of the assets of companies for the general benefit of their creditors, and amongst the creditors pari passu; and this discretion of the court ought, therefore, as I think, to be exercised not for the benefit of any particular creditor or creditors, but for the benefit of the general body of creditors interested under the Act." The case which I think is nearest to the present is In re Sablonière Hotel Co., before Stuart, V.C., where a resolution was passed for a voluntary winding up, and was confirmed on the 28th of August, 1865, and on the same day a creditor commenced an action against the company to recover his debt, and obtained judgment. An application was made to restrain him from proceeding under that judgment. Stuart, V.C., said the "question is whether, having regard to the fact that this is only a voluntary winding up, the court will, in its discretion, interfere. By section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Legislature declares that the effect of a resolution to wind up a company voluntarily shall be that all the creditors shall be paid pari passu. Therefore, after the resolution is passed and confirmed, each of the creditors is entitled to a proportionate share of the assets. But to allow one creditor to seize the whole, or an undue share, of the assets of the company for his own benefit, would be in effect to render nugatory the provisions of the statute. The execution must, therefore, be restrained." With every word of that I entirely agree; and that statement of the law has never been dissented from. It appears to me to express precisely what I understand to be the meaning of the statute; it confirms the opinion I form on the case now before me, and it is an authority which I very readily follow.

Then, with regard to the other summons—the summons by the liquidators to restrain the plaintiffs from proceeding to enforce the inhibition and arrestment, and from preventing them, the liquidators, from getting in the property and debts of the company in Scotland—that comes within section 133, and the liquidators are entitled to an injunction unless the plaintiffs remove the obstacles they have imposed to the winding up of the company. I think the proper course is to make one order on both summonses, that, so far as the orders and proceedings in the Scotch action do interfere with the winding up, the plaintiffs shall do all in their power to enable the liquidators to get in the assets of the company in Scotland.

With regard to the costs of these applications, the costs of the plaintiffs are to be added to their debt, and the liquidators will take their costs out of the assets. The plaintiffs will have liberty to prove in the winding up for their debt and costs. The liquidators will, of course, have the carriage of the order.

Solicitors, Keeping & Gloag; Ridsdale & Son.

Chan. Div.)
Kekewich, J.) April 12, 15, 1889.

ABERGAVENNY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS v. STRAKER. (a.)

Market—Tolls—Penalties—Private Act—Disturbance—Ancient market—Modern market.

The Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners were by certain private Acts (incorporating the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847) authorized to set up a market and to take tolls for animals sold there, tolls and penalties being imposed on all persons selling such animals within the district, except in their own dwelling-houses or shops or premises in their own occupation.

The defendant, an auctioneer, held sales of such animals in a field in his own occupation.

Held, that this did not constitute a disturbance of the market, though it would have been otherwise but for the special Acts, as the defendant's conduct would have constituted a disturbance of an ancient market.

Trial of action.

By the Abergavenny Improvement Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. xlix.), which incorporated the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 14), except the 30th and 50th sections thereof, the Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners were empowered to hold markets and take tolls as therein mentioned.

By the Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, after conferring upon the undertakers power to open markets, it was enacted that "After the market-place or place for public fairs is opened for public use, every person other than a licensed hawker who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling-house or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorized to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

By the Abergavenny Improvement Act, 1871, which incorporated the Act of 1854, the commissioners were (by section 46) empowered to demand and take tolls in respect of the several articles mentioned in the schedule thereto. By the schedule tolls were authorized in respect of horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs sold in or brought for sale to the market therein mentioned.

By section 47 it was enacted as follows:—"If any person shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the town, except in or upon any premises in the occupation of such person, and in respect of which he is or is liable to be rated under the authority of the Improvement Acts, . . . in or upon any premises in the occupation of any other person, any articles in respect of which tolls, rents, or charges are by this Act authorized to be taken in any market, the commissioners may levy and take the same tolls, rents, and charges on all such articles as they might have levied and taken if the same had been sold or exposed for sale in such market."

By section 48 it was enacted that if any person liable to the payment of any toll did not pay the same when demanded, the commissioners might seize and detain all or any of the animals or articles in respect of which such toll was payable, and if the toll and charges were not paid within four days the commissioners might sell the articles seized.

By section 50 it was enacted as follows:—"The commissioners from time to time may grant licences to any person to use during fairs any public grounds, or any private grounds which such person may be authorized to use, other than premises in the occupation of such person and in respect of which he is liable to be rated under the authority of the Improvement Act, for any of the purposes following:—(1) for exhibitions or shows; (2) for public sales, whether by auction or otherwise."

The commissioners had held a market in Abergavenny on Tuesday in every week for the sale of horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs, and had constructed a proper place for holding the market.

In July, 1886, the defendant, James Straker, an auctioneer, in a field of his own at Abergavenny, constructed a market which he called "Mr. James Straker's Smithfield," or "New Smithfield," where sales of animals took place without any tolls being paid to the commissioners. The commissioners attempted to levy tolls in respect of these animals, but found it impossible to do so without a breach of the peace.

The commissioners therefore brought this action, claiming a declaration that "New Smithfield" was a disturbance of their market and an infringement on their rights. They also claimed an injunction and damages.

By his defence the defendant stated that he was rated in respect of his business and premises, and was therefore within the exception mentioned in the Abergavenny Improvement Act, 1871, s. 47, and alleged that no sales had taken place in his field except through his intervention. He further counter-claimed an injunction restraining the commissioners from demanding tolls or stating to his customers that they would be liable for tolls and penalties if they took stock to his field.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The commissioners had, on the 10th of September, 1886, laid an information and complaint before the justices against Straker, alleging that he had on another piece of land unlawfully sold sheep in respect of which tolls were by the Acts authorized to be taken in their market. The justices had dismissed the information and complaint; and on appeal to a divisional court by a special case the determination of the justices had, on the 23rd of March, 1887, been affirmed.

Ambrose, Q.C., Levett, and R. C. Glen, for the plaintiffs.—A market is in the nature of a franchise, and the right is not cut down by a regulating Act: Fearon v. Mitchell, L. R. 7 Q. B. 690, 21 W. R. Dig. 143. Here the Act has said that sheep and cattle may not be sold except in a man's own shop; and a man may not open a place where, whether he intends it or not, people can deal with one another, as that is a market: Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 32 W. R. 341, 25 Ch. D. 511: Elwes v. Payne, 27 W. R. 704, Ibid. Dig. 248, 12 Ch. D. 468. An injunction may lie even if the case does not come under the clause as to penalties.

Rigby, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and P. Baylis, for the defendant.—The case depends on statute: Mayor of Manchester v. Lyons, 22 Ch. D. 287, 31 W. R. Dig. 119. A common law right is not even alleged. The defendant's liability to tolls and penalties would not justify an action against him for disturbance. And he has been held by the Divisional Court not to be liable to tolls and penalties.

Ambrose, Q.C., in reply, referred to Mayor of Lichfield v. Simpson, 8 Q. B. 65; Couch v. Steel, 2 W. R. 170, 3 E. & B. 402.

Kekewich, J.—If this were the case of an ancient market, or of a modern market unrestricted by statutory provisions, I should certainly hold that the defendant had been guilty of the offence of disturbing the market, and on that ground was liable to an injunction. There are several passages in the judgments of the Court of Appeal in the case of Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway Co. which go that length. Elwes v. Payne goes to show that an auctioneer carrying on his business may, under certain circumstances, be doing that which constitutes a disturbance of a market. As against that it is said that this is not a modern market, but an ancient market. But it has been held more than once, particularly in Mayor of Manchester v. Lyons, that where you have the old franchise strengthened by statutory provision the privileges of the ancient franchise are gone, and you must look to the statutory provisions only; and, therefore, I regard this as for all purposes a modern market. The first point made by the defendant is that there is a remedy given to the plaintiffs under their Act, or in more than one of the Acts on the subject, and that having that one remedy pointed out by statute they have no other, and are not entitled to maintain an action for disturbing the market. To my mind, it is a serious question whether the rule stated in Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. v. Hawksford, 7 W. R. 464, and followed in other cases of the same class, would be applicable here, where there is no remedy given against disturbing the market, but where, if there is any remedy at all, it is only for tolls, or for penalties in lieu of tolls. I do not propose to say any more on that question, which would require a good deal of consideration if it had to be decided in this case, because it seems to me that I ought to deal with the case on another ground, and that a short and simple one.

Section 47 of the Act of 1871, which has been relied on for the defendant, must be construed by the light of the 50th section of the same statute. Those two sections, in conjunction with section 13 of the general Act, came before a Divisional Court, consisting of Mathew, J., and Cave, J., on a claim for penalties by these very Improvement Commissioners against this defendant Straker; and the substance of their judgment is that Straker, doing then what he is doing now, carrying on his business as an auctioneer, though not at that time in the same place, but in another place in the same way, was not liable to tolls or penalties under the Act. The question before them was whether he was liable to a penalty, and, perhaps unfortunately, as it was a claim for penalty, the matter could not be taken to the Court of Appeal. But both judges in giving judgment relied upon the exemption from penalty depending upon the exemption from toll. Both the learned judges gave judgment to that effect.

Now, if the plaintiffs are right in this action, being an action for disturbance of the market, the defendant is not liable either to toll or to a penalty for carrying on his business in this place called "New Smithfield"; the two must stand or fall together according to the judgment of the Divisional Court; and yet the very thing which the Act does not prohibit is to be made the subject of an action for the disturbance of the plaintiffs' market. It seems to me that it would be an absurd conclusion to say that this defendant is specially exempt from both tolls and penalties in order that he might be stopped altogether by an action. I could not construe the statute in that way without stultifying myself in any judicial decision on the statute; and accepting, as I, of course, do, without even inquiring whether it is right or wrong, the decision of the Divisional Court, I think I am bound to decide in favour of the defendant in this case.

Then the defendant has a counter-claim, which is to restrain an interference with his business, which I hold to be a legitimate business, and one that therefore ought not to be interfered with. It by no means follows that, because it is an interference which would justify an injunction, it would also justify damages being given. I do not think damages have been proved here. Certainly they are not capable of being assessed, because, although two of the witnesses have said that they have avoided going to the defendant's New Smithfield because they did not wish to be mixed up in law, still, it has not been brought down to a question of pounds, shillings, and pence; and it would be impossible to say that any particular amount of damage has been suffered. But I have it in evidence that these plaintiffs have endeavoured to divert persons from going to the defendant's New Smithfield by insisting upon their right to tolls, and, in fact, have thus prevented him from carrying on what I hold to be his lawful occupation. What I propose, therefore, to do, is to grant an injunction to prevent the plaintiffs, by their agents and so forth, from interfering with the conduct by the defendant of his business as an auctioneer on the premises mentioned; and, having expressed my opinion as to what is an interference, the plaintiffs will continue to do what they have been doing at their own risk. The defendant, having succeeded both in the action and on the counter-claim, must have all his costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, J. T. & G. F. Marshall, for Gabb & Walford, Abergavenny.

Solicitors for the defendant, Crowders & Vizard, for Corner & Corner, Hereford.

Q. B. Div. (Huddleston, B., and Mathew, J.) Oct. 28.

THORNTON v. CLEGG AND OTHERS (JUSTICES). (a.)

Licensed house—Neglect of occupier to apply for renewal of licence—Refusal to transfer—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions on appeal—Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), ss. 4, 14—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 75, schedule 2.

A licensee, convicted of an offence under the Licensing Acts, declined to quit until the last day of the adjournment of the general annual licensing sessions. J., a new tenant, obtained a temporary licence, and applied at the next special sessions for a transfer of the former licence under section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828, on the ground that the former holder had "wilfully omitted or neglected to apply" for a renewal at the general licensing sessions. The licensing justices refused the application, and, on appeal, the justices at quarter sessions held that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, on the ground that the application was one for a new licence and not for a transfer, and that the powers of appeals in that respect were repealed by the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 75, schedule 2.

Held, that the application was one for the transfer of a licence, as contemplated by sections 4 and 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and that the justices had jurisdiction, as it came within the exception contained in the Act of 1872, s. 75, schedule 2.

Appeal from the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, sitting at quarter sessions, dismissing an appeal from the licensing justices in special session, refusing an application for a licence.

A licensee for 1887-8, being convicted of an offence during that period, was ordered by the owner to quit the licensed premises, but refused to do so until the day of the last adjournment of the general annual licensing sessions. The landlord subsequently agreed with Thornton, the present appellant, that he, having obtained a temporary licence up to October 10, should become the tenant, and Thornton applied, under section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), to the special sessions held on that day for the transfer of the licence, on the ground that the occupier had "wilfully omitted or neglected to apply" for a renewal of the licence at the general quarter sessions.

The licensing justices refused the application.

Upon appeal to the quarter sessions the justices held that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, on the ground that the application was not properly one for a transfer, but for a new licence, and that for such, the powers of appeal given by sections 27, 28, and 29 of the Licensing Act, 1828, were repealed by schedule 2 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94).

Thornton appealed.

J. Paterson, for the respondents, the justices, took a preliminary objection.—The justices have not heard the merits of this case, but dismissed the application on the preliminary ground that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. Assuming that the court held that there was jurisdiction in the justices, there can be no order on this motion to compel them to hear this application, and without such order it could only have been heard by the justices at the last quarter sessions as being the next after the special licensing sessions. The court will not hear cases stated merely for the consideration of points of law for the benefit of the justices' guidance generally: Reg. v. Sutton Coldfields Overseers, 22 W. R. 324, L. R. 9 Q. B. 153.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The COURT overruled the objection as immaterial to the present motion.

R. S. Wright and Asquith, for the appellant.—Sections 27, 28, and 29 of the Act of 1828 are repealed in the schedule to the Act of 1872 only "except in so far as the three last-mentioned sections relate to the renewal of licences, or to the transfer of licences under sections 4 and 14 of the same Act." By section 74 of the Act of 1872 the interpretation of "the transfer of a licence" is stated to mean a transfer made in special sessions in exercise of the power granted to justices by section 4 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61." That section refers to section 14 of the same Act for the provisions under which transfers can be applied for. This is exactly a case contemplated by section 14—namely, where "an occupier of any licensed house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted, or shall have neglected, to apply at the general annual licensing sessions . . . for a licence to continue to sell exciseable liquors," power is given to the justices at the special sessions to grant the licence so neglected to have been applied for. The marginal note refers to these sessions as "special sessions for transferring licences," and the plain meaning of both sections applies to such transfers. It is immaterial that the licence has in fact expired before the application is made; the justices in special sessions have jurisdiction to treat it as for a transfer: Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638.

J. Paterson and C. S. Hunter, for the respondent justices.—The appellant applied to the special sessions for what is really a renewal of the former licence, though called a transfer. But the licence had already expired. He could only apply for a new licence. Such licence did not come under section 4 of the Act of 1828 at all, and section 14 is confined to applicants coming under the provisions of section 4, so that the appellant cannot claim the benefit of appeal given under section 28, &c., in reference to cases under section 14, and so far unrepealed by the schedule of the Act of 1872. If the application is held to be on the subject of the transfer of a licence, it is not such a transfer as is included with section 4 of the Act of 1828. The former licensee never intended to apply for a renewal. The owner should have applied for a renewal under 37 Vict. c. 49, s. 15, on account of the conviction of the occupier for a misdemeanour: Reg. v. Yorkshire West Riding Justices, 11 Q. B. D. 417, 31 W. R. Dig. 109.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I think the order of the justices in this case, dismissing the appeal to them on the ground of their lack of jurisdiction to entertain it, must be quashed. I think they had jurisdiction. The question depends upon the effect of the repeal in schedule 2 of the Licensing Act of 1872. Powers of appeal to the quarter sessions in respect, among other matters, of the transfer of, or refusal to transfer, licences were given by sections 28, 29, and 30 of the Act of 1828. These sections are stated to be repealed "except in so far as they relate to the renewal or transfer of licences under sections 4 and 14 of the Act of 1828." Was the present application one coming within those sections? I think it was the very case contemplated by section 14 of the Act of 1828. The holder of the licence misconducted himself, and put the landlord in peril in regard to the further licensing of the premises. He refused to quit until it was too late for the landlord to apply for a renewal of the licence. The landlord secures another tenant for the premises, who, at the earliest opportunity, applies for the renewal of the licence which the late licensee had wilfully omitted or neglected to do. That is an application for a transfer, and seems to come exactly within the circumstances contemplated by the framers of section 14, and for which a remedy was made possible.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Pitman & Sons, for Chambers & Son, Sheffield.

Solicitors for the respondents, Peacock & Goddard, for Vickers, Son, & Brown, Sheffield.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 27.

ALEXANDER v. SIMPSON. (a.)

Company—Special resolution—Extraordinary general meeting—Validity of notice—Companies Act, 1862, s. 51.

The construction of a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders is not a technical matter. It is of the greatest importance that such notices should be perfectly clear, and bear the sense in which the business men to whom they are addressed would reasonably understand them.

The articles of association of a company provided that seven days' notice in writing, specifying the place, day, and hour of meeting, and, in the case of special business, the general nature of such business, should be given to the members before any general meeting. On the 3rd of July, 1889, notice was sent to the shareholders that an extraordinary general meeting would be held on the 12th of July at a given hour and day, for the purpose of passing special resolutions for the voluntary liquidation and reconstruction of the company, and adding that, "should such resolutions be duly passed, the same will be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company which will be held on the 29th of July, 1889, at the same time and place." The first meeting having been held and the resolutions duly passed, a financial newspaper, containing a full report of the meeting (the report being specially marked to call attention to it), was, on the 15th of July, sent by post to every shareholder.

Held (affirming the judgment of Chitty, J.), that the notice ought to be construed in the sense in which business men in the position of the shareholders to whom it was addressed would, as reasonable men, understand it at the time they received it; that such men would understand from the notice in question that the second meeting would only be held in the event of the proposed resolutions being passed at the first meeting; that the notice was therefore a notice conditional upon an uncertain future event, and that such a notice was not sufficient; that the subsequent sending of the newspapers did not cure the defect or make a good notice; and the resolutions were therefore invalid, and the injunction ought to be granted.

Judgment of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an order of Chitty, J., made on a motion for an injunction, restraining them from carrying out the voluntary liquidation and reconstruction of a company in pursuance of special resolutions passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders. The company was called the Lisbon-Berlyn Gold Fields (Limited).

On the 3rd of July, 1889, a notice was sent to the shareholders of an extraordinary general meeting to be held on the 12th of July, for the purpose of passing resolutions for the voluntary liquidation and reconstruction of the company. The notice went on to state that, should the resolutions be duly passed, they would be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company to be held on the 29th of July, 1889, at the same time and place. The first meeting was duly held, and the resolutions passed. The company, then, on the 15th of July sent to every shareholder by post a copy of a newspaper, containing a full report of the meeting, the recipient's attention being called to the report by a special mark placed against it.

The plaintiff, one of the shareholders, moved for an interim injunction to restrain the directors and voluntary liquidator from carrying the resolutions into effect, on the ground that the notice was invalid as to the second meeting.

Chitty, J., held that the fair meaning of the notice was that the second meeting would be held if the resolutions were passed at the first meeting; that that was a conditional notice, and that a conditional notice was not a good notice; that the subsequent sending of the newspapers to the shareholders did not cure the defect, not being a notice emanating from the company's office. He accordingly held that there was no good notice of the second meeting, and that the resolutions were consequently invalid, and granted the injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and J. T. Prior, for the appellants.—No objection was made at the time, or for some time afterwards. The new company has been formed, and the shares have gone from hand to hand, so that it would be extremely inconvenient and inequitable now to upset the whole transaction on a technical point. Besides, the notice, according to its true construction, is sufficient in itself. The true construction is the literal one—that the meeting would be held on such a day, and the words "should such resolutions be duly passed" were only intended as notice of the business to be dealt with at the second meeting when it took place. Even if that were not so, the second notice by itself would be sufficient.

Romer, Q.C., and Bramwell Davies, for the respondent, were not called on.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is impossible for us to give effect to this appeal, which, in my opinion, must be dismissed, with the usual consequences. The order appealed against is an order of Chitty, J., granting an injunction at the instance of the plaintiff suing on behalf of himself and other members of the company, which is the Lisbon-Berlyn Gold Fields (Limited), to restrain the defendants (who are the managing director and secretary and two of his colleagues) from carrying into effect, or giving any further effect to, two resolutions passed at two meetings of the shareholders held on the 12th and 29th days of July, 1889. The application for an injunction is based on the supposition that one at all events of these two meetings was not properly convened within the provisions of the company's articles of association. The meetings in question were meetings which were governed generally by the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862, but it is not necessary for us to discuss that, because the real point in this case is whether the articles of association, and in particular the 52nd article, have been complied with so far as regards the summoning of these two meetings. No objection has been taken to the validity of the proceedings at the first meeting. We have, therefore, to consider whether the meeting of the 29th of July, which is the second of the extraordinary general meetings, and which was proposed to be held to satisfy the resolutions passed at the first meeting, was in fact properly convened by the notice which is before us. The 52nd article of association provides that seven days' notice in writing, specifying the place, the day, and the hour of meeting, and, in case of special business, the general nature of such business shall be given to the members before every general meeting." The question, therefore, which we have to decide is a question of construction. We have to construe the notice that was issued on the 3rd of July, and which is a compound notice, the earlier portion of which is directed to notice of the first of the two meetings, while the later portion deals with the meeting of the 29th of July, the validity of which is now in question. It is a question of construction, and Mr. Rigby has asked us to put what may be called a benevolent construction upon this notice, so as to give effect to transactions which were honestly and bonâ fide carried through at this second meeting, and which it would be a pity, and perhaps injurious to the company, to disturb.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It seems to me it is impossible for us to adopt the view that a benevolent construction ought to be put on commercial notices. What we have to consider is, not what in the result is to be the construction, but what was the meaning which persons of the character of those to whom this notice was addressed as reasonable men would attach to it at the time they received it. It is hardly necessary to dilate upon the difficulty in which we should be placed if we were to consider that a document was capable of two constructions—one being the proper construction to be placed on it at the moment it is received, and another being a subsequent construction of a more benevolent character to be placed upon it, in the event, by a court of law anxious not to disturb matters that have already passed. The test is, what is the fair business-like construction which business men in the position of shareholders would place on this document when they received it? The paragraph is as follows:—"Should such resolutions be duly passed" (that is, the resolutions which it was proposed to bring before the first extraordinary general meeting), "the same will be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company, which will be held on Monday, the 29th of July, 1889, at the same time and place." If that paragraph is to be read as a notice that the subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company would only be held in the event of the passing of the resolution at the former meeting, it is obvious that it would not be a good notice, because it would leave the shareholders in ignorance whether the second general meeting was to be held or not. They would only know that it would be held in a particular contingency, but they would not know whether that contingency would occur or not. That uncertainty could not be cured by subsequently acquiring information from the sources open to them that the resolutions had in fact been passed. The point is not what the notice in time became when it was perhaps too late for it to be valid under the articles, but what it was at the time when it was received by the shareholders, and while it was still in time to give proper notice.

Mr. Rigby has argued that this paragraph is capable of another construction, which is this—that an extraordinary general meeting would at all events be held, but that the words "should such resolutions be duly passed" are words which only applied to what was to be done at the subsequent meeting of the company when it took place. Of those two opposite constructions, which is the plain and business-like one? Is this really a notice that an extraordinary general meeting would be held, whether it was necessary to hold it or not?—because that is what Mr. Rigby's construction comes to—or is it to be read in the more obvious way, that if the resolutions which required a subsequent extraordinary general meeting to be held were passed at the former meeting, then, and in that event only, the extraordinary general meeting would be held? It seems to me that a shareholder would consider that the extraordinary general meeting of the 29th of July was only to be held in the event of its being necessary—that is to say, in the event of the resolutions being passed at the former meeting, because, if he took any other view, he would have to conclude that the directors of the company were summoning a meeting which, in one contingency, would bring the shareholders from all parts of London, or, for anything I know, from all parts of England, for no purpose at all, and when there was no business at all to be transacted. It does not seem to me to be business-like or reasonable to suppose it was intended by this general notice that an extraordinary general meeting should be held on the 29th of July, whether there was any business for it or not, when apt words are to be found in the paragraph which, in their ordinary grammatical sense, imply that the extraordinary general meeting of the 29th of July would only be held in case it was wanted. I regret very much that our decision is a decision which will cause a great deal of trouble in the affairs of this company, but it is not a technical matter at all. The difficulty cannot be properly described as a technical one. The construction of a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting of a company is not a technical matter at all, and I agree entirely with what Chitty, J., has pointed out—the extreme importance that these notices should be so plain that those who run may read, and that they should be construed in a sense in which business men to whom they are addressed would understand them. Great as is the inconvenience, we are bound to put on this document the true construction which all the shareholders would put upon it at the time they received it, and to dismiss this appeal, as, in my opinion, it ought to be dismissed, with costs, while regretting that any business inconvenience may result from a flaw in the notice which has been sent.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Powell & Burt; Snell, Son, & Greenip.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 8, 12, 13.

In re DAVID.

BUCKLEY v. ROYAL NATIONAL LIFEBOAT INSTITUTION. (a.)

Charity—Mortmain—Assignment of rates, tolls, rents, &c.—Bridge tolls—Mortgage of the general undertaking—Interest in land—9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

Trustees, incorporated by a special Act for the purpose of managing a harbour, were empowered (amongst other things) to demand certain rates for the use of the harbour, to levy toll for the passage over certain bridges, and to lease any of the rates, dues, and tolls at a rent; and also to borrow, for the purposes of the Act, money, not exceeding a certain specified sum, "on mortgage of the several tolls, rates, and dues" by the Act authorised, the mortgagees being empowered to enforce payment of arrears of interest by appointing a receiver. All the moneys received by the trustees were to be paid to the credit of the harbour fund, and it was provided that the moneys from time to time carried to the credit of the harbour fund should be applied, first, in paying the interest on moneys borrowed under the Act and certain previous Acts; secondly, in maintaining the harbour, &c.; thirdly, in paying certain rent-charges; and fourthly, in paying sums required to be set apart to form a sinking fund to pay off the sums borrowed.

The approaches to, and the land under, the bridges belonged to the trustees.

The trustees borrowed under the Act money upon the security of bonds by which, in consideration of the payment of the amount expressed to be secured by the bonds respectively, the trustees granted and assigned to the persons named therein, their executors, administrators, and assigns, "such proportion of the several rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the said Act as the said sum of £ doth or shall bear to the whole sum which is or shall be borrowed upon the credit of the said rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys, to hold to the said [assignee] until the said sum of £ , with interest at per cent. per annum, shall be lawfully paid and satisfied," &c., &c.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the bonds amounted to an assignment specifically of the rates, tolls, and dues expressed to be assigned by them (which included the bridge tolls), but not to an assignment of the entire harbour fund, or (what is the same) an assignment of the general undertaking of the harbour trust; that the bridge tolls were payments made for permission to pass over the bridges, and therefore (the land leading to and supporting the bridges being the property of the trustees) over land belonging to the trustees, which land might, moreover, be had recourse to under the mortgagees' power of appointing a receiver; that such tolls were therefore an interest in land; and that, consequently, the bonds assigning them were within the mischief of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and could not be given to a charity.

Knapp v. Williams, 4 Ves. 430n, discussed.

In re Christmas, 34 W. R. 8, 33 Ch. D. 332, and Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. 201, distinguished.

Judgment of North, J. (37 W. R. 613, 41 Ch. D. 165), affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

This was an appeal from a judgment of North, J., on an originating summons taken out under order 55 of the Rules of the Supreme Court for the opinion of the court on certain points. The case is reported below at 37 W. R. 613, 41 Ch. D. 168, where the facts and the pertinent parts of the Act of Parliament are somewhat more fully set out.

It appeared that by a deed of August 8, 1882, John David and his wife appointed certain funds over which they had a power of appointment (subject to their own life estates) to trustees upon trust to pay the income to another person for life, and after her death upon trust to sell and convert, and out of the proceeds to pay certain sums to specified charities, including £1,000 to the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, and to pay or retain the residue to or for the plaintiff for her own use and benefit. The trust property included £2,000 secured by Swansea Harbour bonds, which were issued under the Swansea Harbour Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 126), by the Swansea Harbour trustees, who were incorporated by that Act. The bonds, in consideration of £ paid, &c., purported to grant and assign to the persons named therein, their executors, administrators, and assigns "such proportion of the several rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the said Act as the said sum of £ doth or shall bear to the whole sum which is or shall be borrowed upon the credit of the said rates, tolls, and rents, and other moneys, to hold to the said, &c., from this day until the said sum of £ with interest at per cent. per annum, shall be lawfully paid and satisfied, the principal sum to be repaid at the end of seven years from the day of," &c.

The Act provided for the appointment, election, and incorporation of a body to be called the "Swansea Harbour Trustees," and gave them power to purchase, take, hold, and dispose of land and other property for the purposes, and subject to the restrictions of the Act, with power in all respects to carry it into effect.

The purposes of the Act were the construction and maintenance of docks, basins, quays, locks, and other works, and the conservancy of the bay and harbour of Swansea. Among other general Acts the Commissioners' Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 16), except certain specified clauses thereof, was incorporated by the local Act, and the bonds now in question followed the form of mortgage given in schedule (B), and authorized by section 75 (one of the incorporated sections), of the general Act. That form includes the word "rents" among the things to be assigned, as it purports to assign "such proportion of the rates, rents, profits, and other moneys," &c. As will be seen below, section 99 of the special Act, which authorizes the trustees to mortgage tolls, rates, and dues, does not include the word "rents" among the things on mortgage of which the trustees may borrow.

Section 43 of the special Act vested in the trustees all property of or to which certain other trustees were possessed or entitled under former Acts, which were repealed by the present one.

Section 99 empowered the trustees, for the purpose of enabling them to construct the works authorized by the Act, to borrow any sum not exceeding £80,000 "on mortgage of the several tolls, rates, and dues by this Act authorized," and section 102 provided for a certain amount being set apart "annually out of the rates, dues, and tolls" as a sinking fund, to be applied in paying off the principal sums from time to time secured on mortgage.

Section 104 authorized mortgagees under the Act to enforce payment of arrears of interest due to them by appointing a receiver.

Section 108 provided that all the rates, dues, and other moneys received by the trustees should be paid to the credit of the "Swansea Harbour Fund."

Section 110 enacted that "the moneys from time to time carried to the credit of the Swansea Harbour Fund shall be applied, first, in paying the interest on moneys borrowed under" the Act and certain former Acts; secondly, in maintaining and regulating the harbour and the navigation thereof; thirdly, in payment of certain rent-charges secured under the Act; fourthly, in payment of the sums by the Act required to be set apart to form a sinking fund; and that the surplus, if any, should be applied for such of the purposes of the Act as the trustees should from time to time think fit.

Section 136 empowered the trustees to erect and maintain toll-gates upon or adjoining certain bridges, and section 137 to demand certain tolls in respect of vehicles, beasts, and foot passengers passing over the bridges.

Section 152 authorized them to lease any of the rates, dues, and tolls by the Act authorized, at a rent to be agreed upon, for any term not exceeding three years. The Act contained no power for the trustees to mortgage any land vested in them.

The surviving trustee, under the deed of August, 1882, took out an originating summons as plaintiff against the charities as defendants, asking (inter alia) for a declaration that the sum of £2,000, secured by the bonds, was an interest in, or a charge or incumbrance affecting, or to affect, land within the meaning of the Mortmain Act.

The charities were not authorized to hold land. The summons was adjourned into court.

North, J., held that the bonds created a charge on the particular things (i.e., rates, tolls, rents, &c.) expressed to be comprised in them, and did not amount to a mortgage on the general undertaking of the Swansea Harbour Trustees; that the bridge tolls were an interest in land within the Mortmain Act; and that the charities, therefore, could not take the bonds.

The defendants appealed.

Vaughan Hawkins and Dibdin, for the appellants.—These bonds are pure, and not impure, personalty, and the gift, therefore, is not invalid under the Statute of Mortmain: In re Christmas, 34 W. R. 8, 33 Ch. D. 332. First, our main point is that these dues and rates assigned by the bonds are not interests in land within the statute. Secondly, even if they are, the charge is not on the interests themselves, but on the general fund of which they form a part, and, therefore, is not within the statute: Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. 201. The judge below decided against us, on the ground that Knapp v. Williams, 4 Ves. 430n, is a binding authority, and lays down a general rule as to these cases. But that case was questioned in In re Christmas, which, at all events, restricted the generality of its application. The Swansea Harbour Fund includes the income from land, penalties, and other sources of income, besides the rates, dues, and tolls; and the charge is on the whole fund and undertaking. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—You admit part of the fund comes from land?] Yes. In any case Knapp v. Williams is distinguishable, for Myers v. Perigal, 1 W. R. 57, 2 De G. M. & G. 599, at p. 619, shows that the bonds in the former case contained an actual assignment of real estate. So bonds given by a railway company which owns land are pure personalty: Attree v. Hawe, 26 W. R. 871, 9 Ch. D. 337. Apart from authority, can it be said that any of these rates, dues, or tolls are an interest in land of the nature of real estate? Are they not merely taxes? Why is the toll for going over a public bridge more an interest in land than dues for ships coming into harbour? Tolls are of two classes—tolls "thorough" and tolls "traverse." [FRY, L.J.—Will you define a toll thorough?] It is a toll taken of men for passing through a vill in the high street, or for passing over a public ferry or a public bridge: Williams on Prescriptive Rights, p. 299; Comyn's Digest, 5th ed., vol. 7, pp. 457—459. Toll traverse is a payment made for the right of going through another person's property. Toll thorough is really a tax—something that does not come out of the dominant or servient tenement, but is granted by the Crown or Parliament, as here. Knapp v. Williams was referred to in Finch v. Squire, 10 Ves. 41, in which case Sir W. Grant held that the right to collect the tolls there in question gave no interest in the land. [FRY, L.J.—Does the soil in the approaches to the bridges, or the soil in the water underneath them, belong to the trustees?] The Act does not vest the soil in the trustees. The Duke of Beaufort appears to have some interest in the soil. The trustees might have been directed by their Act to build a public bridge on public land vested in the Corporation of Swansea or some other public body. [Everitt, Q.C.—By a local Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 126), s. 5, the trustees are directed to purchase land and build bridges, &c.] We cannot say they did not buy. We will assume the trustees are entitled to the land. In In re Christmas the principle of Knapp v. Williams, so far as it can be ascertained, is disapproved. There is another point. Sections 108—110 say everything is to go into the Swansea Harbour Fund. Therefore there is no power to disintegrate the fund by mortgaging the tolls, &c., separately from the entire fund: Attree v. Hawe; Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. [COTTON, L.J.—Here the first thing to be paid is the interest on the debt, but there it was the expense of keeping up and working the railway.] The mortgagee may have the first claim for his interest, but it is not so with the principal. [FRY, L.J.—If the interest is charged on land, is not the principal an interest in land within the decisions?] No. [They also referred to Fripp v. Bridgewater and Taunton Canal Co., 1 W. R. 477, 11 Ha. 241; Howes v. Chapman, 4 Ves. 542; and Blaker v. Herts and Essex Waterworks Co., 37 W. R. 601, 41 Ch. D. 399.] To sum up, this is a mortgage on the whole Swansea Harbour Fund. The Act says the tolls are to be paid into the fund, and that the mortgagees are to be paid out of the fund. The security is on the fund, and not on the tolls, and the case is therefore within In re Harris, 29 W. R. 119, 15 Ch. D. 561. It is not a case of receivership, but management: In re Manchester and Milford Railway Co., 14 Ch. D. 645, 28 W. R. Dig. 190. The case of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. really altered the law. This is not a security on land, but on a fund only part of which comes, and that only indirectly, from land. It is not a security which would enable the mortgagees to get at, or have recourse to, the land directly or indirectly—it is only a security on fruit fallen.

Everitt, Q.C., and G. Cruickshank, for the respondent, were not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we have to determine whether a set of bonds, a specimen of which is before us (I presume they are all worded alike), are, or are not, so far connected with land, and the possession and use of land, as to be within the mischief of the Statute of Mortmain.

The bonds are bonds the power to issue which was created by the Swansea Harbour Act, 1854. This bond is in the form given in the schedule to the Commissioners' Clauses Act, 1847, and the bond states that it assigns or mortgages to the bondholder "such proportion of the rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the said Act, as the said sum of £100 doth, or shall, bear to the whole sum which is, or shall be, borrowed upon the credit of the said rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys," which are the words used in the form in the schedule to the general Act. The Swansea Harbour Act, 1854, leaves out in section 99 the word "rents," and empowers the trustees to borrow any sum, not exceeding £80,000, "on mortgage of the several rates, tolls, and dues by this Act authorized." Therefore, the words differ in respect of the word "rents," which occurs in the bonds, though it does not seem to be in terms authorized by section 99 of the special Act. But though you might say, therefore, that to that extent the bond was not such a bond as was authorized by the special Act, yet one of the clauses of the general Act—the Commissioners' Clauses Act (which is incorporated by the special Act)—does seem to authorize the terms of the bond, and empower the trustees to mortgage "rents." But it is not necessary to discuss that, because, assuming that the word "rents" was not authorized, the bond would still be good as to "rates, tolls, and dues," and then the question would arise whether those rates, tolls, and dues are, or are not, an interest in land within the Mortmain Act.

There has been a great deal of discussion on a case heard before Lord Loughborough in 1798—Knapp v. Williams. That case is certainly open to the observations made on it in subsequent cases, and especially by my learned brother, Cotton, L.J., in the case of In re Christmas. If Knapp v. Williams is right and binding on us, there is an end of Mr. Hawkins's argument and of the appellant's case, because in that case bonds not distinguishable from these were held to be within the Statute of Mortmain. But that case is interesting as showing the now well-established distinction between two sorts of toll, of which one is so intimately connected with the possession of land, and so bound up with land that a grant of such tolls would be clearly within the statute, but a grant of the other sort, not arising out of the possession of land, would not be within the statute. The correctness of that distinction has not, I suppose, been doubted by anyone of those who have commented on the case. The question is of which sort are these tolls here. It would have been more satisfactory to my mind if we could have had a clearer idea of the physical position of these bridges in respect of the use of which these tolls arise. But, according to the best judgment I can form, these tolls are really money paid for the actual use of land by those who go over the bridges and the approaches to them, and, therefore, money so intimately connected with land and arising from its possession that a mortgage of such tolls is within the mischief of the Statute of Mortmain. That seems to me to be sufficiently and reasonably clear to show that the tolls here are of that kind which is within the mischief of the statute.

That, in one sense, disposes of the case, but Mr. Hawkins has raised a second point. He says the true effect of this bond is not to mortgage these tolls only, or to mortgage exclusively the rates, dues, and tolls only, but that, because of certain sections of the special Act, such as especially the 102nd, 103rd, 108th, &c., it will be seen that this is really a mortgage, not of the tolls, but of the whole undertaking—i.e., of everything that comes into the hands of the trustees, and that it is therefore really a mortgage on the Swansea Harbour Fund, which is the same thing as the undertaking of the trustees, and that it is therefore within the distinction drawn in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. and similar cases. That makes it a mortgage on the general undertaking, and distinguishes it from a mortgage of tolls arising out of land, and brings it within the protection of the many cases which draw a distinction on the ground that it is a mortgage, not of the land itself, but of that which comes from the land after it is severed from it. If that were made out, I suppose it would be a good point, because it would be supported by cases binding on us; but I do not think it has been made out. These clauses undoubtedly give directions to the trustees that they are to keep down the interest on the mortgage and create a sinking fund to put an end to it out of all the funds that come into their hands. But it seems to me those clauses are really orders to the trustees as to the fund out of which these payments are to be made, which is a very different thing from directions to mortgage the moneys. Therefore the second point, when one comes to look at the sections in question, also fails.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of North, J., was right, and must be affirmed, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will take Mr. Hawkins's second point first, because, if it can be sustained, it will be unnecessary to decide whether a charge on the bridge tolls is within the Mortmain Act. That second point was that this was not a charge upon any specific tolls or dues, but upon the general undertaking—that is, upon the money after it has been received by the trustees. If that were so, the charge would not be an interest in land, from whatever source the moneys came originally. The mortgage or debenture is given under the powers of section 99 of the special Act of 1854, with which is incorporated the general Act of 1847. Section 99 gave power to charge the tolls, rates, and dues. Mr. Hawkins said that, having regard to the terms of the bonds, what was meant to be charged was not the specific tolls, rents, and dues, but the general undertaking of the Swansea Harbour Trust. He did not call our attention to the fact that the charge was created under the powers of the Commissioners' Clauses Act as well as under the special Act. We do find that under the form in the schedule to the former Act mortgages are to be given on such rates, rents, profits, and other moneys accruing under the said Act.

To my mind that very much explains why this language (including the word "rents") is introduced into the debentures—it is not introduced for the purpose of showing that, although the power under section 99 is to charge specifically tolls, it intends to give, or purports to give, a charge only on the general undertaking—that is, on the moneys, from whatever source received, when they come into the coffers of the trustees. But even on Mr. Hawkins's argument, if there is a charge here specifically on tolls, what he must contend is that any debentures or mortgages granted under the Act are charges on the general undertaking only, and not on the specific tolls which are referred to in the security; and he did so contend, relying on the case of Gardner v. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. But, in my opinion, that case does not apply, the debentures and charge there being of an entirely different character from these. The charge was in accordance with the Companies Clauses Act, and assigns to Gardner the general undertaking of the company as defined by that Act, and all the tolls or sums of money arising upon or out of the said general undertaking. Although there is there a reference to tolls or sums of money arising upon or out of the general undertaking, yet the court construed that as a charge, not on tolls specifically, but only as a charge on the general undertaking mentioned in the Act; and that Act did require and direct that the railway should be kept up and maintained, and therefore the court said that it was not a charge which enabled the mortgagee to take any particular land, or any particular money arising from the undertaking, without regard to the undertaking being carried on. It was a mortgage of the undertaking as defined by the Act—that is, a mortgage subject to the obligations cast upon the railway company by Act of Parliament. That entirely differs from the present case, because here, though there is power to charge generally the undertaking of this harbour, it is only a power to do so in this manner—to charge the particular sums of money arising from that undertaking, and in the direction which is given as to the application of the general fund, which comprises various sums of money which come into the trustees' chest, the first direction is to pay the interest on their debentures, which is entirely different from the directions contained in the Railway Act, and entirely inconsistent with the views taken in the case of Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. by the Court of Appeal with reference to the Railway Acts. That, to my mind, prevents it being said that the cases on which Mr. Hawkins relies apply to the present case, and we have to consider, therefore, what is the effect of giving a charge, in the way this is done, under the provisions of the Act, upon tolls, and among others, the bridge tolls. That was the first point raised in the argument—what is the effect of charges specifically on the bridge tolls.

The Lord Chief Justice has referred to the case of Knapp v. Williams, which we considered in In re Christmas. There is a passage in the former case which shows the principle to be applied in considering whether this toll is a toll "thorough" or a toll by which an interest in the land is given. Mr. Hawkins admitted that part of the approaches to the bridges, and the land supporting them, belonged to the trustees alone, and that the bridges over their land, and the passage over the bridges, was connected with the use of their own land. In my opinion, therefore, these tolls are sums of money connected with the land and which the trustees are entitled to be paid for the use of their land. They have power by Act of Parliament to prevent anyone passing without paying the tolls. They are not at all like tolls to be taken without reference to the use of the land. In In re Christmas the money was in no way connected with the use of the land; so that it could not be said that the right to receive it was an interest in land. Here the money was only to be received from those who used the land, and the bridges constructed, or partly constructed, on the land, belonging to the trustees. In my opinion it would be wrong to hold in this case that the right to receivor this money is not connected with land. It is money paid for the use of land, and it comes out of the land. I think this appeal fails, and the judgment of North, J., was right.

FRY, L.J.—The local Act in question, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 126, incorporates the Commissioners' Clauses Act, 1847, and incorporates those clauses of it which contain and authorize the form of mortgage. Those clauses and that form authorize the mortgaging of the rents as well as the rates, tolls, and dues. Section 99 of the local Act authorizes the mortgaging of the tolls, rates, and dues. But the bond comprises rents, rates, tolls, and dues. If the word "rents" is rightly put in, the bond is clearly within the Mortmain Act, but if the word "rents" ought to be omitted, then we are driven to inquire whether the tolls, rates, and dues are so connected with the land as to fall within the mischief of the statute as incorporeal hereditaments. The cases of Knapp v. Williams and In re Christmas have drawn and confirmed the distinction between the two kinds of tolls, of which the one is so connected with the land and the other is not. Whether that distinction was rightly drawn in Knapp v. Williams with reference to the particular tolls there, is quite immaterial for our present purpose. It is enough that decisions binding on us have drawn the distinction, and we are therefore bound to inquire to which kind these tolls belong. They are tolls which are to be levied for passing over a bridge. By section 137 the trustees are empowered to demand and take at every one of their gates which they may erect the tolls in question before any persons or cattle are permitted to pass through. There is also power for the mortgagees to appoint a receiver of the tolls, or of such part of them as may be necessary. The receiver must, therefore, I think, be empowered to occupy the toll-house, and therefore to go on the land, shut the gates if necessary, and take the tolls. The mortgage, therefore, carries a right to have recourse to the land itself. The bridges also, having regard to the admissions of Mr. Hawkins, or a substantial part of the land connected with them, must be the property of the trustees, and, therefore, are comprised in the security. These tolls, therefore, are part of the usufruct of the land, and consequently so connected with land as to be an incorporeal hereditament, and accordingly within the Mortmain Act. Mr. Hawkins argued that this was only a charge on the floating balance for the time being of the fund, and not on the tolls, rates, and dues. In my opinion it is impossible validly to contend that that is the true meaning of the mortgage—a mortgage which charges the tolls and enables a receiver of them to be appointed cannot be a mere charge on the floating balance of the fund, of which the toll is only one constituent. The true effect of the Act is very much as if the trustees had created a mortgage of real estate, accompanying it with a direction to their bankers to pay the interest on the mortgage out of their balance from time to time. I think the judgment of North, J., is quite right, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Clayton, Sons, & Fargus.

Solicitors for the respondents, Murray, Hutchins, & Stirling.

From Q. B. Div. July 24, 1889.

EDWARDS v. SALMON. (a.)

Local government — Officer — "Allowance" — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 189, 193.

The defendant was clerk to an urban sanitary authority at a fixed salary. Subsequently to the fixing of the defendant's salary the authority promoted a sewage scheme, in connection with which a large amount of extra labour, which was not in contemplation when the defendant's salary was fixed, was thrown upon him. On the completion of the works the authority resolved that he should be paid a sum of money for his services in connection with the scheme.

Held, that the defendant, in accepting this sum, did not render himself liable to the penalties imposed by section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, on officers or servants of local authorities accepting, under colour of their office or employment, any fee or reward other than their proper wages, salaries, or allowances.

Semble, the word "allowances" in section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes extra payment for extra work.

Appeal from the decision of Pollock, B.

The action was brought to recover a penalty of £50 under section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The defendant was town clerk of Bury St. Edmunds, and also clerk to the town council as the urban sanitary authority.

By a resolution in 1879 the town council fixed his salary at £365 per annum, "to include all legal charges, except for contentious business matters, travelling expenses, and payments out of pocket."

In 1883 the town council, as urban sanitary authority, promoted a drainage scheme which after some opposition was carried out. A large amount of extra work, which was not contemplated when the defendant's salary was fixed, was thrown upon the defendant in connection with carrying out this scheme, and after the completion of the works the town council, on December 6, 1885, at the recommendation of the irrigation committee resolved that the defendant should be paid 500 guineas for his services in respect of the scheme, to include everything except payments out of pocket, which sum the defendant accordingly received.

By section 189 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the urban authority may pay to its officers and servants such reasonable salaries, wages, or allowances as it may think proper.

By section 193, if any officer or servant, under colour of his office or employment, exacts or accepts any fee or reward whatsoever other than his proper salary, wages, and allowances, he shall be incapable of afterwards holding or continuing in any office or employment under this Act, and shall forfeit and pay the sum of £50 "which may be recovered by any person with full costs of suit by action of debt."

At the trial, which took place without a jury, Pollock, B., gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Candy, Q.C., and Slee, for the appellant.—The defendant, by accepting the sum of 500 guineas voted by the town council, has brought himself within the section. The payment was neither salary, wages, nor allowances: Burgess v. Clark, 33 W. R. 269, 14 Q. B. D. 735; R. v. Mayor of Ramsgate, 37 W. R. 781, 23 Q. B. D. 66.

Channell, Q.C., and Poyser, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In my opinion this is a frivolous and vexatious action, and the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. It is not necessary I think to give a large exposition of the section, because the facts in this case are far outside any possible construction of it. There is no colour or pretence for the allegation that has been made against the defendant. The section prohibits officers and servants of the sanitary authority from exacting or accepting any fee or reward other than their proper salaries, wages, and allowances under colour of their office or employment. Now what are the facts here. The salary of the defendant was fixed by resolution at a certain amount. Some time afterwards an extensive scheme for sewage works, which was not in contemplation at the time the defendant's salary was fixed, was entered upon, and the amount of labour thrown upon the defendant was consequently very largely increased. Then in the face of day, and by the proper authorities, an extra amount of money is regularly voted to him. What part of the section has been infringed? The policy of the section is clear. It is to prevent officers and servants of a local authority from having any interest in any contract or bargain made with their employers for the purposes of the Act. No doubt there are some provisions of the statute which a person acting perfectly bonâ fide might nevertheless infringe, but the point of this particular action is that the defendant exacted or accepted this money under colour of his office or employment. In my opinion the language of the section points to a transaction altogether outside the determination by the local authority of the remuneration to be paid to their officers and servants. However, whether that be so or not, there was in the present case every element to give the local authority jurisdiction to vote the defendant this sum.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It becomes, therefore, immaterial to consider whether or not this sum would come under the head "allowances." For my own part I cannot concur with the view expressed by Cotton, L.J., in Burgess v. Clark, and adopted by Field, J., in R. v. Mayor of Ramsgate, that the meaning of the word is confined to "the use of a room or coals or candles or articles of the like kind or an allowance for the payment of them."

Whatever the true meaning of the word may be it obviously includes extra payment for extra work, and this case comes exactly within it. It would be paying too great a compliment to this frivolous case if I were to expound the section more fully.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I will only add that I do not alter one word of what I said in Burgess v. Clark as to the meaning of the word "allowances." "It is a payment beyond the salary of the officer for additional services rendered by him."

Lindley, L.J.—I agree.

Solicitor for the appellant, Alexander Pope.

Solicitor for the respondent, G. Robins.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } Nov. 11—13, 18—21, 25; Dec. 3.

Bourke v. Davis. (a.)

*River—Right of way—Boating—Recreation—*Cul-de-sac —Highway — Dedication — Evidence — Affidavits — Commissioner to administer oaths—R. S. C., ord. 36, r. 34.

Action to restrain the defendant from interfering with posts and chains which the plaintiff, the owner of the bed of the river under a title derived from the Crown, had placed in the River Mole to stop the waterway. Counterclaim by the defendant, who was not a riparian owner, for an injunction to restrain any hindrance to the passage of his boats. He based his claim on a public right of highway over part of the river, not on a right of recreation. The evidence showed that the reach in question was not tidal; that it could not be approached by boats from below; that its depth was artificial, and depended on mill dams; that it had never been used for purposes of commerce, or as a way from one public place to another; that there was no public access to it at one end, and it was doubtful whether there was any public access to it for boats at any point; that no one except the mill-owners had done anything towards maintaining it as a waterway; that there had been a considerable amount of boating on the reach by riparian owners and by others in boats brought from a distance, chiefly for fishing, but that no right to fish was claimed, and that persons boating had hardly ever been interfered with.

Held, that the user had been permissive, and not of right, and that the defendant must be restrained from removing the obstruction.

Observations on the manner in which affidavits are sworn before commissioners to take oaths.

Trial of action.

This action was brought to decide whether there was a public right of boating on the River Mole between Esher and Cobham. It was commenced by the plaintiff as riparian owner of both banks, but he subsequently bought the bed of the river from persons who had obtained it by grant from the Crown, and was permitted to issue a new writ relying upon the title thus acquired. Adjournment under R. S. C., ord. 36, r. 34, was waived, the actions were consolidated, and the hearing proceeded with, reserving the question of costs.

A large number of witnesses were examined, and the facts were found by Kay, J., as follows:—

The River Mole runs under Cobham Bridge and some miles further on under Esher Bridge into the Thames near Hampton Court. It is not tidal. Extraordinary high tides have been known to affect the Thames as far as Hampton Court, but the highest known tide would not, as the levels show, if there were no obstruction, raise the water of the Mole much beyond its mouth, and not nearly so far as Esher Bridge. But there are obstructions. Some distance from the Thames the Mole divides into two streams, one of which takes the name of the Ember. Across the Mole, at a point where these two streams again approach one another, about 800 yards from the Thames, is a mill which completely stops the waterway. Higher up is another obstruction, and again before reaching Esher Bridge the river is dammed by some mills which formerly were paper mills, which were burnt about 1853, and remained unoccupied for many years until they were used for the manufacture of linoleum. It is proved that if the sluices at these mills were drawn the river between Esher and Cobham Bridges could not be used for boating, except in times of flood. It would be merely a string of pools united by a shallow stream. But thus dammed up there is water enough to float canoes, punts, and skiffs nearly up to Cobham Bridge. For 100 yards or thereabouts below that bridge, however, the river is very shallow, and occasionally it is difficult to get up further. Above Cobham Bridge, I understand, the river is dammed up again. This waterway has not been used for purposes of commerce. Once when a railway bridge was being built some bricks were brought down over part of it, and on another occasion some poles cut by the side of the stream were floated down on a punt; but except these instances there has been no traffic on it other than boats for pleasure, with occasional fishing. There is no access for boats from the Thames without taking them out of the water and carrying them over the land of private persons past the mill dams I have mentioned. An attempt has been made to prove a right of access for boats from the road over Esher Bridge by the side of that bridge. That attempt has not been successful. I am satisfied that there is no public right of access for boats from the road to the river at that point. At the paper mills lower down a road leads under a railway arch and thence parallel with the railway on the Esher side of the river to the paper mills. At this point boats have occasionally been brought on trolleys and launched into the mill dam.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is disputed whether this road is public for vehicles. A footpath crosses the river, but the cart road stops at the mill. There is no evidence of any wayfarer having used the river as a continuation of this road. Higher up the public highway approaches the river at two points. One is where the defendant keeps some boats. The road is separated from the river by posts and rails having at one end a space 2ft. wide through which a man can pass, but boats can only be got from the road to the river by passing them over or under the rails, and across a narrow strip of land between the rails and the river. Again, at a place called the Shrimper the road is railed off in like manner, leaving, however, a space through which cattle can be taken to the river to water. This place, however, does not seem to have been used much, if at all, as an access for boats. There is a lane running down to the river called Water-lane, which it is suggested led to a ford in former times before a bridge was built at Esher. There is no evidence that anyone ever brought a boat by this road and put it on the river at this place. A great effort has been made to prove that there was a public access to the riverside at Cobham Bridge. This has entirely failed. The road to that bridge cannot be reached from the river without crossing the land of private owners, over which there is no right of way. The result is that the River Mole from Cobham Bridge through Esher Bridge to the dam at the paper mill is a natural stream, whose depth, if the dam were removed, would not be sufficient even for a canoe to pass between the two bridges. Its depth is entirely artificial, and upon this depends its capacity for boating traffic. It is not, and never was, a way from Esher to Cobham, or from any one public place to another. It is, in fact, a long pond approachable by a high road at one or more points along its course. It has never been used as a waterway, except for purposes of pleasure and recreation. The defendant has let boats for hire for about eight years. He is not a riparian proprietor. The house he occupies is at some little distance from the river. He keeps his boats by the river at the place I have described, which does not belong to him. He has no right of occupation there. The plaintiff is owner of an estate which lies on both sides of the river, and for some distance includes the opposite banks. He has recently stopped the waterway with posts and chains. These the defendant broke down. Hence arose this litigation. The plaintiff sues to prevent his obstruction being interfered with. The defendant counter-claims for an injunction to restrain any hindrance to the passage of his boats. Originally the plaintiff sued as riparian proprietor, claiming that the bed of the river where his land came down to it on both sides, and half the bed where only on one side, was his property. At the hearing this claim was abandoned and the new one set up by purchase, since the commencement of the action, of the soil and bed of the river all the way from Cobham Bridge downwards from persons who had obtained it by grant from the Crown in 1820. Since that time the property so granted has been in settlement, and has practically belonged to successive tenants for life till the last few years. As the real question is the public right of using the river, the plaintiff was permitted to issue a new writ relying upon the title to the bed of the river thus acquired derivatively under the Crown grant in 1820, the question of costs being left to the court.

Rigby, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and Levett, for the plaintiff, referred to Hargreaves v. Diddams, 23 W. R. 828, L. R. 10 Q. B. 582.

Harris, Q.C., Nasmith, Q.C., and Oswald, for the defendant.—The public have access to the river at various points, and have boated on it as of right for many years. They have thus acquired a right of way by user even if they cannot land on the banks or get out at the other end without trespassing. Other riparian owners used the whole of the river, and they could only do that as representing the public. The bed of the river was in the Crown, so the public had the right of navigating it, and the Crown could not interfere with that right: Hargrave's Tracts, pp. 6, 8; Orr-Ewing v. Colquhoun, 2 App. Cas. 839; Miles v. Rose, 5 Taunt. 705; Murphy v. Ryan, 16 W. R. 678, 2 Ir. Rep. C. L. 143; Phear on Watercourses, pp. 90, 95; Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 268; Macpherson v. Scottish, &c., Society, 13 App. Cas. p. 750, 37 W. R. Dig. 156; Mercer v. Woodgate, 18 W. R. 116, L. R. 5 Q. B. 26; Mann v. Brodie, 10 App. Cas. 378, 33 W. R. Dig. 179; Marshall v. Ulleswater Co., 20 W. R. 144, L. R. 7 Q. B. 166; Young v. Cuthbertson, 1 Macq. 455; Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 375 n.; Arnold v. Blake, 19 W. R. 1090, L. R. 6 Q. B. 433; Trotter v. Harris, 2 Y. & J. 285; Goddard on Easements, 3rd ed., p. 355; Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339. [Kay, J., referred to Dickens v. Shaw, Hall on the Seashore, 2nd ed., app., p. 45.]

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—No right of way from one place to another has been proved. The riparian owners have at most acquired private rights attached to their tenements, but we say that all boating was permissive. There was no dedication to the public: Dyce v. Lady James Hay, 1 Macq. 305; Campbell v. Lang, 1 W. R. 538, 1 Macq. 451. Since 1820 there has never been an owner against whom dedication could be presumed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—Kay, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—The defendant justifies his acts as one of the public. His case is that the river from Cobham Bridge through Esher Bridge to the paper mills is a highway. He makes no claim for a right of recreation by custom. Such a claim is known to our law, but is carefully restricted. It cannot exist as a right in the public generally, but must be confined to the inhabitants of a particular district: Fitch v. Rawlings, 2 H. Bl. 393; Earl of Coventry v. Willes, 12 W. R. 127. For all the purposes of this case the right claimed is similar to a right of highway on land not covered by water. In Orr-Ewing v. Colquhoun Lord Hatherley, C., speaking of the River Leven, a non-tidal river in Scotland, says:—"There are two totally distinct and different things—the one is the right of property, and the other is the right of navigation. The right of navigation is simply a right of way." Lord Blackburn in the same case says:—"There was evidence of user in this waterway by vessels, such that similar evidence, if the question had been as to the user of a land-way by carriages, would have established the public right." I must treat the claim of the defendant, therefore, as if it were a claim to establish a right of highway on dry land.

Now, in the case of such a claim, a very material consideration is, By whom has the roadway been metalled, repaired, and maintained in order? In a dispute as to the alleged right, the answer to this question may be decisive. Here there has been no maintenance of the waterway by anyone, except that the mill-owner, I suppose to insure the flow of water to his mill, seems to have employed men to dredge out the silt or ballast as it is called. The width and direction are defined by the banks of the river. I asked during the argument if there was any authority for saying that a lake in private grounds, touched at one part only by a public road, could be subjected to a right which would make it a highway by persons launching boats from the road and boating on it for pleasure.

No such authority has been produced. But reference was made to Marshall v. The Ulleswater Co. That case, however, was one in which the right of navigation in the Ulleswater Lake was admitted, although the soil of the bed of the lake was said to be vested in the plaintiff. How the right was acquired does not appear, nor does the actual decision touch any of the questions which have to be decided in this case. The nearest analogy in the case of a way claimed on dry land would be to suppose a track determined by an avenue of trees some miles long in the park or other land of a private owner, to which there was no public access save from a road crossing it at right angles, and to suppose that persons driving along that road had been accustomed, when they pleased, to turn into one or other part of this avenue and drive up and down it for pleasure. Would that user, however long continued, make that avenue a highway? or would the legal inference be that such use, being merely for amusement, had always been permissive, which, of course, could not grow into a right? When it is sought to establish a right by evidence of user it is not enough to say that such a right might be the subject of an actual grant. Lord St. Leonards, C., said, in Dyce v. Lady Hay: "That it does not follow because a right may be granted—i.e., because it is grantable by law—therefore it may be prescribed for." Another important fact is that the way claimed is not a way from one public place to another. In Campbell v. Lang Lord Cranworth, C., said that, speaking generally, "A public right of way means a right to the public of passing from one public place to another public place. It was suggested that, by the law of Scotland, there might be a public right of way from a given public place, but neither terminating in a public place nor leading to a public place. I doubt whether that can be the law of Scotland any more than it is the law of England." The only portion of the way in dispute in that case was across the park of the appellant to the confluence of the rivers Clyde and Cart. But the Lord Chancellor said:—"The abstract question whether the confluence of two rivers can be a terminus a quo or a terminus ad quem of a public right of way does not in the present case arise. The question here is as to a public right of way up to, and which may extend beyond, the confluence—a right to go further on so as ultimately to reach a good terminus ad quem." I have referred to the report of the case in 13 Sess. Cas., 2nd series, 1180, where it is stated that the claim was to a footpath to the confluence of the Clyde and Cart, and communicating with a path along the east bank of the Cart leading to Inshinnan Bridge."

In Young v. Cuthbertson the question arose upon an issue directed whether there existed a public right of way through the appellant's land to Starleyburn, and the appeal was from the disallowance of exceptions to the directions of the Lord Justice Clerk who tried the case. Lord Cranworth, L.C., said:—It was said that the issue was objectionable for this reason, that Starleyburn is not a public place; but even supposing that Starleyburn is not a public place, still if the right of way went beyond it, that would be sufficient. If, indeed, Starleyburn had been a mere private house to which the public had been in the habit of going from Burntisland and returning back again, I believe the case would not have properly come within the description of a public right of way; for the owner might destroy the house and shut up the way, and then there would be an end of it. But here the right of way extended further. It had a public terminus at each end. If Starleyburn were not a public place, then, in order to prove a public right of way, the party must prove that the road to Starleyburn and beyond Starleyburn on to Aberdour was a public road. So held the learned judge and I quite agree."

The right claimed by the defendant in the present action does not, as I have pointed out, fulfil this condition. There is no public access to the river at Cobham Bridge or navigable waterway beyond. Nor do I think there is any public access at Esher Bridge, and it is doubtful if there is at the paper mill. The right claimed is therefore a right of boating up and down in a part of a river which has no public access at one end at any rate.

But it is argued that a cul-de-sac may be a highway. That is so in a street in a town into which houses open and which is repaired, sewered, and lighted by the public authority at the expense of the public. Lord Cranworth instances Connaught-place, which opens into the Edgware-road (Young v. Cuthbertson and see Rugby Charity v. Merryweather). But I am not aware that this law has ever been applied to a long tract of land in the country on which public money has never been expended. This is one obvious objection to the defendant's claim. I have examined the evidence in this case with care. Many of the witnesses were labourers, many were very old persons, speaking from obviously defective recollection. Very many broke down completely under cross-examination. The true result of the evidence is this. As far back as anyone can recollect there has been boating on this part of the River Mole. Originally it was only by the owners and occupiers of land on the banks who kept punts, and then some few boats for the use of themselves and their workmen, and lent them occasionally to friends. Then by degrees, and at first quite secretly, a few persons occupying land on the river bank began to take remuneration for lending their boats. They did not make any charge, but received what the borrower chose to give. In one case, it is said, a shoulder of mutton was given by a butcher for the use of a boat, though the alleged recipient denies it. In another case the boat-owner, meeting a man who had borrowed it, suggested to him that he had made no payment, and apologized for the suggestion by saying that it was a perquisite for his son, who took care of the boat. The persons who so began to let boats were chiefly the successive occupants of a cottage near Esher Bridge. This cottage had a garden which went down to the river, and within the garden was a creek leading from the river next to the bridge road, in which boats were kept. These cottagers were intrusted with the care of boats belonging to private owners; and by degrees acquired one or two boats of their own, and let or lent these in the manner I have described. Besides this, adventurous persons from the neighbourhood of Walton or Thames Ditton, and sometimes from London, have hired canoes and sometimes boats from boat builders on the Thames, and sent them on to the Mole, generally, by the road to the Paper Mill, for a day's excursion in the summer time, and this practice has been more frequent of late years till somewhat interfered with by the defendant's letting of boats. This growing practice of boating for pleasure, including fishing, has not been effectively interfered with till the plaintiff put his obstruction across the stream. There is some evidence that Mr. Spicer, who owned land below Esher Bridge, made objection to persons who were not landowners on the river. One of these owners, Sir Richard Frederick, also made objection, and since 1864 there has been a notice fixed up near the river, in one part of this section of it, warning persons against trespassing in boats for fishing or otherwise. Probably the riparian owners did not care to interfere with one another in boating, if they had the right to interfere, and it was not easy to distinguish strangers. The real owners of the bed of the stream under the Crown grant in 1820 had no land on this part of it. They did not interfere.

How does this evidence establish that the river is a highway? On the one hand, the court would be reluctant to interfere with a healthy recreation for the people, especially in a populous district like Esher, and within reach of such a city as London. On the other, care must be taken that private property is not unduly invaded. If the defendant is right, he or any other person in England may launch any number of canoes, boats, barges, steam-launches, or the like upon this river, fill it with a crowd of pleasure-seekers, and utterly destroy the privacy of those who have houses on the stream. The use at present made of it by the public is very inconsiderable, and an interference will do very little harm to anyone except to the defendant in his business of letting boats. I cannot overlook these considerations, though they do not determine the questions of law involved in this dispute.

Upon these questions my opinion is against the defendant. His claim is to impose on land a new servitude, or rather to establish a highway under conditions which are inconsistent with a right of that kind. I think the true inference from all the evidence is that the use made of the river has been permissive, and not of right. It is material to that question that much of the evidence shows that those who boated on this river did so in many cases for the purpose of fishing. There is no pretence that there is any public right of fishing, or any evidence that could establish such a right. The fishing, then, must have been permissive, and it is difficult to say that boating for that purpose could have been of right. Moreover, the mode in which those who let boats took remuneration shows they were aware it would probably be objected to, if known, and that they clearly understood that strangers only boated there by tolerance. It is possible that the riparian proprietors may be able to establish a private right of way, or a right of boating for recreation for themselves and their friends by custom.

I do not give any opinion on the question whether there is any such right or custom. Neither would entitle the public to boat on the river or support the claim that it is a highway. Even if the boating of the public, so far as they have used it, was not permissive, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that the defendant has not proved that this part of the River Mole is a highway, and, as his claim is that and nothing else, I dismiss his counter-claim with costs. As the defendant is not a riparian proprietor, and only claims as one of the public, he had no right to remove the obstruction placed by the plaintiff in the river. But I must take it to be clear that the plaintiff, when he placed that obstruction in the river, was acting under a supposed right to the bed of the river as riparian proprietor, which he now admits he had not. Under the grant from the real owners, he has since obtained the soil of the river bed, and may now maintain that obstruction against the defendant at any rate. There must, therefore, be an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with it. I give no costs of the plaintiff's action, but order him to pay the defendant's costs of it up to the time when the new writ was issued. I think the evidence should all be treated as taken on the counter-claim, except the proof of the plaintiff's title; and the costs of the evidence, with that exception, must be paid by the defendant. The summons by the defendant to have this action tried by a jury I refuse with costs. There must be the usual directions for set-off. I desire to call the attention of the profession to a matter of importance, which has been forcibly brought to my notice in this case—I mean the duty of commissioners to administer oaths where a witness is swearing to the contents of an affidavit. In this case certain witnesses contradicted the statements made by them in affidavits sworn in this cause in such a startling manner that I required an explanation of the mode in which those affidavits were sworn. The commissioner before whom they were sworn attended in court, and in answer to questions from me he informed me that he went with a solicitor in the cause to the houses of the several witnesses; that the affidavits were not read over in his presence, and that he took no means to ascertain whether the witnesses knew to what they were swearing. I was told by counsel that this mode of performing the duty of a commissioner to administer oaths was not uncommon. I must express my strong disapproval of such a practice. The commissioner's duty before he administers the oath is to satisfy himself that the witness does thoroughly understand what he is going to swear to; and he should not be satisfied on this point by anyone but the witness himself. For this reason it has been the rule since the time of Lord Hardwicke that the court does not accept an affidavit sworn before the solicitor in the cause, nor his clerk, although he may be a commissioner: In re Hogan, 3 Atk. 813; Wood v. Harpur, 3 Beav. 290; Hopkin v. Hopkin, 1 W. R. 275, 10 Hare App. 2; Duke of Northumberland v. Todd, 26 W. R. 350, 7 Ch. D. 780. The court requires the security of an independent commissioner, and it is obvious that he ought not to take only the statement of a solicitor in the cause that the witness knows what is in the affidavit. Where, as in this case, many of the witnesses are in a humble position of life, I do not see how the commissioner can be satisfied without having the affidavits read over in his presence. If an educated man says to him, "I have read over this affidavit, to the truth of which I am going to swear," and all the statements are accurate, that may in some cases be sufficient. But I confess I wish that it was made incumbent upon the commissioner in every case to go through the affidavit with the witness, and to refuse to take his oath until he was satisfied that the witness understood and intended every statement in it. A great deal of false swearing would be prevented if this were done.

Solicitors, Lewis & Lewis; Thomas Noton.

Chan. Div.
Chitty, J. } July 19; Aug. 2, 1889.

In re ROBERTSON (A SOLICITOR). (a.)

Solicitor—Taxation of costs—Third party—Delivery of bill—Petition of course—Service of order—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

The common form allegation in a petition of course that the solicitor "delivered to your petitioners his bill of fees and disbursements" is a material allegation which is not satisfied by a merely constructive delivery.

The ordinary practice as to delivery of bills of costs by mortgagees' and by trustees' solicitors, stated.

Motion.

Certain copyholds belonging to two co-owners were sold in September, 1888, to a purchaser named Frere. Robertson and Bird, solicitors, acted jointly in the sale, though Bird had the actual conduct of the sale. In October, 1888, Frere wrote to Bird, whom he believed to be sole solicitor for the vendors, requesting him to arrange for the enfranchisement of the copyholds, so that they might be conveyed as freehold, and saying that he would pay Bird the charges and expenses. Bird informed Robertson of the letter, and asked him to take the necessary steps for the enfranchisement so far as Robertson's clients were concerned.

In May, 1889, Robertson was requested by Bird to send all his costs to him, and he made out his bill relating to the enfranchisement, addressed to his clients, amounting to £17 7s., which he sent to Bird, who sent it on to Frere. In sending the bill to Bird, Robertson wrote saying he was not aware of the nature of the undertaking as to costs between the purchaser and vendors, and was doubtful what costs could be properly included; on the next day he wrote to Frere, stating that he had sent his bill of costs to Bird, but that as he did not know the terms of the undertaking he feared some of the costs might prove inaccurate. Frere disputed the bill of costs, and Robertson then offered to withdraw it, and make out a fresh bill strictly as against the purchaser, or to obtain payment of his costs from Bird, leaving him to obtain them from Frere. This Frere declined.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 17th of June, 1889, Frere obtained an ordinary third-party order for taxation on the usual petition of course by a third party, containing the usual allegation that on or about the 28th day of May the said solicitor "delivered unto the petitioner his bill of fees and disbursements which the petitioner is liable to pay," under which, in Robertson's absence, the bill was taxed down to £5 3s. Robertson alleged that he had never been served with the order to tax, though he admitted notice of two appointments had been sent him from the taxing master's office.

Robertson now moved that all further proceedings under this order might be stayed, and that it might be discharged as irregular.

Oswald, for the motion.—First, Robertson was never served with the order to tax. Secondly, Robertson never delivered any bill of costs to Frere: In re Carven, 8 Beav. 426; In re Grundy, Kershaw, & Co., 29 W. R. 581; 17 Ch. D. 108.

Farwell, for Frere, contrà [Chitty, J., referred to In re Brown, 15 W. R. 1030, L. R. 4 Eq. 464].

Oswald replied.

Chitty, J.—In this case Mr. Frere has obtained the common third-party order to tax, and the order contains what seems, from the various forms that I have been able to look at, to be the usual and common allegation in a third-party order, that the solicitor has "delivered" the bill "to the petitioner," the person whose right to tax of course arises under the 38th section. The facts in the present case, however, show no direct delivery to Mr. Frere. [His lordship, after referring to Robertson's statement that he was not aware of the exact terms of the purchaser's undertaking as to the costs of the enfranchisement, to the fact that the purchaser was not aware that there was more than one solicitor acting in the matter, and to Robertson's offer to deliver a fresh bill of costs, continued:—] Now I am going to decide this case on what, after all, may well be rather a narrow ground, but what I am satisfied, in point of law, is the correct ground. There are several ordinary, or what I may call "typical," third-party cases—cases where the mortgagor is liable to pay the costs of his own mortgagee. In such a case as that, where the bill is taxed as between the mortgagor on the one hand and the mortgagee's solicitor on the other, the mortgagor is entitled to stand in the position of the mortgagee himself.

Now the delivery in the ordinary practice by the mortgagee's solicitor of his bill of costs is not to his own client, but it is to the mortgagor or to the mortgagor's solicitor, and consequently one finds that in the common form in the orders there is an allegation that the mortgagor has had the bill delivered to him by the mortgagor's solicitors. I think, for the reasons which I am now about to state, that that is a material allegation, because there are cases in which the bill which the solicitor delivers to his own client, the mortgagee, is a bill which would be absolutely right as between himself and the mortgagee, though possibly not so between himself and the mortgagor. The mortgagee might have told his solicitor to do certain things; the solicitor might have explained, in his ordinary course of duty, "I will do that for you, but recollect, if it is done, you cannot charge the mortgagor." The mortgagee might say, "Well, I will have it done," and then the solicitor delivers his bill to the mortgagee, which is a proper bill as between the two. That bill is not delivered, I will assume, in point of fact, to the mortgagor or his solicitor. Can the mortgagor obtain taxation of it upon an allegation that the bill has been "delivered to him"? In my opinion he cannot. I think the delivery of the bill cannot mean a constructive delivery of the bill, and there would be no constructive delivery of the bill in the case which I have just put.

So also in the case of a trustee and cestuis que trust, where the trustee employs his own solicitor. That is an ordinary typical case. In that case the trustee may have given special instructions to the solicitor which would warrant him and justify him as between himself and his individual client, the trustee, in making certain charges; upon that the solicitor might draw out his bill and send it in to the trustee, but I think that that could not be called a "delivery." Certainly it cannot be said in point of fact to be delivery to the cestuis que trust, and I think in the case I am putting it would not be right to hold that constructively it was a delivery of the bill to the cestuis que trust. There may be cases, of course, in which the bill has been paid, as was the case in In re Brown—a case in which the bill had been paid out of the trust estate. I am not putting that case at all, I am putting the case of the unpaid bill, but I think justice would be done to the solicitor in such a case as that, and that he would be entitled to charge his own individual client with the work which he had done, though he would not have a right to charge, and could not charge, the same bill as against the estate.

I am not prepared to assent to the proposition of constructive delivery. Of course there may be upon the facts such a case as I am going to state, that the bill is sent to the mortgagee simply for the purpose of his handing it over to the mortgagor in such a way that, upon the facts, the court might fairly hold that it was a delivery, and upon the particular facts before me there is certainly some ground for saying in the first instance that this bill of Mr. Robertson's was sent with that view. But then I must look at all the circumstances of the case, and it appears to me that there was a right on the part of the solicitor in this case, as between himself on the one hand and Mr. Frere on the other, to withdraw the bill and to recast it. There is, of course, one of the points in dispute. Where there has been a delivery of a bill the solicitor cannot withdraw it for the purpose of escaping taxation. That is the established law on the matter, and, if the bill had been actually delivered to Mr. Frere, Mr. Robertson could certainly not have withdrawn the bill; but, in the circumstances of this case, I think the allegation in the petition is not made out in point of fact, and that, as I have explained, it is a material allegation, and, therefore, though I wish to make no unnecessary reflection on either side, the case is, in my opinion, one in which I ought first to discharge the order, on the ground that there was that mistake in the obligation as to delivery; and, secondly, I think, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and to what I consider the trumpery and trifling nature of the whole thing, the justice of the case will be met if I discharge the order without costs.

Solicitors, Harold A. Farman; Frere & Co.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } May 29; June 4, 1889.

In re PAUNCEFORT.

CORPORATION OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY v. CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD.

University—College—Exhibitions—Conditions of tenure—"Holy orders"—College statutes—Universities Tests Act, 1871, ss. 2, 3—Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877, ss. 2, 12, 14, 17, 51.

P., who died in 1726, by his will, dated in 1723, gave certain property to a corporation upon trust that the income thereof should "be equally divided between ten of the servitors of Christ Church College in Oxford, such as the dean, two of the canons, and six of the senior students of the said college shall recommend under their hands for their sobriety, diligence at their studies, and of parts fit for a minister of the Gospel and designed for holy orders."

By the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877, commissioners were appointed, who were empowered to make new statutes for any college (inter alia) for altering or regulating the conditions of eligibility or appointment to any emolument or office held in and connected with a college. The Act also provided for appeals against such statutes when made, and enacted that, in framing them, the commissioners should have regard to the original intention of the founder. Under this Act the commissioners made certain statutes for Christ Church, one of which provided that the P. foundation should be applied to the support of college exhibitioners, who should be elected after examination in such subjects and in such manner as the governing body should determine. No appeal was made by the corporation against this provision.

Held, that the commissioners had power under the Act to make this provision, and that, inasmuch as no appeal against it had been made by the corporation, it was now binding, and that the P. exhibitions must now be regulated thereby, without regard to the provision contained in the will relative to the fitness of the exhibitioners for ministers of the Gospel and designed for holy orders.

Adjourned summons.

Edward Pauncefort, who died in 1726, by his will, dated the 26th of May, 1723, directed his executors out of his personal estate to purchase land and hereditaments of good fee simple estate of the clear yearly value of £100, and when purchased to convey the same to the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy and their successors, upon trust by and out of the annual rents and profits of the said lands to pay to eight ministers' widows of honest repute and known industry £5 per annum each as therein mentioned, and "upon further trust that the residue of the rents and profits of the lands that shall be so purchased and settled shall be equally divided between ten of the servitors of Christ Church College in Oxford, such as the dean, two of the canons, and six of the senior students of the said college shall recommend under their hands, for their sobriety and diligence at their studies and of parts fit for a minister of the Gospel and designed for holy orders, the same to be paid yearly on the feast-day of the Sons of the Clergy." The Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy above mentioned was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1678 for the purpose of receiving and distributing funds for the benefit of the widows and children of clergy of the Church of England, and they hold various properties and funds, some of which are applicable for special trusts.

In pursuance of the directions contained in the will, the executors, shortly after the death of the testator, purchased certain lands, and the rents whereof were applied as directed down to 1856, when they were sold and the proceeds invested in Consols in the name of the corporation.

Since this trust came into operation down to the year 1887 it had been the practice of the corporation to pay over the income of the fund which represented this benefaction upon a certificate signed by the dean, two of the canons, and six of the senior students of Christ Church, certifying that the persons named in that certificate were servitors of Christ Church, and possessed the qualifications which were mentioned in the will of the testator. But recently the question had arisen whether that course ought any longer to be pursued, and whether, in point of fact, the qualifications which were attached by the testator to this benefaction ought to be regarded as any longer in force or required in order to entitle the servitors, or the exhibitioners who had taken their place, to the benefit of the charitable trust declared by the will.

The present summons was, therefore, taken out by the corporation against the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church and others, and it asked for the determination of the questions: (1) Who were entitled to the residue of the income of the trust estate by the will directed to be divided as therein mentioned? (2) Whether the plaintiffs ought to pay the residue of the income to the defendant corporation for division amongst persons recommended by the dean, two of the canons, and six of the students without such persons having been recommended as of parts fit for a minister of the Gospel and designed for holy orders? (3) What conditions (if any) were attached to the gift, and what certificate or recommendation the plaintiffs were entitled to demand before payment of the residue of the income to the defendant corporation?

The statutes and ordinances dealing with college emoluments and foundations, so far as they are material to the present question, are the following:—

By the Oxford University Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 81), commissioners were appointed who were empowered to make ordinances in the events thereby provided.

By section 26 of one of these ordinances it was provided: "It shall be lawful for the dean and chapter to alter in such manner as they think fit the designation of the servitors, and to apply the exhibitions of the foundation of Archbishop Boulter for servitors, Mr. Pauncefort, Dr. Gardiner, Bishop Frampton, Dr. Cotton, and Mrs. Paul, to the support of the persons bearing altered designations."

By the Christ Church, Oxford, Act, 1867, two ordinances, dated respectively the 9th of January and 16th of April, 1858, which had been made for Christ Church by the commissioners under the Act of 1854, were repealed and the ordinance set forth in the schedule to the Act was substituted therefor. The latter part of the first clause of such new ordinance provided that "the servitorships existing within the house shall be maintained either under that designation, or under such new designation as the governing body hereinafter mentioned may determine; and the exhibitions of the foundation of Archbishop Boulter for servitors, Mr. Pauncefort, Dr. Gardiner, Bishop Frampton, Dr. Cotton, and Mrs. Paul, may, in the latter case, be applied to the support of persons bearing such altered designation."

By the University Tests Act, 1871 (34 Vict. c. 26), s. 2, the word "college" includes the cathedral or house of Christ Church in Oxford; and "office" includes (inter alia) every "studentship, tutorship, scholarship, and exhibition, and also any office or emolument not in this section specified, the income of which is payable out of the revenues of any of the said universities"—i.e., Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham—"or any college within the said universities, or which is held or enjoyed by any member as such of the said universities, or of any college within any of the said universities."

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 3 it is provided that persons taking lay academical degrees or holding lay academical or collegiate offices are not to be required to subscribe any formulary of faith, &c. "Provided that (1) Nothing in this section shall render a layman or a person not a member of the Church of England eligible to any office or capable of exercising any right or privilege in any of the said universities or colleges, which office, right, or privilege, under the authority of any Act of Parliament or any statute or ordinance of such university or college in force at the time of the passing of this Act, is restricted to persons in holy orders, or shall remove any obligation to enter into holy orders which is by such authority attached to any such office."

By the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 48), two bodies of commissioners were appointed, for a limited period, for the purpose of revising the statutes of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and their respective colleges and halls, and for making new ones.

The more material parts of the statute are the following:—

By section 2 "college" is defined as including the cathedral or house of Christ Church in Oxford; and "emolument" as including, among other things, "servitorship, sizarship, sub-sizarship, or other place in the university, or a college or hall, having attached thereto an income payable out of the revenues of the university, or of a college or hall, or being a place to be held and enjoyed by a head or other member of a college or hall as such, or having attached thereto an income to be so held and enjoyed, arising wholly or in part from an endowment, benefaction, or trust."

By section 12 power is given to the commissioners to make statutes for the university and for any college or hall.

By section 14 "the commissioners, in making a statute affecting a university or college emolument, shall have regard to the main design of the founder, except where the same has ceased to be observed before the passing of this Act, or where the trusts, conditions, or directions affecting the emolument have been altered in substance by or under any other Act."

By section 17 "the commissioners, in statutes made by them for a college, may from time to time make provision for the following purposes relative to the college, or any of them:—

"(1) For altering and regulating the conditions of eligibility or appointment, including, where it seems fit, those relating to age, to any emolument or office held in or connected with the college, the mode of election or appointment thereto, and the value, length, and conditions of tenure thereof, and for providing a retiring pension for a holder thereof: . . .

"(8) For modifying the trusts, conditions, or directions affecting any college endowment, foundation, or gift, or any property belonging to the college, or the head or any member thereof as such, as far as the commissioners think the modification thereof necessary or expedient for giving effect to statutes made by them for the college."

The Act further contains provisions (section 44) for the constitution of a committee to be styled the Universities Committee of the Privy Council; (section 45) for the submission by the commissioners of statutes made by them to the Queen in Council; and (section 46) for petitions to the Queen in Council by governing bodies and others directly affected by such statutes for their disallowance.

By section 51, "Every statute or part of a statute made by the commissioners, and approved by Order in Council, shall be binding on the university, and on every college and hall; and shall be effectual, notwithstanding any instrument of foundation or any Act of Parliament, Order in Council, decree, order, statute, or other instrument or thing constituting wholly or in part an instrument of foundation, or confirming or varying a foundation or endowment, or otherwise regulating the university, or a college, or hall."

By section 57 nothing in the Act is to be construed to repeal any provision of the Universities Tests Act, 1871; and by section 58, "Where the commissioners, by any statute made by them, erect or endow an office declared by them in the statute to require in the incumbent thereof the possession of theological learning which (notwithstanding anything in this Act) they are hereby empowered to do, provided the office be not a headship or fellowship of a college, then the Universities Tests Act, 1871, shall, with reference to that office, be read and have effect as if the statute had been made before and was in operation at the passing of the Universities Tests Act, 1871."

Under the last mentioned Act the Oxford Commissioners made certain statutes for Christ Church, of which clause 23 was as follows:—

"The exhibitions of the foundations of Archbishop Boulter for servitors, Mr. Paunceefort, Dr. Gardiner, Bishop Frampton, Dr. Cotton, and Mrs. Paul, shall be applied to the support of college exhibitioners, who shall be elected after examination in such subjects and such manner as the governing body shall determine. Notice of each election shall be given in the same manner as that prescribed above for the election of open scholars, and the exhibitioner shall be elected at first for two years only, the tenure of these exhibitions being renewable in the same manner as that allowed for scholarships, and on the same terms. No person shall be appointed to one of these exhibitions unless he shall give sufficient proof to the dean of his need of such assistance to enable him to obtain the benefit of a university education."

Clause 22 dealt with open scholarships, and it provided:—"There shall be an election to five open scholarships in every year; they shall be tenable for two years from the day of election, if the person elected be already a member of the university, if otherwise, from the Midsummer Day next following, and (at the expiration of such two years) shall then determine unless the governing body have by resolution declared themselves satisfied with the industry and good conduct of the scholar, in which case the scholar's tenure shall be renewed for a further term of two years."

Rigby, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the corporation.—Assuming that this is an emolument within the Act of 1877, the commissioners, in framing the statutes for Christ Church, had no jurisdiction to disregard the express design of the founder, which was to impose a religious qualification upon the holders of his exhibitions. We submit, however, that this is not an emolument within the Act, and that the exhibitioners are not holders of any "office" within the meaning of the Universities Tests Act, 1871.

Buckley, Q.C., and Kingdon, for the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church and the exhibitioners.—The exhibitioners are holders of an "office" within the Act of 1871. Further, the commissioners had power to make these statutes under the Act of 1877, which have been duly approved as required by the Act. No appeal was ever made against them, and they are therefore now binding. The corporation cannot, therefore, now require that the recipients of this benefaction shall be designed for holy orders.

They referred to Attorney-General v. Sidney Sussex College, L. R. 4 Ch. 722, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 148; Reg. v. Hertford College, 27 W. R. 347, 3 Q. B. D. 693.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General, supported the contention of the other defendants.

June 4.—STIRLING, J., stated the will and continued:—Now, that benefaction is one which had in contemplation that the recipients of it should be intended for holy orders in the Church of England. It also appears, I think, plainly enough on the face of this will that poverty was to be an element in the qualification of the person to whom the benefaction was to be made. [His lordship then stated the facts and the provisions of the various statutes and ordinances above set forth. With reference to clause 26 of the statutes made under the powers contained in the Act of 1854, his lordship observed that it clearly did not in any way affect the conditions of tenure or eligibility to this benefaction, but simply provided that if the clergy saw fit to alter the designation of the servitors the exhibitions on the foundation might be applied for the persons bearing the altered designation. As to the Universities Tests Act, 1871, it did not appear to his lordship to be necessary for the decision of the case that he should express any opinion as to the effect of that Act on the tenure of those exhibitions, and, therefore, he desired to abstain altogether from in any way expressing any opinion on the construction of the statute. His lordship then referred to the Act of 1877, and continued:—] Now, first of all, what is the meaning of clause 23 of the statutes of Christ Church? It seems to me that the commissioners who framed the statute have thereby declared that these exhibitions of the foundation of Mr. Pauncefort are to be applied to the support of college exhibitioners, to be elected after examination in such manner as the governing body shall determine, the notice of election to be given in the same manner as that prescribed for the election of open scholars, and the tenure of the exhibitions is to be for two years only, but renewable in the same manner as the scholarships, and on the same terms; and they have attached to the tenure of these exhibitions this condition, that the holder shall give sufficient proof of his need of such assistance to enable him to obtain the benefit of a university education. I confess I cannot bring my mind to doubt but that the framers of the statutes intended that the conditions laid down in the 23rd clause of the statutes should be the conditions, and the only conditions, of eligibility for the tenure of these exhibitions.

Then the next question is, Had they power to make such an ordinance with reference to the exhibitions? I think they had. The first part of section 17 of the Act of 1877 seems to me to be enough to determine the question. It provides that "The commissioners, in statutes made by them for a college, may from time to time make provision for the following purposes relative to the college or any of them:—For altering and regulating the conditions of eligibility or appointment, including, where it seems fit, those relating to age, to any emolument or office held in or connected with the college, the mode of election or appointment thereto, and the value, length, and conditions of tenure thereof." Is this an emolument held in or connected with the college? The definition of "emolument" includes an exhibition, and by a series of statutes, one of which has received the express sanction of the Legislature, this benefaction is described as an exhibition of the foundation of Mr. Pauncefort. It seems to me this was an exhibition, and therefore an emolument and held in Christ Church. It was held nowhere else certainly. That would seem to me to be enough. But the commissioners have also power to make provision "for modifying the trusts, conditions, or directions affecting a college endowment, foundation, or gift"; and, again, it would seem to me that it would fall under those words, and that they have power under those words to do what they have done.

But then it is said that section 14 requires them to have regard to the main design of the founder "except where the same has ceased to be observed before the passing of this Act, or where the trusts, conditions, or directions affecting the emolument have been altered in substance by or under any other Act." It is not for me to criticise what the commissioners have done. The commissioners, as it was pointed out during the argument, were men of the greatest possible eminence. They were dealing with the endowments of the Universities and Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge as a whole, and they had probably means of judging which are not open to me. But, however that may be, no doubt the Legislature thought that difficult questions might arise as to which different opinions might fairly be entertained, and for that purpose they provided that the decision of the commissioners with reference to such matters should not be final, but that there should be an appeal to the Universities Committee of the Privy Council; and it is enough for me to say that, having looked as carefully as I can at the documents in this case, I think the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy might very fairly have laid before the commissioners, or before the University Committee of the Privy Council, the facts which they have laid before me on this summons, and might have urged that these exhibitions ought to be devoted for what they have termed the professional education of clergymen, and might have asked that regard should be paid to the intention of the founder as shown in his will. However, that course was not taken, and the statutes as a whole have been approved. I think, therefore, that section 51 of the Act of 1877 applies, and that this statute is binding on the college, and is effectual, notwithstanding any instrument of foundation.

It seems to me, accordingly, that the 23rd clause of the statutes framed by the commissioners for Christ Church now regulates the conditions of eligibility to these exhibitions and their tenure, and that the corporation can no longer require from the dean, canons, and students of Christ Church a certificate in the form in which they have hitherto been in the habit of giving one, but that they are bound to pay over the fund in question for division among the persons who are entitled to the funds as exhibitioners under the 23rd clause of the present statutes, and that a certificate to that effect is all that the corporation can at present require.

Solicitors, Bridges, Sawtell, Heywood, & Co.; Baker, Folder, & Upperton; The Solicitor to the Treasury.

Chan. Div. }
Kekewich, J. } June 5, 1889.

In re BACH'S DESIGN. (a.)

Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 47—Design—Registration in a different class of design already registered—New material—Novelty.

A design which was already registered in one class was registered in another class for a similar article, but made of a different material.

Held, that the difference of material did not make the design "new or original" within section 47 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and that it must be removed from the register.

Le May v. Welch, 33 W. R. 33, 28 Ch. D. 24, followed.

Motion to rectify the register of designs under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

F. W. Bach on the 1st of April, 1886, registered in Class 4 (No. 46,391) the design of a lamp shade made of porcelain in the form of a rose for fairy lamps or night-lights. In 1888 he commenced an action in the Queen's Bench Division against the Army and Navy Co-operative Society for damages and for an injunction to restrain the infringement of his copyright in the design.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defence of want of novelty was set up, and a motion was made on behalf of the defendants in the Chancery Division for rectification of the register by the removal therefrom of the plaintiff's design, on the ground that it was neither new nor original. This was the hearing of the motion. The defendants showed that on the 22nd of January, 1886, one W. H. Reed had registered in Class 12 a linen shade in the shape of a rose for lamps and candles, and that these shades had been sold immediately after the registration by Reed and by the defendants. Lamp shades of porcelain in the form of flowers had also been sold before the date of the plaintiff's registration.

Aston, Q.C., and Macrory, for the motion.—The only claim that Bach can make to novelty or originality in this design is that the material used is different from that used by Reed; but that is not enough: Le May v. Welch, 33 W. R. 33, 28 Ch. D. 24; Smith v. Hope, 6 Rep. Pat. Cas. 200.

Chadwyck Healey and Munroe, for Bach.—The difference of material is important here, china being non-inflammable. Our registration is in a different class, and therefore we are protected by sub-section (4) of section 47.

They cited Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co., 4 Rep. Pat. Cas. 390; Holdsworth v. M'Crea, 16 W. R. 226, L. R. 2 H. L. 380; Harrison v. Taylor, 4 H. & N. 815, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 18.

KEKEWICH, J.—The appeal in a case of this kind is, as has been said in argument, both in the first instance and in the last resort, to the eye, and on that appeal my eyes are against the respondent. Mr. Reed designed a lamp shade in the form of a rose, and registered it in a particular class. Mr. Bach tried to improve upon that, and in one sense he has improved upon it, for his shade, made of china, is not open to the obvious objection which affected the linen shade of Mr. Reed. He was thus enabled to make further improvements by narrowing the aperture, and, as is suggested, increasing the illuminating power. But the real question is, did he or did he not adopt the design of Mr. Reed? For the Act says, section 4, that what may be registered is "any new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom."

I may dismiss the question of publication here, for there is no evidence of publication in the sense of sale before the date of Bach's registration; but apart from that, the design must be new or original. I find a principle upon which to base my decision in the judgment of Fry, L.J., in Le May v. Welch. He says:—"The meaning of the words 'novel or original' is this, that the design must either be substantially novel or substantially original having regard to the nature and character of the subject-matter to which it is to be applied." "Subject-matter," as used in this passage, does not mean the material, but the purpose, of the design, and here in each case the purpose was to produce a lamp-shade; the subject-matter was identical. Dismissing the second alternative, "substantially original," I ask, What is there here that is "substantially new"? If I look at the specimens before me of Mr. Reed's and Mr. Bach's roses I see distinctions, but not more than the difference of material would naturally produce. But I am entitled to look also at the design which was actually registered by Mr. Bach, and taking that and comparing it with Mr. Reed's production, the similarity is so great that it is difficult to distinguish the one from the other. As a matter of eyesight the design is precisely the same.

A Scotch case which was cited, Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co. shows that you may have a design used for cabinet doors and yet well registered as applied to kitchen range doors. But that is not like the present case. Here we have a design applied, not to a different purpose, but to the same purpose as the previously registered design. As to sub-section (4) of section 47 it is quite true that a design may be registered in one class for particular goods although it has been already applied to goods of an entirely different character in another class. But that sub-section does not say, and cannot have intended to say, that by selecting a different class a man may register, as applied to certain articles (such as lamp shades), a design which has already been registered as applied to the same articles, merely varying the material in which the articles are made.

It seems to me that there is no novelty in this design it has, therefore, not complied with the provisions of the statute, and the application must be granted, with costs.

Solicitors for the applicants, Tyrrell, Lewis, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Alsop & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) Oct. 30, 1889.

Ex parte COLLINS.
In re YARROW. (a.)

Bill of sale—Hiring agreement—Registration—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.

In 1887 a dissolution of partnership was agreed upon between the bankrupt and J. F. W., who had previously carried on business together as saw mill proprietors, and, in order to provide the sum of £365 required to pay out the retiring partner, the bankrupt applied to W. W., his partner's brother, who was a solicitor, to advance him £650. An agreement was come to between the bankrupt and W. W., by which the bankrupt sold to W. W. certain of his machinery in consideration of £650. The machinery was to remain in the possession of the bankrupt upon certain terms, and the £650 was to be repaid by instalments extending over ten years. A receipt was given by the bankrupt for the £650, which was specified to be in full payment for the engine, boiler, and machinery agreed to be sold at that price on the termination of the partnership, and a hire-purchase agreement was drawn up, purporting to be made between W. W., called the "owner," and the bankrupt, called the "hirer," whereby the said machinery was let to the bankrupt upon the terms and conditions therein specified. Neither the receipt nor the hiring agreement were registered under the Bills of Sale Acts, and, the bankrupt having filed his petition, the machinery was claimed by his trustee as forming part of the bankrupt's estate.

Held, that there was no document which required to be registered as a bill of sale, and that the trustee was not entitled to the proceeds derived from the sale of the machinery.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order declaring that a certain receipt given by the bankrupt to one William Weymouth, and a certain hiring agreement made between the bankrupt and William Weymouth, were, under the Bills of Sale Acts, void against the trustee, and that the sum of £279, being the proceeds of the sale of the goods covered by the agreement, belonged to him.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The bankrupt was a saw mill proprietor, carrying on business at Upper Holloway, and in 1883 he took into partnership one J. F. Weymouth, who brought the sum of £500 into the business, which was afterwards carried on under the style of Yarrow & Co. In 1887 J. F. Weymouth was desirous of dissolving the partnership, and he agreed to take for his share the sum of £365 which was then standing to the credit of his capital account in the books of the firm. In order to provide that sum the bankrupt applied to William Weymouth, the brother of his partner, who was a solicitor, to advance him a sum of £650, and, after some negotiation, an agreement was come to between the bankrupt and William Weymouth by which the bankrupt sold to William Weymouth certain of his machinery in consideration of the sum of £650. The machinery was to remain in the possession of the debtor, and the £650 was to be repaid by certain instalments as provided by a hiring agreement to be entered into.

Prior to the execution of the agreement William Weymouth paid to the bankrupt two sums of £50 and £25 respectively on account of the £650, for which I. O. U.'s were given, and also the sum of £575, making in all the sum of £650, and on May 9, 1887, the partnership was dissolved, the sum of £365 being paid, as agreed upon, to J. F. Weymouth by the bankrupt.

On May 16 the following receipt was handed by the bankrupt to William Weymouth:—"Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your cheque for £575, making, with £50 and £25 already paid me by you, the sum of £650, in full payment for the engine, boiler, and machinery which I agreed to sell you at that price on the termination of my partnership with your brother.—J. T. YARROW."

Immediately after the dissolution of partnership was gazetted an agreement was drawn up which purported to be made between William Weymouth (called the "owner") and the bankrupt (called the "hirer"), whereby, after reciting that after the dissolution of the partnership the several articles mentioned in the schedule were purchased by and now belonged to the owner, and are admitted to be of such value that the amount thereof, if paid by instalments extending over ten years, with interest, would be £1,005, and that it had been agreed to enter into the arrangement hereafter contained, the hirer thereby agreed to pay the owner by way of rent for the articles £50 half yearly, to pay all rent for the saw mills where the articles remained, and not to part with the possession or remove the articles, or to assign the mills; on non-payment of any instalment or breach of any of the conditions of the agreement by the hirer, or on seizure of the articles, the agreement was to be determined, and the owner or his agents might re-enter and re-take the articles, and all payments made were to be forfeited to the owner; when the hirer had paid £1,000 he might, on giving notice to the owner and on paying an additional £5, purchase the articles; until the whole £1,000 and £5 were paid the articles were to remain the property of the owner, and are only let on hire by him, but on payment as above they were to become the property of the hirer.

Neither the receipt nor the agreement were registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

The debtor failed to pay the instalments under the agreement, and on December 20, 1888, he filed his petition in bankruptcy.

The machinery was sold, and realized £279 after deducting expenses, which sum the trustee claimed as belonging to the bankrupt's estate.

Herbert Reed, for the trustee.—The whole transaction here amounted to a bill of sale, and as there was no document registered under the Bills of Sale Acts, the money belongs to the trustee. Of course, if transactions such as these are separate and distinct, the Bills of Sale Acts will not apply. In this hiring agreement there was a licence to seize as security for the payment of the debt, and it ought to have been registered. There was no real transfer of the property here. The case is covered by Gapp v. Bond, 35 W. R. 683, 19 Q. B. D. 200, reported only on another point, but the shorthand writer's note shows that these questions were decided. The point is whether it can be said that the real transaction was one of loan secured by the hiring agreement on these chattels.

He also referred to In re Shane, 29 SOLICITORS JOURNAL, 70; Ex parte Odell, In re Walden, 27 W. R. 274, 10 Ch. D. 76; Ex parte Cooper, In re Baum, 27 W. R. 298, 299, 10 Ch. D. 313.

H. Greenwood, for the respondent.—The case of Gapp v. Bond is inconsistent with Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. North Central Wagon Co., 37 W. R. 305, 13 App. Cas. 554. A hiring agreement is not a document which requires to be registered under the Bills of Sale Acts: Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, 30 W. R. 761, 21 Ch. D. 309. Here there was no equity of redemption in Yarrow.

He also referred to Redhead v. Westwood, 59 L. T. N. S. 293.

CAVE, J.—The question in this case is one of a class which it is always most difficult to decide. There is no darker page in the annals of English jurisprudence than the law of bills of sale. Although it is a recent enactment it is most illogical, uncertain, and full of doubt and difficulty, and the particular question to be decided here is a very good illustration of those doubts and difficulties.

The first matter to be determined is whether there was in this case a loan, or whether there was a sale, followed by a hire and purchase agreement. In order to determine that question it is necessary to see in what sense the question is put. If it is asked in what form the transaction was, the answer is that in form it was a sale followed by a letting on hire. If it is asked what it was in substance—or, in other words, what was the result which the parties intended to arrive at—the answer is, the same result as would have been arrived at by a loan and a mortgage of property. Which is the right answer to give in the present case it is almost impossible to say with any degree of certainty, because the courts, and especially the Court of Appeal, have decided that question in two different ways.

In Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure they seem to have had regard to the form, in the sense which I have attached to it above, and not to the substance in the meaning I have attached to it. In Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. North Central Wagon Co., some members of the House of Lords expressed a similar opinion, and that case went upon the ground that the Blacker Co. had nothing to part with. They had an interest, but they had forfeited it, although the owners did not choose to enforce it. Still I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that Lord Macnaghten is reported to have said the result would be the same if the Blacker Co. had been the owners of the wagons. The same view was taken by Kay, J., in Redhead v. Westwood, while the other opinion was held by Mathew, J., in Gapp v. Bond, which was supported by two judges in the Court of Appeal.

Another question which arises is, assuming that this was a transaction in the nature of a mortgage, is there here any document which requires to be registered as a bill of sale? It does not follow that every document signed in a mortgage transaction must necessarily be a bill of sale. There, again, the highest authorities are at issue. In North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 35 W. R. 443, 447, 35 Ch. D. 191, Cotton, L.J., says that a purchase and hire agreement itself could, under no circumstances, require to be registered as a bill of sale given by the hirer, and the same view was adopted by Kay, J., in Redhead v. Westwood. On the other hand, in Gapp v. Bond the opposite view appears to have commended itself. Lord Esher, M.R., does not say so in so many words, but it is difficult to see how his judgment can be supported on any other footing; and, according to the shorthand writer's notes, Fry, L.J., actually does say so. Here we have the judges of the Court of Appeal expressing directly opposite views on a point of law, and it is very difficult to reconcile these conflicting decisions.

Having regard to the weight of authority, I think it the safer course to adopt the view put forward by the Lords Justices and Lord Macnaghten in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. North Central Wagon Co., which is subsequent to Gapp v. Bond, and has been treated as the ruling authority by Kay, J., in Redhead v. Westwood. It is true that Gapp v. Bond was not cited in that case, but I think the only thing to do is to follow Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. North Central Wagon Co. and Redhead v. Westwood, and to hold that there are not here any documents which require registration, and that the respondent is entitled to the amount paid into court. If this case should be taken to the Court of Appeal I only express the hope that some definite opinion may be given which will be of service in guiding us to come to a right conclusion in any future cases of the same nature.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the trustee, Goldberg & Langdon.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. T. Weymouth.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Dec. 3, 4, 6, 7.

EDEVAIN v. COHEN. (a.)

Practice—Pleadings—Amendment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 15; ord. 28, r. 1.

One of two defendants in an action of tort applied, at the trial of the action, for leave to amend his statement of defence by pleading, as a bar to the action, a prior judgment obtained by the same plaintiffs against other joint tort-feasors in respect of the same tortious act. The application for leave to amend was made after the evidence of the plaintiffs and of the other defendant had been given.

Held, that the merger of the cause of action in the prior judgment was a matter which ought to have been pleaded by the defendant, and that, having regard to the nature of the case, and to the time when the application was made, leave to amend ought not to be given to the defendant.

Decision of North, J. (reported ante, p. 8, 41 Ch. D. 563), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J., reported ante, p. 8, 41 Ch. D. 563.

The action was for the delivery up to the plaintiffs of certain furniture alleged to have been wrongfully taken away by the defendants Morris Cohen and F. W. Cook, and for damages.

Prior to the action being brought the same plaintiffs had recovered judgment in an action in respect of the same tortious act against tort-feasors other than the defendants to the present action.

The defendant Morris Cohen, by his statement of defence in the present action, pleaded that he had nothing to do with the acts complained of, but neither he nor the other defendant, F. W. Cook, by their pleadings raised the point that the judgment in the former action against the other joint tort-feasors was a bar to the present action. At the trial of the present action, after evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs and on behalf of the defendant Morris Cohen had been given, counsel for the other defendant, F. W. Cook, asked leave to amend his pleading by raising the abovementioned point, and counsel for the defendant Morris Cohen then for the first time made the same application.

North, J., refused to allow either of the defendants to amend, and on the merits of the case he gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendant Morris Cohen appealed.

The point of practice as to pleading is the only point on which the case on appeal calls for a report.

Oswald, for the appellant.—A judgment against one of two joint tort-feasors is a bar to an action against the other for the same cause: Brinsmead v. Harrison, 19 W. R. 956, 20 Ibid. 784, L. R. 6 C. P. 584, 7 Ibid. 547, and Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; following and approving of King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494. The judgment in the former action was a matter known, of course, to the plaintiffs in this action, and it could not, therefore, be a surprise to them for the defendant to rely on it as a bar. It is only necessary to plead as grounds of defence matters which, if not pleaded, would take the other side by surprise: ord. 19, r. 15; it is necessary to plead the Statute of Frauds and the Statute of Limitations, only because the rule expressly says so. The judgment in the former action appeared from the evidence given by the plaintiffs themselves, and that fact is sufficient to cause it to operate as a bar without its being pleaded by the defendants: Coote v. Judd, 31 W. R. 423, 23 Ch. D. 727. Assuming, however, that the defendant Morris Cohen ought to have pleaded this matter, I submit that liberty to amend ought to have been given him on his paying all costs occasioned thereby: ord. 28, rr. 1, 12; North, J., distinguished Colletts v. Goode, 7 Ch. D. 842, 26 W. R. Dig. 177, on the ground that the defendant Morris Cohen knew of the previous action, but such knowledge, I submit, is immaterial when there was no evidence that he knew of the previous judgment, for it is the previous judgment, not the previous action, which operates as the bar.

He also referred on the point as to liberty to amend to Tildesley v. Harper, 27 W. R. 249, 10 Ch. D. 393; Laird v. Briggs, 29 W. R. 197, on appeal, 19 Ch. D. 22; Cropper v. Smith, 33 W. R. 60, 26 Ch. D. 700, at p. 710.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the respondents, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—In dealing with this case I will first of all consider what the appellant is entitled to raise on this appeal having regard to the pleadings. It has been contended that a former judgment obtained in another action by the same plaintiffs against other tort-feasors engaged in the same tortious act was a bar to this action, and that the appellant was entitled to raise that point without any amendment of the pleadings. But when ord. 19, r. 15, is looked at it appears to me it is impossible to come to that conclusion. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] The point sought to be raised in my opinion comes within the terms of that rule. That is material because if the appellant were allowed to raise this point the plaintiffs would have been entitled to amend by showing that, notwithstanding the judgment in the previous action, they were entitled to maintain this action.

The contention of the appellant, however, is, that this is only raising a point of law. But that is not so, it is raising facts to enable a point of law to be introduced and relied on, and therefore, according to the rules, those facts ought to have been pleaded by the appellant.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then it is said that the appellant ought to have liberty to amend his pleadings. An application to that effect was made to North, J., and the learned judge refused leave to amend after hearing the evidence. That was done by the learned judge in the exercise of his discretion, and that alone is a strong reason, to my mind, to induce us now to refuse the appellant leave to amend. Again, I do not think that this amendment is necessary for the determination of the real question in issue between the parties in this action. I think the amendment is sought merely to enable the appellant to avail himself of what I may call a technical rule of law supported by the cases which have been referred to.

Further, this objection was not taken or insisted upon at once by Morris Cohen, the present appellant; it was first mentioned and the objection was first taken by counsel who then appeared for another defendant, and it was only raised and insisted on on behalf of Morris Cohen after all the evidence had been taken, and after he had taken his chance of the evidence turning out favourably to him.

I, therefore, quite agree with what was done by North, J., when he refused this defendant liberty to amend, and I think it was well within his power to come to the conclusion at which he arrived.

BOWEN and FRY L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, M. Nordon.

Solicitors for the respondents, Morris & Rickards.

From Lancaster Palatine Ct. of Chan. } June 6, 1889.

In re BLACKBURN AND DISTRICT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Ex parte GRAHAM. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Grant of land in consideration of a rent-charge—Covenant by grantee for payment—Mortgage by grantee's assignees to company—Mortgagees in possession—Arrears of rent-charge—Liability of liquidators of company in possession of land for arrears of rent-charge accrued after commencement of winding up—Obligation existing at date of winding-up order for future payments, whether provable as a debt in the winding up—Covenant running with land.

G. conveyed land to the use that an annual rent-charge should be paid thereout to himself, his heirs and assigns, with powers of distress and entry in case of default, and subject thereto to the use of L. in fee, and L. covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, for payment of the rent-charge. A building society having become mortgagees in fee in possession of the land, leased it to W., who sub-let it to a tenant. The society was now being wound up as an unregistered company under section 203 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the assets having, by an order of the court, been vested in the liquidators, they continued for some time to receive the rent from the tenant and pay the rent-charge. Finding that they were paying more than they were receiving for the land, they got the permission of the court to dispose of it, and gave notice both to the tenant and to G. that they renounced their possession of, and interest in, the property. They afterwards conveyed it to a person for a nominal consideration. G. having died, the executors and trustees of his will brought in a claim to prove in the winding up for arrears of the rent-charge accrued due between the dates of the notice to renounce and the conveyance for a nominal consideration.

Held, that, at the time of the commencement of the winding up, there was no liability for future payments of the rent-charge capable of being valued and proved as a debt in the winding up within section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862; that the society were only liable to pay the rent-charge as long as they were holders of the land; that the notice to renounce was sufficient to put, and did put, an end to their holding of it; and that the covenant to pay the rent-charge did not run with the land.

Thomas v. Sylvester, 21 W. R. 912, L. R. 8 Q. B. 368, explained.

Appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

This appeal was brought by the personal representatives of the late Rev. Philip Graham from an order of the Vice-Chancellor by which he refused to vary the certificate of the registrar disallowing a proof or claim made in the winding up of the Blackburn and District Benefit Building Society.

The claim was for £89 10s., being the difference between £139 10s.—the amount due under a rent-charge on a piece of land at Over Darwen, in Lancashire—and £50 which had been paid under a distress put in against the occupier.

The land had been conveyed by the Rev. P. Graham by deed of June 20, 1872, to the use that an annual rent-charge of £59 2s. 9d. should be paid thereout to himself, his heirs and assigns, by equal half-yearly payments, with powers of distress and entry in case of default in payment, and subject thereto to the use of two purchasers named Joshua Leach and John Leach as tenants in common in fee.

The purchasers also covenanted for themselves, their heirs and assigns, for punctual payment of the rent-charge. They subsequently conveyed the land, subject to the rent-charge, to the Cotton Hall Brick and Pipe Co., who, on the 25th of March, 1875, mortgaged it in fee to this building society. The mortgaging company having been wound up in 1878, their liquidator disclaimed the property, and the building society remained in possession as mortgagees. In May, 1880, they leased the land to one Wray for five years, and Wray sub-let it to one Grimes.

On the 23rd of July, 1881, a petition was presented in the Palatine Court for winding up the building society as an unregistered company, and a winding-up order was subsequently made on that petition.

In February, 1882, an order was made vesting the society's assets in the official liquidators. Grimes paid his rent to the liquidators, and they paid the rent-charge up to the expiration of Wray's lease in May, 1885.

In the following month, the income from the property being insufficient to pay the rent-charge, the liquidators obtained an order giving them liberty to assign the land to any person for any or no consideration, or to quit possession upon such terms as they might think advisable. They thereupon gave notice to Grimes and to Mr. Graham that they renounced their possession of and interest in the land, but, though negotiations were entered into as to a reconveyance to Mr. Graham, and he was willing to accept one, no written agreement or reconveyance was in fact ever made. Mr. Graham having died on the 7th of May, 1887, the official liquidators then applied to the executors and trustees of his will, and gave them notice to the same effect as they had given Mr. Graham in his lifetime.

On the 7th of September, 1887, the liquidators executed a conveyance of the property to a person named Clough for a nominal consideration.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 26th of December, 1887, the executors and trustees of Mr. Graham's will put in a distress against the occupier, Grimes, for arrears of the rent-charge, and £50 was then paid by him.

In January, 1888, the trustees issued their writ in the Queen's Bench Division against the liquidators personally for the arrears of the rent-charge.

The liquidators successfully applied to the Divisional Court to stay the action, on the ground of the leave of the court not having been obtained under section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862. It was held on appeal that the action against the liquidators personally was groundless, and ought to be stayed. The case is reported as Graham v. Edge, 36 W. R. 529, 20 Q. B. D. 538, 683. The trustees then carried in a claim for the balance of the rent-charge from the 1st of November, 1885, to the 8th of September, 1887, amounting to £89 10s. That having been disallowed by the registrar, they obtained an order on the 19th of October, 1888, that, notwithstanding the certificate of the registrar, they should be at liberty to go before the judge and establish such claim as they could.

The Vice-Chancellor affirmed the decision of the registrar.

The trustees appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and T. Clarkson, for the appellants.—Graham v. Edge was decided on the ground that the liquidators were not personally liable, and the case on the merits was left entirely open. After the order made in June, 1885, the liquidators informed Graham that they did not want the property any more, and after he died, on the 7th of May, 1887, they told the trustees the same. On the 7th of September, 1887, the liquidators executed a conveyance of the property to a pauper named Clough, in order to get rid of their liability. The claim is made on the footing that as from the day on which the society ceased to hold the land they are not answerable. Down to that time they were liable through their sub-tenant. The Vice-Chancellor said they had no power to disclaim, though the creditor ought to have acceded to their request and taken the property off their hands. The liquidators could not disclaim without the leave of the court, and the company was liable for the rent-charge till the land was actually conveyed to someone else: Gooch v. The London Banking Association, 32 Ch. D. 41, 34 W. R. Dig. 38. Thomas v. Sylvester, 21 W. R. 912, L. R. 8 Q. B. 368, is an authority for the proposition that the liquidators are liable for such a debt. [FRY, L.J.—Does it go further than this—that they can maintain an action against the same person that they can distrain against?] The covenant to pay the rent-charge runs with the land: Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 33 W. R. 807, 29 Ch. D. 750, 781.

They also referred to Lillingston's case, 4 Co. Rep. 38a, p. 126; In re London and Colonial Co., Horsey's claim, 16 W. R. 577, L. R. 5 Eq. 561; In re Haytor Granite Co., 14 W. R. 186, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 77; In re Gartness Iron Co., 18 W. R. 1103, L. R. 10 Eq. 412. Lord ESHER, M.R., referred to Whitaker v. Forbes, 24 W. R. 241, L. R. 10 C. P. 583, 1 C. P. D. 51, and Macfarlane's claim, 17 Ch. D. 337, 29 W. R. Dig. 47.

Neville, Q.C., and Snow, for the official liquidators, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there is an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court who refused to admit a claim for arrears of a rent-charge. The society is being wound up, and the representatives of Mr. Graham have made a claim, not at the commencement of the winding up but a long time afterwards, to prove for a specific sum of money, which they said was due as rent-charge at the time the winding-up order was made. But I think they have brought it as a claim which was not due at that time, but became due in the subsequent course of the liquidation. They put their claim either on that view or on the alternative view, that there was a claim existing at the commencement of the winding up which could have been then valued. Therefore they are now proving for a specific sum. We must consider first of all what this claim was. It was made in respect of a rent-charge. The conveyance of the property was made reserving a rent-charge to the grantor. As a matter of fact at the commencement of this winding up all the rent that was then payable had been paid—none of the rent-charge was in arrear. It is said there was then a claim under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 158, against the society's estate for a rent-charge since accrued due. But a claim does not mean what anyone asks, but it must mean a legal claim resting on a liability or obligation. Was there any such claim with respect to the rent-charge on the property of the society aforesaid at the commencement of the liquidation? The case of Thomas v. Sylvester is said to be an authority for this claim because it decides that the liability for rent-charge is a debt. It does not decide anything of the sort. It only decided that there was in that case a claim arising from an interest which a tenant has in the land in respect of the possession and the profits of it at the time when the rent-charge accrues due. It was so much a right in respect of the land that there was formerly, before the Common Law Procedure Act did away with it, a real action to enforce it, not brought on contract, but on a right arising out of the land. What was decided in Thomas v. Sylvester was that, though the old remedy was gone, another remedy remained—that is, the court held that an action of debt would lie for arrears of a rent-charge, but the court did not say the rent-charge itself was a debt. An action of debt was not confined to what was properly a debt, but might be brought for anything that had become payable before action brought. For example, if a person had incurred a penalty of £50 under an Act of Parliament, you might bring an action of debt for it, but that was not founded on a contract. But if there was no debt due there could be no action of debt, though there might be an action on the contract. What the court said in Thomas v. Sylvester was that that was not an action of covenant arising out of the land, but that it was a case in which there would be an action of debt if there was a debt. They said that a man is liable, whilst he is actually the pernor of the profits, for non-payment of a rent-charge created by a former tenant in fee, and therefore that it was an action arising out of the possession of land.

In Whitaker v. Forbes, where the same question arose, and that case (Thomas v. Sylvester) was considered, the action was brought for a rent-charge which was due at the time, but the land was in Australia. It was held that it was an action arising out of the possession of the land, and that it would not lie in England. In that case I said that "In an action of debt the venue is primâ facie transitory, but I think that, though that is so, we are bound by the authority of the decisions cited in the note to Thursby v. Plant in 1 Williams Saunders, Sir E. Williams' Edition, p. 238, to hold that in some actions of debt the venue is not transitory, as, for instance, in actions for penalties. There the statute makes the venue local, but the note is also authority for saying that where there is no contract or covenant, but the debt only arises by reason of privity of estate—that is to say, when the liability depends on the defendant's being in possession of the estate charged, and not on privity of contract—then the venue is local, and the action must be brought in the locality where the land is situated." And so it was held by the court. That is our authority for saying that a claim to recover a rent-charge arises, not out of contract, but out of privity of estate. There is authority for the proposition that if a person who did not create the rent-charge, and had not covenanted to pay it, was in possession of the land out of which it issues, he is liable for breach of duty in not paying it while he is in possession of the land, but that, unless and until he has been in possession whilst the rent-charge accrued due, there is no claim against him. If that be so, then, these arrears of rent-charge not having accrued due when this society was in possession at the commencement of the winding up, and they not having covenanted to pay the rent-charge, there was no duty on them to do or pay anything in respect of a rent-charge coming due in the future. There was, therefore, no liability upon them, as they were not in possession when these payments became due. I have no doubt, therefore, that you cannot bring in section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862, to make them liable at the commencement of the winding up. The claim must be one arising out of a legal liability. Then, with respect to any liability arising after the commencement of the winding up, the only way you can get at the liquidators is to say they have taken the estate after the liquidation commenced, for the benefit of the liquidation, and that they must, therefore, take it with its burdens. But that was not made out. They only took the estate so far as they could not help taking it. But they found the thing would be an injury to the creditors, and so they went to the court and asked to be allowed to get rid of what was a white elephant. The court said, Yes, if anyone will give you anything for it. Then they went to the grantor, and told him they did not want the land, but he said, No, I will not take it—I will leave you to pay the rent-charge. So they went to the tenant and said, Remember, you are no longer our tenant. That is in point as to the argument that they were in possession by their tenant.

The Vice-Chancellor found as a fact that they were out of possession. He said: "How can I fix them with the possession of the estate when they did everything in their power to get rid of it?" Therefore, there being no liability at the commencement of the winding up, and no liability established by anything they have done afterwards, there is no liability at all, and the appellants cannot prove for these arrears in the winding up.

I think, therefore, that the judge was right, and that this case is governed by the two cases I have referred to. The case decided by Bacon, V.C. (In re Gartness Iron Co.), is no authority as regards English law.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster affirming the disallowance by the registrar of the appellant's claim.

This land was originally conveyed to some people of the name of Leach, who covenanted to pay a rent-charge, and the land was afterwards conveyed to this society, now in liquidation.

The society were not under any obligation by the contract to pay this rent-charge. Their liability, if any, depends entirely upon their possession of the land, though the liability of the original purchasers upon their covenant may still exist. The claim simply depends on any right the grantor may have through the existence of the rent-charge by virtue of the society being in possession by themselves or their tenant.

By an order made in the winding up this property became vested in the liquidators. The representatives of Mr. Graham, the grantor, brought an action against the liquidators personally in the Queen's Bench Division. That was stayed by the Court of Appeal, without prejudice to a proof being brought in in the winding up. After that order the only question really is whether any debt has been shown against the society.

But we may also decide whether the appellant has any claim against the liquidators to this £89 10s. by reason of their having had the benefit of the property during the winding up.

Debts can only be proved against the company if they existed as debts at the time of the winding-up order. The liquidators got an order to dispose of the property. They went to Graham and to Grimes and said they wished to get rid of it, and they offered to reconvey it. That, in my opinion, would entirely prevent any claim being made against the liquidators for rent-charge accrued due during the subsequent portion of the winding up.

Then we come back to the real question. Is there any debt here that was a debt at the commencement of the winding up? An action of debt can undoubtedly now be brought for a rent not due by contract, but arising out of land. The holder of land is liable for payments of rent-charges that accrue due while he holds: Thomas v. Sylvester. The question is whether there is any liability on these liquidators in respect of the rent-charge since the date of the winding-up order. No doubt they were in possession, but their holding does not seem to have been a beneficial one. It is said it comes under section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862; but that section only applies to obligations existing at the commencement of the winding up. Cases have been quoted and referred to for the purpose of showing that that is not the true construction at all, but that this claim could be brought within the section.

The only two cases I need refer to are In re Haytor Granite Co. and In re Gartness Iron Co. In the former the lessee had covenanted to pay all the rent. That was an obligation by contract existing at the time of the winding-up order, and the amount was estimated by calculating how much the company would become liable for under the covenant. In the latter, the case before Bacon, V.C., in which the company were assignees of land in Scotland subject to feu duties, the court treated the company as if they had contracted to pay the feu duties, and the cases cited from the Scotch law were admissible to show what their liabilities were under the law of Scotland. It has no bearing on the present case, and adds nothing whatever to the Haytor case, but appears to turn on the relations in which, by the contract, the parties stood to each other. If that was not the ground of the decision of Bacon, V.C., I do not think we are bound to follow it. The cases which decide that an action of debt may be brought where there is an obligation not by contract but by law, do not in any way justify the court in admitting this claim when, at the time the liquidation began, there was no rent payable from the society under this rent-charge. One other point put to us by Mr. Buckley was that the covenant to pay the rent-charge ran with the land. Thomas v. Sylvester is against that contention. In that case the two judges who gave an opinion on the point (I was not one) evidently considered that the covenant did not run with the land, as they decided the case upon the point whether the owner of the rent-charge could sue the assignee as the holder of the land in an action of debt. I think the Vice-Chancellor was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point was that there was a debt or obligation existing at the commencement of the winding up; and the second was that it was said the company have enjoyed the benefit of the property since the winding up began, and that they must, therefore, take the liability to which it was subject.

As to the first point, there being no contract between the company and the owner of the rent-charge, the only right of the appellants would be as to the rent-charge which accrued due while the company were in possession of the land and the profits of it. Then it was said the covenant was one which runs with the land. I agree with Cotton, L.J., that there is no liability except for rent accrued due while the assignees were in possession of the land.

As to the second point, that they must pay for the benefit they have had, the facts entirely repel that argument. They, in fact, enjoyed no benefit from the land, and took every means in their power to get rid of it. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for Charles Costeker, Over Darwen.

Solicitor for the liquidators, Frith Needham, for Danger & Neville, Liverpool.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 23, 25.

MAYOR, &c., OF BURTON-ON-TRENT v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE BURTON-ON-TRENT UNION AND OTHERS. (a.)

Poor rate—Rateable value—Sewage farm and pumping station — Hypothetical tenant—Parochial Assessment Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 1.

The Corporation of Burton-on-Trent were the owners of a sewage farm and a pumping station for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the town, in respect of which the corporation were assessed to the poor rate. It was impossible to work the sewage farm except at a loss so long as it remained a sewage farm, and if the corporation wished to let it as a sewage farm, no one would be found to take it even at a nominal rental. The pumping station, while used as part of the sewage system, was incapable of yielding a profit, and could not be used beneficially for any other purpose. If the sewage farm and pumping station belonged to a private owner, the corporation would be willing to hire them at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the present rates.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that, in ascertaining the rateable value, the corporation must be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants, and the rent that they would give for the sewage farm and pumping station as a sewage farm and pumping station if they were not the owners in occupation must be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value, and that, therefore, the rates must stand.

Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 17 W. R. 527, L. R. 4 Q. B. 15; Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, 19 W. R. 246, L. R. 6 Q. B. 193; and London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, 34 W. R. 583, 17 Q. B. D. 738, discussed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division on two special cases stated by an arbitrator under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 on appeal to quarter sessions.

FIRST CASE.

This appeal was against a poor rate for the parish of Egginton, in which the appellants' sewage farm was rated at £2,000 gross estimated rental and £1,800 rateable value.

The sewage farm had been acquired, laid out, and worked at considerable cost by the Corporation of Burton-on-Trent under the provisions of the Burton-on-Trent Corporation Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. cxxxix.), and the sewage was delivered on to the farm through a main from a pumping station in the parish of Stretton. It was impossible to work the sewage farm except at a loss as long as it remained a sewage farm, and if the corporation desired to let it as a sewage farm they would be unable to find anyone to take it, even at a nominal rental; but if disconnected from the sewage system of which it formed a part it might be let to a tenant for ordinary agricultural purposes at the same rate per acre as similar land in the neighbourhood, which would represent £400 gross estimated rental and £310 rateable value. The corporation were content that it should be assessed and rated at these amounts. The corporation laid out and worked the sewage farm suitably and economically, and could not carry out their statutory duties at any smaller expense elsewhere. If the sewage farm with its present appliances belonged to a private owner he would let, and the corporation would hire, it as a sewage farm at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the present rate.

The corporation contended that the sewage farm, being incapable of beneficial occupation in its present condition, was not rateable, or that, if rateable, it should be rated at the value for which it would let to a hypothetical tenant from year to year, supposing it were not used as part of the sewage system, but were entirely disconnected therefrom and used for ordinary agricultural purposes.

The Assessment Committee contended that it was not necessary to rateability that the premises as actually occupied and utilized should yield or be capable of yielding a commercial profit; it was sufficient if they could be let and would command a rent from any possible hypothetical yearly tenant, and that the corporation ought to be taken into account as one of the possible hypothetical yearly tenants; and that the present rate was right and reasonable, inasmuch as it was found and admitted that the corporation, if they were not occupying owners, might reasonably be expected and would actually be willing to pay for the said premises a yearly rent sufficient to support the present rate.

SECOND CASE.

This appeal was against a poor rate for the township of Stretton, in which the appellants' land and sewage pumping station were rated at £1,050 gross estimated rental and £840 rateable value.

The land and pumping station formed part of the land and works acquired and erected by the Corporation of Burton-on-Trent, under the provisions of the Burton-on-Trent Corporation Act, 1880. For the purpose of dealing with and disposing of the sewage of Burton-on-Trent, it was necessary to have a pumping station, with all necessary engines and machinery, to pump the sewage on to the sewage farm in the parish of Egginton. The machinery, buildings, and works at the pumping station were specially designed for that purpose, and could not be used beneficially for any other purpose. The mains, land, and pumping station were suitable and necessary to enable the corporation to dispose of the sewage, and all the works were carried out efficiently and economically for that object, but they would be of no substantial value to anyone except to the corporation for the above object. The land and pumping station, while used as part of the sewage system, were incapable of yielding a profit or advantage, except that they enabled the corporation to carry the sewage on to the sewage farm, but the corporation would not be able to carry out their statutory duties as to the disposal of the sewage at any other place at a smaller expense. If the land and pumping station belonged to a private owner, he would let, and the corporation would hire, them at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the present rate. Except for the purposes of the sewage system, the value of the land and pumping station would be £100 gross estimated rental and £75 rateable value.

The corporation contended that the land and pumping station, being only capable of beneficial occupation if used for other than sewage purposes, should be rated at the value for which the same would let to a hypothetical tenant from year to year supposing they were not used as part of the sewage system, but were entirely disconnected therefrom and applied to such useful purposes as they might be made available for.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The contention of the assessment committee was the same as that set out in the first case.

If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the corporation was correct, the appeals should be allowed, and the gross and net rateable value appealed against should be reduced to £400 and £310 respectively in the first case, and to £100 and £75 respectively in the second case.

If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the assessment committee was correct, the appeals should be dismissed.

The Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Stephen, J.) held, in the first case, that the sewage farm was not rateable, as it was not the subject of beneficial occupation, and, in the second case, that the land and pumping station were rateable at the value for which they would let to a tenant from year to year supposing they were entirely disconnected from the sewage system, upon the principle adopted in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, 19 W. R. 246, L. R. 6 Q. B. 193. (See 58 L. J. (M. C.) 187.)

The assessment committee appealed.

Fullarton (Sir Richard Webster, A.G., with him), for the assessment committee.—The case of the London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, 34 W. R. 583, 17 Q. B. D. 738, shows that the occupying owner is not to be excluded from consideration as a hypothetical tenant. If it is shown that any tenant, not excluding the occupying owner, would pay a rent for the premises, then that rent must be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value. The motive for taking the premises and the question of profit are both immaterial. Here it is stated in the case that the corporation, if they were not the owners, would be willing to become tenants of the sewage farm and pumping station at a rent sufficiently high to support the present rates. In Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 17 W. R. 527, L. R. 4 Q. B. 15, and Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, 19 W. R. 246, L. R. 6 Q. B. 193, sewers were held not to be rateable, and in the latter case the pumping station was held to be rateable at the value for which it would let to a tenant if severed from the main-drainage scheme. Those cases, however, are not consistent with the London School Board case, and must be taken as overruled. Owens College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock, 35 W. R. 236, 18 Q. B. D. 403, is distinguishable, as the college were prohibited by statute from becoming tenants of the site and buildings. The corporation here might, by their Act, have become tenants of the sewage farm.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Etherington Smith, for the corporation.—For the purposes of the present case the corporation are satisfied to contend that the sewage farm can only be rated at its agricultural letting value. The decision in Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works and Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham is that until the works are disconnected from the sewage system no one can make any profit out of them, and it is only on the basis of disconnection that they can be rated. As long as these premises are part of the sewage system they are incapable of yielding a profit, and are struck with sterility. As they can only yield a profit by being disconnected from the sewage system they can only be rated at their value when so disconnected. In London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, the subject-matter was a large building capable of profitable occupation without any disconnection, and a tenant could be found to pay a rent for it if the school board vacated it. That case was not intended to overrule the West Ham case. [They also referred to Corporation of Worcester v. Droitwich Union, 25 W. R. 336, 2 Ex. D. 49, and Guest v. East Dean, 20 W. R. 332, L. R. 7 Q. B. 334.] Further, this case comes within the decision in Owens College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock, as the corporation, being owners of the premises under their Act, cannot now part with it, and, therefore, cannot become tenants of it.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., in reply.—In the West Ham case there was no finding that the Board of Works would have been willing to become tenants at a rent if they had not been owners. Therefore the question was not raised or decided.

He also referred to Reg. v. West Bromwich School Board, 32 W. R. 866, 13 Q. B. D. 929.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The decisions in rating cases have been progressive. The courts, in dealing with rating cases, have wisely confined themselves to answering the questions put to them in each case, and have disregarded any other questions that might have arisen, or that might have been taken. New points would, therefore, continually be raised as each case was decided, and, in that sense, the decisions may be said to be progressive. Looking at the cases with that gloss upon them, it is no use to say that the question now before us might have arisen in the earlier cases, for, if the question was not specifically put to the court, the court would not answer it. It is true that in some of the earlier cases this very point might have been raised, but, for the reason I have given, we cannot from that draw the conclusion that the court has decided it. The question whether the occupying owner of premises should be regarded as a possible hypothetical tenant in my opinion was never raised before the case of the London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch. No case has been cited to us where such a point has been expressly raised before. It was said that the point might have been raised in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham. In that case there was this peculiarity: that the court had power to draw inferences of fact. Hence, even if it is to be taken that the point was raised, the court shut themselves out from deciding it, for they drew the inference of fact that it would be impossible to find any tenant for the property proposed to be rated—namely, the sewers. That is the direct contrary of the finding in the London School Board case, where it was stated that the school board, if they had not been the owners of the school, would be willing to pay a rent for it as tenants. Nor in the Mersey Docks v. Llaneilian Overseers, 33 W. R. 97, 14 Q. B. D. 770, was the question ever raised or even glanced at. The question, therefore, seems to have been raised for the first time in the London School Board case. The ground of that decision was that by the Act the court is to look for any tenant who is willing to pay rent for the premises. If any such tenant can be found, he is to be taken into account as a possible hypothetical tenant. If the school board, who were the owners in occupation of the school, would be willing to become tenants of the premises used as a school at a rent, supposing they were not the owners, then they could not be excluded from consideration, even though no other person would be willing to become tenant of the premises subject to the restrictions then placed upon their use. The question does not depend upon whether there is a profitable occupation; it depends upon whether there is a beneficial occupation, and as soon as a tenant can be found who is willing to pay rent for the premises for any reason whatever the premises become the subject of a beneficial occupation. Mr. Bosanquet tried to show that the judgment of Bowen, L.J., differed in its reasoning from the judgments of the rest of the court. I myself cannot see that he differed in any way, and this still more clearly appears when the report in the Law Journal (55 L. J. M. C. 169) is looked at.

The point raised in Owens College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock was anticipated and guarded against in the London School Board case—namely, that if the occupying owner could not, by statute or otherwise, become a tenant at all, then he must be excluded from consideration as a possible hypothetical tenant. That point was expressly decided in the Owens College case, but it was distinctly said that if the college had not been prohibited by statute from becoming tenants of the premises they must have been taken into account as hypothetical tenants willing to pay a rent.

In the present case the Burton Corporation were authorized by their Act to buy or rent land for the purpose of carrying out their sewage works. They might, therefore, have rented this sewage farm. That seems to me to bring the case exactly within the last two decisions. The fact that they are not prohibited from renting the farm shows that they cannot be excluded from consideration as hypothetical tenants. There is an express finding in the case that if the sewage farm, with its present appliances, belonged to a private owner, the corporation would hire it as a sewage farm. That being so, the case comes within the decisions, and these occupying owners, who would have paid a rent for the sewage farm to be used as a sewage farm, must be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants. The same reasoning applies also to the pumping station. In my opinion the higher rent which the corporation would give is the rent which is to be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value, though not absolutely conclusive of it. We have nothing to do with any question of figures; we only answer the question put to us, and say that both rates must stand.

Lindley, L.J.—This question turns upon the true construction of section 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836, which enacts that the rate must be made upon an estimate of the rent at which the property might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of tenants' rates and taxes, and deducting the cost of repair, &c. We have to apply that enactment to this case. We must consider whether a person, who is compelled by law to take the premises, and who can make no profit out of them, is to be taken into consideration as a hypothetical tenant in ascertaining the rateable value. The question has not arisen for the first time. The question was raised and solved in the case of the London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, where it was held that if a tenant could be found who, whether under stress of statutory requirements or otherwise, would take the premises, the rent that tenant would pay must be taken into account, and that the occupying owner must not be excluded from consideration as a possible tenant. I cannot find that the question was ever raised before.

No doubt it might have been raised in the two cases of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works and Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, and also in the Mersey Docks v. Llanellian Overseers, but in those cases there was no finding such as there is in this case, that if the sewage farm with its present appliances belonged to a private owner he would let, and the corporation would hire, it as a sewage farm at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the present rate. That seems to me to be the only way in which the two Metropolitan Board cases can stand beside the London School Board case. That finding appears to me to bring this case exactly within the London School Board case. The case of Owens College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock would have been decided in the same way as the London School Board case had it not been that the court came to the conclusion that Owens College could not have become tenants of the site and buildings. The rate, therefore, for the higher amount must stand. Our decision as to the pumping station rests upon the same principle.

Lopes, L.J.—This case seems to me to be covered by the London School Board v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and, therefore, the corporation must be taken into account as hypothetical tenants of the sewage farm. Having regard to the finding in the case (which the Lord Chief Justice in his judgment seems to have overlooked) that the corporation, if they were not occupying owners, would become tenants at a rent sufficiently high to support the present rate, the corporation must be assessed on the higher value. At the same time I feel a difficulty in reconciling the London School Board case with the West Ham case. I quite see that the point was not clearly raised in the West Ham case, but I cannot help thinking that the judges did decide the point, and in a way not reconcilable with the latter case. If this is the true view the only result would be that the West Ham case is overruled by the London School Board case. Speaking for myself, had it not been for the London School Board case and Owens College case I should have doubted whether a tenant who was subject to certain statutory conditions and must take the premises to perform a statutory duty was the kind of tenant contemplated by the Parochial Assessment Act. I should have thought that the statute contemplated an ordinary tenant and not a tenant who was forced to become a tenant at a loss. I am bound, however, by the decision in the London School Board case. I agree also as to the pumping station.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the corporation, Geare, Son, & Pease, for J. & W. J. Drewry, Burton-on-Trent.

Solicitors for the assessment committee, J. & C. Robinson & Wilkins, for H. Goodger, Burton-on-Trent.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — Nov. 13, 14

Case v. Case. (a.)

Married woman—Marriage between Englishman and foreigner — Contract — Foreign law — English real estate—Incapacity to alienate—Restraint on anticipation—Doubt—Family arrangement.

In 1834 a domiciled Englishman, tenant in tail in possession of real estate in England, married in Turkey a subject of the then Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. By a contract executed before marriage he gave half of all his revenues and real and personal estate as an irrevocable donation in augmentation of her dowry. The evidence showed that, if the husband's land had been in Sicily, this contract would have transferred half of it at once for the benefit of the wife without further conveyance, that that half would have been inalienable during their joint lives, and that the contract was irrevocable. No steps were taken to carry out the contract. In 1846 the husband disentailed all his property and sold part of it, and in 1847 he and his wife executed a deed, by which, after reciting that doubts had arisen as to the effect of the contract, the rest of the property was settled. The husband died in 1887, and this action was brought by the tenant in tail under the deed of 1847 to have the trusts of that deed carried into execution, and for a declaration that a deed executed in 1886 by the husband and wife, purporting to annul the deed of 1847, was void. The wife defended the action, and at first alleged undue influence and want of consideration and independent advice, but she subsequently withdrew these allegations. Her case was that in 1847 the land comprised in the contract was inalienable, and that a capacity to alienate could not be obtained by arrangement. She brought a cross-action to have the deed of 1847 declared void.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that in 1847 there was a serious doubt as to the rights of the parties, and that the settlement of that year was a family arrangement, with which the court would not interfere after the lapse of forty years.

Trial of action.

The question in this case was whether in 1847 one-half of certain land was so clearly inalienable that a deed of family arrangement of that year, based upon doubts as to the rights of the parties, must be set aside or declared to be void.

On the 11th of January, 1834, Thomas Case, being then aged twenty-three, a domiciled Englishman and tenant in tail in possession of certain estates in Lancashire and Staffordshire, subject to incumbrances, entered into a contract of marriage with Alexandrina Mavromatti, a young lady aged sixteen, the daughter of a father who in the early part of the century left Messina, in Sicily, and had since lived at Therapia, in Turkey, and had died there. Alexandrina Mavromatti, who was then living at Therapia with her mother, was entitled to some small property, part of which was to be used for her expenses, trousseau, and so on, and another part of which she would come into possession of on the death of her mother, under the will of her father. The contract, which was in the Italian language, was entered into in Turkey, and the original, and also a sworn translation of it, were produced in court. So far as material the contract was to the following effect. It provided that Mr. Thomas Case was engaged to Alexandrina Mavromatti, and that the engagement was accepted by her; her mother engaged to provide a trousseau of the value of 9,520 piastres, and that, inasmuch as her late father by his will constituted his wife usufructuary of all his inheritance, with the obligations that after her death it should be divided between his sons and daughters under certain conditions, the mother engaged that that portion of the paternal inheritance which would come to Alexandrina should be her dowry, only to come into possession after the death of the mother; and Mr. Thomas Case gave "by this present act irrevocabiliter inter vivos" to his said betrothed "half of all his revenues and of all his possessions both real and personal that he now holds, or may at any time hold, wherever they may exist or be situated," "under the following conditions and rights," the first of which was that the donation was to be regarded as an increase of such constituted dowry, and in any case he was to hand over that same dowry, "and the wife may dispose of it in a similar manner as she may dispose of the dowry itself, with which the said gift forms one sole capital, her exclusive and sole property." Thomas Case was to retain the said half as her trustee and administrator, holding it in the name of the receiver of the donation; and to guarantee the said dowry "he charges and mortgages both jointly and severally all his possessions over and above the legal mortgage without any exception, and all included." It did not appear that T. Case had any personal estate.

On the 18th of January, 1835, the marriage was solemnized at Therapia, and on the 28th of May, 1835, there was a remarriage at Constantinople, and of that marriage two children were born, one on the 27th of July, 1839, named Charles Case, who had since died leaving children who were parties to this litigation, and another later on the 20th of September, 1843, named George Alfred Case; Charles Case married in 1863, and the plaintiff in the first action was his eldest son who under the deed of 1847, which it was sought to set aside, was tenant in tail of the Lancashire estates.

On the 7th of December, 1846, Thomas Case disentailed both the Staffordshire estates and the Lancashire estates, and became tenant in fee in possession. In the year 1846 the Staffordshire estate was sold, and the money was applied in discharging the mortgages upon the Staffordshire estate, and also upon the Lancashire estate. On the 17th of June, 1847, the deed which the second action sought to set aside, and which was stated to form part of the same transaction as the disentailing deeds, was made between Thomas Case, the husband, of the first part, and Alexandrina Case, the wife, of the second part, and was duly executed and acknowledged by them under the Fines and Recoveries Act; the other parties to it were trustees of various terms. It recited the title of Thomas Case to the Lancashire estates, the result of which was that, subject to a jointure of £800 a year to his mother, Eliza Case, he was tenant in tail in possession of, and had disentailed, the estate, and it recited the contract of the 11th of January, 1834; that the marriage was solemnized and again solemnized, and that there had been issue of the marriage Charles Case and George Alfred Case; the barring the entail by Thomas Case, and then it recited that, whereas the hereditaments intended to be thereby conveyed were held with other hereditaments, subject to a term of 300 years, and to the yearly rent-charge of £800 payable to Eliza Case during her lifetime, and to a sum of £12,000 due to Colonel Charles Wood and interest, and to a term of 500 years on certain trusts, and also to the income of which the said Alexandrina Case was entitled therein under or by virtue of the thereinbefore-mentioned marriage articles or instrument in writing bearing date the 11th of January, 1834, but save as aforesaid they were not subject to any charge, except certain leases, and that Thomas Case was entitled to the hereditaments in fee simple: "And whereas doubts are entertained as to the true construction and effect of the said articles or instrument of the 11th of January, 1834, and whereas the said articles or instrument contained no provision for any payment or allowance to or for the benefit of the said Alexandrina Case during the lifetime of the said Thomas Case, nor any provision for the children or issue of the marriage; and whereas the parties to these presents are respectively desirous that such doubts should be avoided, and all occasions for dispute removed, and that provision should be made in manner hereinafter mentioned for payment of an annual sum by way of pin money to the separate use of the said Alexandrina Case, and a further annual sum for her benefit during her life in case she survives her husband, and that provision should be made as hereinafter mentioned for the children of the said Thomas Case and Alexandrina his wife." Then a settlement was made by the deed which contained a provision for £100 a year pin money for Alexandrina Case during the joint lives of herself and her husband; and a jointure of £400 a year for Alexandrina during the life of Eliza, which £400 upon the death of the latter was to be increased to £600. It contained a power for Thomas Case to raise £6,000, and appoint it as he should think fit, and various other powers and provisions, subject to which the estate was settled in the usual way to Thomas Case for life, and his and their sons in tail, with large powers to raise portions for his younger children, and power to his eldest son to jointure the widow of that eldest son.

In 1858, 1861, and 1862 the sum of £1,900 was raised and paid to Thomas Case, the husband, in part of the £6,000. In 1868 part of the property was taken by a railway company and a large sum of money was paid for it, and in 1869 that money was applied in paying off some of the mortgages left upon the estate, and £1,100 more to Thomas Case in part payment of his £6,000. A mortgage was made in 1869 to secure him £3,000, the remaining part of the £6,000 which had not been raised, and in 1882, on the 23rd of March, he appointed that £6,000 one-half to his son, Edwin William Case, who had been born after the date of this deed of 1847, absolutely, the other half upon trust for George Alfred Case for life, with remainder to Edwin William Case absolutely. On the 17th of August, 1882, Charles Case, the eldest son, appointed a jointure of £300 to his wife, and portions for his younger children. He died in September of that year, and therefore the plaintiff in the first action, his eldest son, became tenant in tail in possession.

On the 9th of June, 1886, a deed was executed between Thomas Case of the first part, Alexandrina Case of the second part, and Alexandrina Case and G. F. Cole, trustees, of the third part, which recited the marriage, the marriage contract, that part of the property was sold and the purchase-money applied in paying off incumbrances, and that, by a deed of the 17th of June, 1847, a settlement was made; that the said Thomas Case and the said Alexandrina Case were advised that, according to the Italian law, after the solemnization of the said marriage the marriage agreement could not, during the marriage be revoked or varied by the parties thereto, and that accordingly the settlement of 1847, so far as the same affected the moiety of the estate which, under the marriage agreement, became part of the dotal property, was invalid; and Thomas and Alexandrina Case then conveyed "the dotal property" to such persons as Alexandrina and Edwin, the son, should appoint, to pay the income to Thomas Case, the father, for life, with an annuity of £250 to George Alfred Case for life, with remainder to Alexandrina for life to her separate use, and then to Edwin absolutely if he should survive, with further provisions in case he should not survive.

Thomas Case made a will dated the 10th of June, 1886. He confirmed the original agreement of 1834 and the settlement of the 9th of June, 1886, and gave all the real estate of which he should be seised or possessed at his death, and not comprised in the said settlement of the 9th of June, 1886, to George Fitzroy Cole, upon trust to pay the rents, profits, and income thereof, or of the investments representing the same, to Alexandrina Case for her life, and after her decease in trust for Edwin William Case, absolutely charged with an annuity of £250 per annum to George Alfred Case, and he appointed Alexandrina Case and George Fitzroy Cole executrix and executor of his will. He died on the 23rd of July, 1887.

On the 8th of September, 1887, Thomas Elphinstone Case, an infant, the eldest son of Charles Case, and tenant in tail of one moiety of the property, at any rate under the deed of 1847, and, if the deed of 1847 was altogether good, tenant in tail of all the property, instituted the first action to have the trusts of the deed of 1847 carried into execution, and to have it declared that the deed of 1886 was void. Alexandrina Case, the widow, thereupon issued the writ in the second action claiming that the deed of 1847 was void and ought to be rectified or set aside. In her statement of claim she alleged that she was not consulted as to the preparation of the deed of 1847, that it was not explained to her, that she had no independent legal advice, that she executed it under the influence of her husband, that she believed it was merely to carry out the marriage contract, that she never received any consideration, and that she was not aware of the contents of the deed till 1886. All these allegations were subsequently withdrawn.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Wilkinson, for T. E. Case, the plaintiff in the first action, referred to Wilton v. Hill, 4 W. R. 66, 25 L. J. Ch. 156.

A. a'B. Terrell, for persons in the same interest, cited Addison on Contracts, 8th ed., pp. 204, 465; Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 24 W. R. Dig. 222; and Bartlett v. Pentland, 10 B. & Cr. 760.

Marten, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for Mrs. Alexandrina Case.—There was, really, no doubt as to the construction of the contract, and it was irrevocable. The Court of Chancery would have given effect to it by settling half the estate on Alexandrina without power of anticipation. So in 1847 there was no power in anybody to dispose of that half, and the settlement of 1847 is void to that extent. A family arrangement cannot confer a capacity to convey: Di Sora v. Phillipps, 10 H. L. Cas. 624, 11 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6; Studd v. Cook, 8 App. Cas, 577, 32 W. R. H. L. Dig. 176; Baggett v. Meux, 1 Coll. 138, 1 Ph. 627; In re Tippett's and Newbould's Contract, 36 W. R. 597, 37 Ch. D. 444; Wall v. Rogers, 18 W. R. 203, L. R. 9 Eq. 58.

Robinson, Q.C., R. J. Parker, and Gaskell, for other defendants, supported the same contention.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply, cited Stapilton v. Stapilton, 1 Atk. 2, 2 W. & Tud's. Eq. Cas. 920, and Gordon v. Gordon, 3 Swans. 400.

Kay, J.—I will deal, in the first place, with the second of these two suits. It is a suit instituted by a lady named Alexandrina Case, a widow, and seeks, according to the claim in the statement of claim, to have an indenture, dated the 17th of June, 1847, declared void and of no effect, so far as it purports to convey more than one moiety of the hereditaments comprised therein, and an order directing the same to be rectified accordingly.

Now this action was commenced by writ dated the 13th of September, 1887—that is, full forty years after the date of the deed. The statement of claim contained these paragraphs. [His lordship referred to the allegations stated above and their withdrawal, and continued:—] That is a very proper proceeding by those who put it in. Those who pleaded it found they could not substantiate it, therefore they withdrew it. Counsel at the bar tell me quite frankly that they adhere to that withdrawal. The consequence is that I am to decide this case on the assumption that she did know what she was doing, that she had independent advice, that there was ample consideration, and that she was not under any undue influence; in fact, the contrary to all those statements in those paragraphs is now to be the basis of the decision of the court.

Then what is the law? So far as this action of Mrs. Alexandrina Case seeks equitable relief, to come forty years after to have a deed rectified is hopeless. She was bound to come by the rule of this court at the earliest possible period. One of the allegations made, which she now gives up, was that she did not know the fact. She gives that up, she did know the fact, she knew really what she was doing, she had competent advice, she was not under any kind of undue influence, and, therefore, there was no reason why, the day after she had executed this deed, she could not have sued. She might perfectly well have had the deed rectified at any time between that year 1847 and this present year. Now the law of this court is very strict upon that point. In equity you cannot come for equitable relief, like setting aside or rectifying a deed, unless you come with the utmost possible diligence. I quite agree if this had been a case of undue influence exercised upon her by her husband, there is plenty of authority for saying that that influence is considered paramount so long as the marriage lasts, and, therefore, when the husband dies, she would be treated as at liberty to come when she was first relieved from that influence to have the deed rectified. That is exactly why I refer to this. She says, "I was not under any undue influence"; therefore, there is no reason whatever why she should not have come to ask for the equitable relief she was entitled to at any time after the deed of 1847 was executed.

Now, that is quite fatal, apart from any claim made by her for equitable relief. But it may be said, though the argument has not been advanced, part of this relief which is asked is not equitable. It is true there is a prayer that the deed may be rectified, but also the claim is that it may be declared to be void, and, if it be void, the mere declaration that it is void would not be treated as equitable relief within the rule. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:—] The case she makes—I am still dealing with the second action—is this, she says it may be that I am debarred by lapse of time from equitable relief, but I am not seeking equitable relief. What I ask is a declaration that this deed is void (that seems to me the most favourable way to her of putting her case), and it is void, because I was incapacitated from executing that deed at the time. The way that is arrived at is this. It is said that she was in 1834, when the marriage contract was entered into, and at the time of the marriage, a domiciled Sicilian, that, by the law of Sicily, any land in Sicily (I emphasize that) which belonged to the intended husband, or was in any way added to her dowry and made to become part of the dowry and incorporated with the dowry, as by this contract of 1834 was purported to be done, would have all the incidents of the dowry according to the law of the two Sicilies, and that the law of the two Sicilies was this, which I take from the expert's evidence. [His lordship read the evidence, and continued:—] So that I may take it as very clearly proved that if this real estate were situated in Sicily, and husband and wife had both been domiciled in Sicily, and the real estate were part of her dotal estate, the husband and wife could not, under the circumstances that occurred, have alienated it during the marriage.

Now, what are the postulates which it is necessary to assume in order to make out that that law applies to this property in England? First of all, that the lady was domiciled in Sicily, and as to that there is no very good evidence, but in particular doubts have been raised which certainly would have some strength, according to our law, that her father, having left Sicily in the early part of the century, and having lived from that time until his death in Turkey, at Therapia, having died there, having left his wife and children there, whether he had not become domiciled in Turkey. However, I do not give any opinion upon it. For the present purpose I assume that the domicile of the lady was, notwithstanding all that, in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. The next thing is this. This document of 1834 purports to be an actual disposition of one-half of the property of Thomas Case, and, as I understand the expert evidence, that would have this effect if the land were in Sicily; without any other deed or conveyance or anything else it would be an actual disposition of the property. But beyond all question it would not be an actual disposition of the property in England. That is not argued. Therefore, it could not have effect in England, according to the Sicilian law. That is quite plain.

But it is said, true, it could not have effect upon English real estate according to the Sicilian law, but it was a contract in consideration of marriage, and the mode of enforcing it would be by instituting proceedings in England to have that contract given as much effect to as the English courts would think right to do, and although it could not be a disposition of the English property, it might and should be treated by the English courts as a contract at any rate, and being treated as a contract it would be a contract to impose upon the English property precisely the same rights, or as nearly as possible the same rights, for the benefit of the wife which would have been imposed upon the property if it had been Sicilian property. It is said there is no such thing as dotal property of that nature in England; those words have no meaning in England—at least, no such meaning as would be given to them by the Sicilian law, but an English court, in carrying that contract into effect, it is said should approach the same position as nearly as it can, and therefore, as I understand the argument, should decree a conveyance of one-half the real estate of Thomas Case in England to the wife or to trustees for her absolutely for her separate use, without power of anticipation. That is said to be the nearest equivalent which the English law can provide for the dotal property of the lady in Sicily. Now it is said that that is so certain and clear that I am bound to say that the lady had no capacity to alter that, no capacity to enter into the settlement of 1847 at all; that she was wanting in capacity, because that is obviously and certainly the decision to which an English court would come in such an action as I have supposed to carry into effect the ante-nuptial contract of 1834. I shall give no opinion on it at all. Sufficient for me to answer that it is a very doubtful question. I cannot tell, and I should require very grave consideration before I determined, how that contract should be carried out if an application had been made to carry it out before the deed of 1847. I agree that the parties at the time of that deed of 1847 were very well advised indeed when they were told that the effect of that ante-nuptial contract of 1834 upon the real property of Thomas Case in England was a very doubtful question, and it seems to me this court need go no further in the matter, because, if it was doubtful, that deed of 1847 has every element of a family arrangement, one of those things which, in the eyes of the Court of Chancery, has always been considered one of the most sacred transactions possible, and one which it most carefully avoids interfering with unless it is obliged. Am I obliged, forty years after, at the instance of a lady who, during those forty years, by her confession, has thoroughly acquiesced in this arrangement, and has had all the benefit of it, when the whole family has lived upon the faith that the transaction in 1847 was a valid transaction, was one which everyone would abide by—am I bound at this time to say it was so certainly bad that even now the court would say the whole thing must be ripped up and undone, and that family arrangement treated as a void transaction. In my opinion to do so would be to go counter to a series of some of the very best considered decisions of this court of equity.

Suppose that the title to the land in the year 1847 had depended upon whether a certain individual, living or dead, it does not matter, was at a particular date of the age of twenty-one or not, that individual having executed a deed on which the title depended, and his power of executing that deed depending upon whether he was of the age of twenty-one, or had survived a particular individual, or any other thing of that kind, and supposing the deed of 1847 had as party to it, amongst others, that individual, then of the age of twenty-one, and that it had been recited that it was doubtful whether, at the time of the particular deed, he was twenty-one or not, but in order to compromise that, and to prevent litigation, the deed of 1847 had been entered into on the theory that he was or was not, I care not which, twenty-one—is it to be said that, forty years after, that individual might come and say, I was twenty-one, or I was not, and therefore the transaction must be set aside? In my opinion it is not. I should say no, even then. The essence of a family arrangement is that where there was a reasonable doubt at the time, the court will not enter into the matter and say now, if the matter be submitted to the court, the court would have proceeded in this way or that way. It is quite enough to see that there was a doubt, and if there was a doubt, and the settlement, or whatever the act was, proceeded upon that doubt, and was for the purpose of settling that doubt, the court of equity says, "We will not enter into the doubt at all; there was a doubt, that is quite enough for us; it will not do for people to come forty years after and say, We say now there was not a doubt, and therefore the court must unrip the whole transaction, because there was no doubt that one of the parties was incapacitated from entering into it." That was the very question. The very question here was, what the effect of that document of 1834 was, and the question was whether the property was so bound by that document that she could not deal with it, and that it was irrevocably devoted to her so that it could not be dealt with at all. That was the very doubt, the very reason why the deed of 1847 was executed. The deed of 1847, looked at as I have endeavoured to look at it, was a very reasonable arrangement to come to, and a very proper settlement. The lady was amply provided for. Looking to the nature and value of the property as far as I can make out, she received a very ample provision, and she admits now she had full consideration for what she did. I have entered into this, I desire it to be understood, after giving it as full a consideration as I could in the time it has been before me, and I am clearly of opinion that the transaction of 1847 was a family arrangement which this court would be most reluctant to interfere with, and which, in my opinion, it would be going counter to well-settled principles of equity to attempt to interfere with.

There is another point behind, to which I have not yet adverted, and which it may be as well to mention. I have no doubt myself at all that the disentailing deed of 1846, under which the Staffordshire property was sold, and the money applied in paying off the mortgages on the Lancashire property, was part of the transaction which resulted in the settlement of 1847. The whole thing hangs together plainly enough, and it appears on the face of the documents that they were transacted by the same solicitor in the same solicitor's office. Therefore, I do not know that if it had not been for this transaction Thomas Case would have barred the entail. I am not sure whether he would or not. No doubt if it were necessary to carry out the contract of 1834 this court would have the power to compel him to carry it out. I do not doubt that, but the court would not have power to compel him to disentail. That has been settled in many cases, and it came recently before the Court of Appeal in Bankes v. Small, 35 W. R. 765, 36 Ch. D. 716. Therefore, if I were now to proceed in this extraordinary litigation to upset the transaction, it seems to me the disentailing deed must go with it, and at this moment it would be impossible to compel the executors of Thomas Case to execute another disentailing deed. That again would mean the application of money, and other obligations would arise if I were induced to grant the relief asked. As far as Mrs. Alexandrina Case's suit is concerned, I dismiss it with costs. That, of course, will not include the costs of those defendants who have tried to support her case. They must pay their own costs. With regard to the other action, if you please you may take a declaration that the deed of 1886 was invalid, and I do not know that you want any other relief.

Solicitors, Venning, Son, & Mannings; Bircham & Co.; Ford, Banken, Ford, & Ford.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 22.
Chitty, J. }

Francesco v. Barnum. (a.)

Infant—Apprenticeship—Covenant—Injunction.

An infant cannot be sued upon a covenant purporting to be entered into by the infant in an apprenticeship deed, and therefore an injunction will not be granted to restrain an infant from committing a breach of a negative stipulation contained in a deed of apprenticeship executed by the infant.

Fellows v. Wood, 59 L. T. N. S. 513, explained and distinguished.

This was a motion by the plaintiff raising the question whether the court would restrain an infant by injunction from committing a breach of a covenant contained in a deed of apprenticeship.

By an indenture dated the 6th of December, 1886, and made between the defendant Ada Parnell, an infant of twelve years of age, and thereinafter called "the said apprentice" of the one part, the defendant Elizabeth Parnell, widow, thereinafter called "the parent" of the second part, and the plaintiff of the third part, the said apprentice (with the parent's consent) put herself apprentice to the plaintiff, to learn his art and with him (after the manner of an apprentice) to serve from the 6th of December, 1886, until the end and term of seven years from thence next following, and by this indenture it was provided inter alia that during the term the said apprentice should her said master faithfully serve, his secrets keep, his lawful commands everywhere obey, that she should do no damage to her said master nor see it to be done of others, but that she, to the utmost of her power, should forthwith give warning to her said master of the same, that she should neither contract professional engagements nor accept such, unless with the written consent of her said master, that she should not absent herself from her said master's service unlawfully, but in all things as a faithful apprentice she should behave herself toward her said master and all his during the said term. And that the plaintiff, in consideration of the faithful services of the said apprentice, should teach and instruct the said apprentice as therein mentioned. The indenture also contained mutual covenants between the plaintiff and the parent that the plaintiff, in conjunction with qualified assistants, would instruct the said apprentice in the higher branches of the choregraphic art for the term of seven years, and would make certain payments for all dancing engagements in London and the suburbs during the said term, and that in the event of the nonfulfilment by the parent of any of the terms of the deed, or if, amongst other things, the said apprentice should misconduct herself in or out of school, or decline the plaintiff's engagements, or should accept any engagement without having previously obtained the written consent of the plaintiff, or practise the art of stage dancing under the direction of any other teacher, the plaintiff might, by notice in writing to the parent, determine the apprenticeship, and the parent should thereupon pay to the plaintiff the sum of £50 as liquidated damages. This indenture was executed by the defendants Ada and Elizabeth Parnell, and another indenture of even date and with similar provisions was executed by the defendant Elizabeth Parnell and the defendant Helen Maude Parnell, an infant of fourteen years of age.

In August, 1889, the defendants Ada and Helen Maude Parnell arranged with the defendant Paravicini, the agent of the defendant Barnum, to perform as stage dancers at Olympia, at a salary of 21s. per week each.

(a.) Reported by A. D. Maclaren, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 7th of November the plaintiff became aware of the above arrangement, and thereupon commenced this action against the defendant Barnum, his agent Paravicini, and the other defendants, Elizabeth, Ada, and Helen Maude Parnell, for an injunction to restrain the defendants Ada and Helen Maude Parnell from performing, and the other defendants from permitting or allowing them to perform, without the plaintiff's permission.

The plaintiff now moved for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants Barnum and Paravicini from inducing or allowing the defendants Ada and Helen Maude Parnell to perform as stage dancers at Olympia without the written permission of the plaintiff, and to restrain the two last-mentioned defendants from performing, and the defendant Elizabeth Parnell from allowing them to perform, at Olympia or otherwise, without the consent of the plaintiff, in violation of the above-mentioned indentures.

Romer, Q.C., and Kalisch, for the plaintiff, referred to Gilbert v. Schwenck, 14 M. & W. 488; Fellows v. Wood, 59 L. T. N. S. 513; Simpson on Infants, pp. 91, 92; Burn's Justice, Tit. Apprentices in General, p. 183; Gylbert v. Fletcher, Cro. Car. 179, 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 6, Tit. Account; Leslie v. Fitzpatrick, 3 Q. B. D. 229, 26 W. R. Dig. 139; Wood v. Fenwick, 10 M. & W. 195; Lylly's case, 7 Mod. 16; Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Co., 16 W. R. 458, L. R. 3 C. P. 235; Lumley v. Wagner, 5 De G. & Sm. 485.

Byrne, Q.C., and Lemon, for Mr. Barnum, the infants, and their parent, referred to Flight v. Bolland, 4 Russ. 298; Argles v. Heasman, 1 Atk. 518; Gylbert v. Fletcher; Reg. v. Lord, 12 Q. B. 757; Cornwall v. Hawkins, 20 W. R. 653, 41 L. J. Ch. 435.

Romer, Q.C., replied.

Wilkinson, for the defendant Paravicini, took no part in the argument.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the plaintiff asks for an injunction against Mr. Barnum, two young ladies, and their mother, and in substance the injunction asked for is to prevent the young ladies dancing at Mr. Barnum's entertainment at Olympia. It appears that they and their mother (they are still infants, and the mother, being a widow, is by law their legal guardian) have entered into a contract with Mr. Barnum for certain performances to be given there.

The plaintiff's claim for an injunction is based upon two indentures, one relating to one infant and the other to the other infant, each relating separately to one of the infants, and each infant has executed the apprenticeship instrument and the mother also. The plaintiff is the master of an establishment of high reputation. Each indenture is separable into two parts. The first part contains the contract on the part of the master with the apprentice, and the apprentice in terms with the master; and the second part of the instrument contains an agreement between the master and the mother, who was, I think, in 1886, but it is quite immaterial, the legal guardian of the children, the parent, in fact, she being the only parent at the time.

Now this deed is an apprenticeship deed, and it was decided in the time of Charles I. that no action would lie on an apprenticeship deed against the apprentice himself. The statement in the case (Gylbert v. Fletcher) which is reported in Croke Car., p. 179, is this: "Covenant against an apprentice for departing from his service without licence within the time of his apprenticeship. The defendant pleaded at the time of making the indenture he was within age, and thereupon it was demurred. It was argued at the bar that the indenture should bind the infant, because it was for his advantage to be bound apprentice to be instructed in his trade. He is also compellable, by the statute of 5th Elizabeth, c. 4, to be bound out as an apprentice. But all the court resolved that, though an infant may voluntarily bind himself apprentice, and if he continue apprentice for seven years, may have the benefit to use his trade, yet neither at the common law nor by any words of the 5th Elizabeth, c. 4, shall the covenant or obligation of an infant for his apprenticeship bind him. If he misbehave himself the master may correct him in his service or complain to a justice of the peace and have him punished according to the statute, but no remedy lieth against an infant upon such a covenant, therefore it was adjudged for the infant." There were sitting in the King's Bench when that case was decided Sir Nicholas Hyde, C.J., Sir William Jones, Sir James Whitelock, and Sir George Croke.

That case has never been questioned from that time to this, and the case is cited in the various text-books as an authority. It is in Simpson on Infants, and it is in Burn's Justice (I refer to the edition of 1841) treated as an authority, and no question whatever raised. Other cases are cited in Burn's Justice as being to the same effect. So that ever since the time of Charles I. it has been established that you cannot sue an infant even upon the covenants which he purports to enter into during his infancy in an apprenticeship deed.

Now the covenant on which the plaintiff is relying for the present purpose is a covenant on the part of the infants that they, during the apprenticeship, which is for a term of seven years—one of the young ladies was fourteen and the other was twelve when they entered into the apprenticeship—shall neither contract professional engagements, nor accept such, unless with the full written permission of their said master. That is, therefore, on the face of it, a covenant on the part of the apprentice during the apprenticeship. That is the only part of the indenture which purports to bind her, to which I will now refer, and it follows, from what I have read, unless that authority can be overruled, that the infant, without inquiring into the question whether the contract is for the benefit of the infant or not, cannot be sued. That being so, if the infant cannot be sued on covenant, how can the infant be sued for an injunction? Because the right to an injunction depends upon the legal right to sue, and if there is no legal right to sue, which appears to be the result of the authority which I have cited, there can be no right to an injunction. Injunction in cases of this kind to restrain a breach of a negative clause in a contract for service is granted because, first, it is a negative clause, and, secondly, because damages are not an adequate remedy, and it is considered right in cases of that kind to interfere directly by preventing a breach which the person has bound himself not to make. Therefore, as there is no right to sue for damages, there can be no right to an injunction.

That is the case, therefore, against the infants.

But the case with regard to the infants does not rest there for the purposes of this injunction, for, without criticizing the terms of this instrument, the present state of things appears to be this. The plaintiff is not under any obligation to provide employment or wages or remuneration for the infants, and it may be—for I see nothing whatever to affect the good faith of the plaintiff in this case—it may be, or it may not be, that between this and the hearing of this action, if it ever should be heard, he will provide some employment for the young ladies. But at the present moment there is none, and they have come to that age when their services, and very likely from the training that they have received from him, are of value, and at the present moment they have this engagement with Mr. Barnum, under which they will receive their 21s. a week. But now, exercising a discretion, as I am entitled to do with regard to an interlocutory injunction, I think it would not be fitting to grant an injunction which might leave these two young women until the trial without any remuneration or without any employment whatever, I think, on the balance—for I am now going to put it in a legal form—of convenience and inconvenience, it would be wrong to act adversely to the infants at present. Therefore, leaving the various questions as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the terms of some parts of this apprenticeship indenture open, I think that I ought not to grant, and I decline to grant, any injunction against these young women.

That being so, for similar reasons I ought not to interfere with Mr. Barnum. I ought not, for the reasons that I have last given on the question of convenience, to interfere as against Mr. Barnum, because if I restrain Mr. Barnum from employing the young women, they will be just in the same position as if I restrained them from going on with their performances at Olympia.

Then it would be idle, as I refuse the injunction against the infants, to restrain the mother.

I think it better to leave the rest of the case with as little prejudice from any judgment of my own at the present moment as can be. I am acting as I ought to act, with reference to the immediate motion which is before me, and I think, under the circumstances of the case, I ought not to grant, and I refuse to grant, any injunction. But as there may be some matters to be tried, I will make the costs, costs in the action. I ought to say a word about the case of Fellows v. Wood, which was cited as an authority for an injunction against an infant where the infant had entered into a contract. On carefully reading the report I am persuaded that the defendant was not an infant at the time when the injunction was granted, and it was not a contract of apprenticeship; it was a mere contract of service. There is ground for thinking (I am not sure whether I am right) that after the infancy had terminated the defendant did continue to serve, and then, although he might have vacated the employment at a fortnight's notice, what he did was to go away, and then, in breach of an article to be found in the contract of employment, he served the plaintiff's customers for his own benefit. That is what he was doing and that is what he was restrained from doing. As I say, having given that case considerable attention, I think as a fact that the injunction was not granted against an infant, but it was granted against a man of age who, to a certain extent, appears to have acted upon the contract—whether he adopted it or ratified it afterwards I cannot say—after the infancy had terminated. But that is a contract of service, and in order that I may show what I have decided on the present motion clearly, I have decided this case upon the footing of it being an apprenticeship deed.

In the case of Fellows v. Wood there could have been no ground for avoiding this contract not to serve the plaintiff's customers as being an unlawful restraint of trade. Apart from this being an apprenticeship deed, there would be ground at any rate for saying that this general stipulation not to contract any professional engagement whatever without the licence of the plaintiff was a restraint of trade, seeing that there is not a continuous employment on the part of the plaintiff. I have only added this to show that I have proceeded on the footing that the instrument was an apprenticeship instrument.

Motion refused.

Solicitors, Brandon & Nicholson; Campbell, Reeves, & Hooper; H. Levy.

Chan. Div. }
North, J. } July 5, 1889.

In re GOODALL'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark—Registration—Resemblance calculated to deceive—Descriptive words common to the trade—Disclaimer of exclusive right—Disclaimer after application for registration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1875, ss. 72, 74.

An application to register a trade-mark, consisting of a heart having within it "No. 176," with the words "Goodall's Cream-Wove Parchment Bank" above it, and the words "Note Paper: Charles Goodall & Son, London," below it, the whole being enclosed in a rectangle, was refused, on the ground that there was already on the register a trade-mark consisting of the words "Pirie's Parchment Bank," and that there was such resemblance between them as was calculated to deceive.

A disclaimer of any right to the exclusive use of a common particular, under section 74 (2) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1875, must be made in the application to register the trade-mark containing the common particular.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, by Charles Goodall & Son that the Comptroller-General of Trade-Marks might be ordered to proceed with their application for registration of a trade-mark, notwithstanding the opposition of Alexander Pirie & Sons, who were cited by the summons.

Messrs. Goodall & Son had, on the 17th of February, 1888, applied for the registration of a trade-mark for paper (other than wall paper) and envelopes. The trade-mark consisted of the figure of a heart having within it "No. 176," with the words "Goodall's Cream-Wove Parchment Bank" above it, and the words "Note Paper. Charles Goodall & Son, London," below it, the heart and surrounding words being enclosed in a rectangle. Their application, however, did not contain a disclaimer of any right to the exclusive use of the words "parchment bank."

Their application was opposed by Messrs. Pirie & Sons, who had previously, in the year 1885, registered a trade-mark for paper and envelopes consisting of the words "Pirie's Parchment Bank" placed in order one over the other.

The evidence adduced by Messrs. Goodall & Son showed that the word "parchment" had been long used in the trade as descriptive of a hard paper, and that the word "bank" had been long used in the trade as descriptive of a thin paper, as bank notes were printed on thin paper. Also that they had used those two words in combination to denote a particular kind of paper from the year 1883. The result of their evidence was that all the words of the trade-mark they wished to register were descriptive except "No. 176" and their name.

Messrs. Pirie's evidence was to the effect that the words "parchment" and "bank" in combination were not descriptive and in common use, but had been used by them from the year 1880 to denote a particular kind of paper sold by them.

E. S. Ford (Aston, Q.C., with him), for the summons.—All the words of the applicants' trade-mark, except their names, are descriptive and in common use in the trade, the words "parchment bank" in combination denoting paper both hard and thin. But these words can be registered as an addition to a trade-mark: The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 74 (1) (b). The design of a heart with (No. 176) inside, is the portion which might be registered separately as a trade-mark, of the applicants' trade-mark. The appearance of the applicants' trade-mark is so different from that of the respondents' trade-mark that no one could be misled by it.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Willis Bund, for the respondents.—The applicants have included in their trade-mark the whole of the respondents' trade-mark, except their name, and this is calculated to deceive: In re Horsburgh & Co.'s Application, 53 L. J. Ch. 237. The words "parchment bank" in combination are not descriptive and common to the trade, but denote particular paper sold by the respondents. But as the applicants allege that their trade-mark contains words common to the trade, they ought to have disclaimed in their application the right to the exclusive use of those words: The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 74 (1) (2).

E. S. Ford, in reply.—The words common to the trade used by the applicants are descriptive, not distinctive, so that no disclaimer is required. If necessary, the applicants are quite willing to make a disclaimer, and will undertake to do so. Such disclaimer will be in time: In re Swift Specific Co.'s Trade-Mark, 6 Rep. Pat. Cas. 352.

North, J.—I do not see my way to accede to the application in this case. The applicants apply to have a trade-mark registered containing within a rectangular border "Goodall's Cream-Wove Parchment Bank, No. 176, Note Paper. Charles Goodall & Son, London." The respondents oppose on the ground that they have already registered "Pirie's Parchment Bank." Pirie being the name of the person who has registered it. Therefore, "parchment bank" is the only other part of the respondents' mark. It is the most important part of Pirie's trade-mark. That trade-mark is on the register, and there is no application to take it off.

The present application by Messrs. Goodall & Son is to put on the register the trade-mark which I have just referred to. That contains this very material part of Pirie's mark, "parchment bank." The words "Goodall's Cream-Wove Note Paper" are not words that are material. They are merely descriptive beyond all question. All that is left is "parchment bank" and "No. 176." It seems to me impossible to say that when what is Pirie's whole trade-mark, excepting his name, is proposed to be incorporated into the applicants' trade-mark, it is not a case which comes within the 72nd section of the Act, which requires that the comptroller "shall not register with respect to the same goods, or description of goods, a trade-mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark already on the register with respect to such goods, or description of goods, as to be calculated to deceive." [His lordship then decided on the evidence that the respondents had made use of the words "parchment bank" to describe a particular paper in 1880, before the appellants adopted these words, and continued:—]

It is stated in reply that the term "parchment bank" is common to the trade, and that it is used by many people. That may be the fact. I do not say it is not. That evidence is uncontradicted, and, as far as I can judge from that, it probably is the fact, that it has been used by other persons as common in the trade. But it is clear to me that it is used in the respondent's trade-mark as a distinctive mark. And, in my opinion, that brings it within the 74th section of the Act, which provides:—"(1) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the comptroller entering on the register in the prescribed manner, and subject to the prescribed conditions, as an addition to any trade-mark—(a) in the case of an application for registration of a trade-mark used before the 13th day of August, 1875, any distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, letter, word, or figure, or combination of letters, words, or figures, though the same is common to the trade in the goods with respect to which the application is made; (b) in the case of an application for registration of a trade-mark not used before the 13th day of August, 1875, any distinctive word or combination of words, though the same is common to the trade in the goods with respect to which the application is made. (2) The applicant for entry of any such common particular or particulars must, however, disclaim in his application any right to the exclusive use of the same, and a copy of the disclaimer shall be entered on the register."

I do not find that the application here is an application of the sort referred to in that section. I do not see how it can be said that the requirement of the Act that the disclaimer shall be in the application can be waived by anything that I do.

Stirling, J., had a similar question before him the other day, but he did not decide it. If it is important for me to decide it now, I hold that, for the application to be made under that section, it must comply with the requirements of the section, and, if so, the offer to disclaim must be made in the application, which is not the case here. Under these circumstances I must refuse the application.

Solicitors, Robbins, Billing, & Co.; Paddison, Son, & Fullilove.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) — Oct. 31; Nov. 5, 11.

London Steamship Owners' Mutual Insurance Association v. Grampian Steamship Co. (a)

Marine insurance—Lloyd's "running-down clause"—Further "protecting clause"—Collision where ships equally to blame—Indemnity to assured.

The steamship B., belonging to the defendant company, had been fully insured by them at Lloyd's on a policy containing the usual running-down clause to the effect that "the shipowner should be insured against three-fourths of the sum he might have to pay the owner of another vessel for damage done to it by his vessel coming into collision with it." The defendant company had also insured the steamship B. with the plaintiff association on a policy containing a protecting clause, by which the plaintiffs "undertook to indemnify the defendant company against loss or damage to any other ship so far as such loss or damage is not covered by the usual form of "Lloyd's running-down clause."

The steamship B. collided with another steamship, K. Both ships were admittedly to blame, and both were damaged, but B. was more damaged than K. The respective owners agreed to equalize the loss by the payment by the owner of K. to the owners of B., the defendant company, of a sum of money for the excess of damage to B. The plaintiff association brought an action to recover this sum of money, and the defendant company claimed to be entitled to retain it, on the ground that they were liable to pay a share of the damage under the agreement to the owners of K., and were entitled to an indemnity for this from the plaintiff association under the protecting clause of their policy with them.

Held, that the defendant company had not become liable in fact to pay any sum in consequence of the collision within the meaning of Lloyd's running-down clause, and that, therefore, they were not entitled to retain the said sum as an indemnity from the plaintiff association.

(a) Reported by Spencer L. Holland, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Special case stated.

The action was for money received, and the facts, as stated in the case, were as follows:—

The plaintiffs are a limited mutual marine insurance association, composed of several different classes or clubs. By class 1, "The London," the plaintiffs insure against the ordinary marine risks the hulls of the ships of the members of that class, and by class 5, "The Protecting," they undertake to indemnify the members of that class against (inter alia) "loss or damage to any other vessel . . . so far as such loss or damage is not covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policies with the clause commonly known as the 'running down clause' attached." A copy of the rules of the plaintiff association, including the rules of class 1, "The London," and class 5, "The Protecting," accompanies and forms part of this case. The foregoing quotation is from rule 6, sub-section (b), of the rules of class 5, "The Protecting."

The defendant company was at all material times the owner of the steamship Balnacraig.

On December 10, 1886, The Balnacraig was insured in the said class 1, "The London," for £1,000, and was also entered in the said class 5, "The Protecting," of the plaintiff association in respect of a portion of her tonnage, and the defendant company was duly registered as a member of the plaintiff association in respect of such entries.

The following is the clause commonly known as the "running-down clause" referred to in rule 6, sub-section (b), of the rules of the said class 5, "The Protecting":—"And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel hereby insured, we, the assurers, will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the said ship."

The Balnacraig was at all material times fully insured by policies in the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the said running-down clause attached.

On December 10, 1886, and while The Balnacraig was entered as aforesaid in class 5, "The Protecting," and was also insured as aforesaid, she came into collision with the steamship Karo, whereby both ships received damage, but the damage sustained by The Balnacraig largely exceeded that sustained by The Karo.

Both ships were to blame for the collision, and if there had been cross-actions or claim and counter-claim by the owners of the respective vessels the decree which would have been pronounced by the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice on a finding or admission that both vessels were to blame would, in the usual form, have adjudged that the damage arising from the collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of both ships, and would have condemned the owners of The Karo in half the damage sustained by The Balnacraig, and the owners of The Balnacraig in half the damage sustained by The Karo. As a matter of fact the owners of The Karo paid to the defendants, as owners of The Balnacraig, a sum equal to the difference between half the amount of the damage sustained by The Karo, and half the amount of the damage sustained by The Balnacraig, that being the sum for which the defendants, as owners of The Balnacraig, would have been entitled to issue a monition if a decree of the Admiralty Division had been obtained as aforesaid.

The defendants have in their hands £51, being moneys which they have received for the use of the plaintiffs. Before action brought the plaintiffs applied to the defendants to pay the said sum, which the defendants declined to do, alleging that they were entitled to set off against the said sum a like sum of £51 claimed to be due to the defendants from the plaintiffs in respect of the entry of The Balnacraig in class 5, "The Protecting," as the proportion of the damage done to The Karo in the collision, for which the defendants were liable, and which, as the defendants contend, was not covered by the policies on The Balnacraig with "running-down clause" attached. The sum of £51 so sought to be set off by the defendants is arrived at on the footing that the defendants became liable to pay half the damage of The Karo, and did pay that amount by deduction from half the amount of their own damage; that three-fourths of the sum so alleged to have been paid is recoverable by the defendants under the "running-down clause" in their policies on ship; and that the remaining fourth is therefore recoverable from the plaintiffs under the indemnity provided by rule 6, sub-section (b), of class 5, "The Protecting." If this is the correct view of the rights of the parties, the plaintiffs admit that £51 is the correct measure of their liability to the defendants under the said indemnity, and that that sum is properly set off against the like sum belonging to the plaintiffs in the defendants' hands.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that inasmuch as the damage done to The Balnacraig in the said collision exceeded the damage done to The Karo, the defendants, as owners of The Balnacraig, were not liable to pay, and did not pay, anything to the owners of The Karo, and that the only liability arising out of the said collision was a liability on the part of the owners of The Karo to pay to the defendants, as owners of The Balnacraig, one-half of the difference between the amounts of the damage sustained by the two ships respectively, and that consequently the plaintiffs are not liable to the defendants under the indemnity provided by the rules of class 5, "The Protecting."

The question for the opinion of the court is—In the events which have happened, are the plaintiffs liable, under the indemnity provided by rule 6, sub-section (b), of the rules of class 5 of the plaintiff association, to pay the defendants any sum in respect of the damage to The Karo sustained in the collision.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are so liable, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants, with costs. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are not so liable, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for £51, with costs.

Cohen, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C., for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11.—The judgment of the COURT (MATHEW and WILLS, JJ.) was delivered by MATHEW, J.—The special case was so stated as to make it difficult to discover what the parties were disputing about; but it appears upon the argument that what was really in controversy was the mode of dealing correctly with a loss due to a collision of two ships as between two sets of underwriters—viz., the members of a mutual insurance association on the one hand, and underwriters of Lloyd's on the other. As the difference arose out of a transaction of ordinary occurrence the case is one of general importance. We are indebted to the learned counsel on each side, who argued with equal ability, and apparently with equal consequence.

The action was brought to recover a sum of £51, for which it was admitted the defendants are liable. The question in the case was whether a cross claim for the same amount made by the defendants could be maintained.

The defendants were the owners of a steamship called The Balnacraig, which they had insured at Lloyd's under a policy in the ordinary form with a collision clause annexed in the following terms:—"And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel hereby insured, we, the assurers, will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the said ship."

The liability to contribute one-fourth under this clause was insured by the defendants with the plaintiff association under the following rule:—"The risks, events, and occurrences under which members shall be entitled to protection are (inter alia) loss of or damage to any other vessel . . . or to any property on board such other vessel so far as such loss or damage is not covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the clause commonly known as the running-down clause attached." The Balnacraig, while covered by these insurances, came into collision with the steamship Karo. Both vessels were to blame, and the loss, which in each case was for damage to ship only, had to be borne equally. The Balnacraig was damaged more than The Karo, and the loss was equalized between the two vessels in the usual way by the payment of a sum of money to the owners of The Balnacraig by the owners of The Karo.

The case for the plaintiffs was that the defendants had not become liable to pay any sum in respect of the collision, and therefore had no claim to an indemnity under their insurance with the plaintiffs.

The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they had become liable to contribute a sum of £51 to the loss occasioned by the collision, and that the plaintiffs were bound to indemnify them to that amount.

Now it is quite clear that without the collision clause the underwriters on ship would not have been liable under any circumstances to pay any portion of the damage payable by the assured in consequence of a collision. This was settled by the case of De Vaux v. Salvador, 4 Ad. & E. 420. The clause came into existence in consequence of that decision. With such a clause, where the ship insured is solely to blame, the owner is entitled to call on his underwriters, not merely to pay the cost of repairs, but also to bear three-fourths of his liability to the other ship. Where the insured ship is free from blame, the owner is entitled to call upon his underwriters to repair, but the whole amount received for the damage done to the insured ship passes to them by subrogation.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the same principle must apply where both vessels are in fault, and where a balance to equalize the loss is paid to the assured. He is entitled, it was said, to call on his underwriters to repair the damage done to his ship, and must surrender to them any part of the balance paid him which may be applicable to the repairs of the vessel insured. But there is no need in such a case, where the assured receives and does not pay, to have recourse to the collision clause; and neither the insurers nor the insured become liable to pay, or, in fact, pay anything.

Again, if, in order to balance the loss, the assured had made a payment to the other shipowners, he would upon this principle be entitled, in addition to the cost of repairs, to call on his underwriters to pay three-fourths of that amount and no more.

Accordingly the plaintiffs contended that in this case the defendants were under no liability to make any payment under their Lloyd's policy, and that they therefore had no claim under their insurance with the plaintiffs. The loss from the collision should be dealt with, it was said, on the footing of what was called in the argument a single liability—viz., the liability for any balance which the assured had to pay.

But the defendants, on the other hand, acting as they were entitled, if not bound to do, in the interests of the underwriters of the ship, insisted that they had become liable to contribute under the collision clause, and were therefore entitled to an indemnity from the plaintiffs. In other words, the defendants contended that a proper adjustment of the case required a contribution from the plaintiffs' association to the defendants' underwriters at Lloyd's.

It was stated in support of this view that some average adjusters dealt with a loss like this upon the theory, as it was described, "of cross liabilities," and it was argued that this was the true principle. The claim against the insured ship was treated, according to this system, as if it were actually paid by her owner to the owner of the other vessel; and to that payment his underwriters under the collision clause thus became liable to contribute three-fourths, while the owner was bound to contribute one-fourth. The sum that the assured received from the other ship passed, it was said, by subrogation to his underwriters on ship. As the underwriters on ship and under the collision clause were the same persons, they, in the result, remained liable to pay three-fourths of the claim of the other ship for the collision, while the owner or his underwriters paid the other one-fourth. Thus, suppose each ship to be damaged to the extent of £1,000, the underwriters under the collision clause would pay £750, and the owner £250, while in respect of the damage to ship the underwriters on ship would receive by subrogation as much as they had to pay. As against this practice of settlement by the theory of cross liabilities, it must be admitted that its application assumes that a payment is made which is not made in point of fact. It is not correct to say that the owner of the assured ship pays the damage done the owner of the other ship. He only does so on the condition that he is paid his claim by the other shipowner. Neither in fact nor in law is the owner of the assured ship liable to pay, or entitled to receive, more than the balance which equalizes the loss: see The Khedive, 31 W. R. 249, 7 App. Cas. 795.

This balance would therefore seem to be the amount upon which the collision clause was intended to operate, and it can only operate according to its terms in those cases where the assured has had to pay. To construe the collision clause to apply to anything else would be to substitute a far-fetched theory for plain facts. The form of the clause seems to forbid any such construction. The words "become liable to pay, and shall pay," point to a real and not to some imaginary outlay.

But the supposed principle of adjustment by cross liabilities was sought to be supported by the argument that a settlement upon the footing contended for by the plaintiffs, might in some cases lead to results which would be unjust and contrary to the true principles of insurance law. Cases were put where the damage to the ship insured was made up of claims for detention during repairs or loss of freight or damage to cargo.

It was said that the underwriters on ship ought not to receive by subrogation a balance arrived at after the allowance in account of such claims. This is quite clear, and was not disputed by the counsel for the plaintiffs.

But it does not follow that the adjustment in this case, as contended for by the plaintiffs, is wrong, or that the theory of cross liabilities should be adopted in every case of collision. There is, however, a view of the matter which seems to us to demonstrate that the plaintiffs are right in this case, and that the theory of adjustment by cross liabilities is fallacious.

The contention of the defendants seems to lead inevitably to this conclusion, that the assured with a collision clause in his policy might incur a greater liability than if he had none. The clause was annexed to the ordinary policy, not to diminish, but to increase the protection afforded the assured, and any construction which made the assured liable for a loss which otherwise would have fallen on his underwriters would defeat the object with which the insurance in this form is effected. Let us suppose the case already put where the damage to each ship is the same amount, say £1,000. Where the policy contains no collision clause the underwriters on each ship would pay the cost of repairs—viz., £1,000. Now suppose the policy to contain a collision clause, and the claims to be adjusted on the footing of cross liabilities. The underwriters under the collision clause would have to pay three-fourths of the £1,000—viz., £750, and the owner or his underwriter one-fourth—viz., £250. The underwriters on ship would have to pay £1,000 for repairs of the assured ship, but they would receive by subrogation £1,000 from the other ship. In the result the owner would be liable for £250, and so to that extent worse off than if there were no collision clause in his policy.

Our judgment is that the defendants have not become liable to pay any sum in consequence of the collision within the meaning of the collision clause, and therefore that their defence cannot be maintained.

We give judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Parker, Garrett, & Parker.

Solicitors for the defendants, Waltons, Bubb, & Johnson.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 6.

BLAKEY v. LATHAM. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Time for appealing—Interlocutory or final order—Order for working out declarations of right in final judgment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 15.

An order in an action, made, after final judgment in the action, for the purpose of directing how the declarations contained in the final judgment are to be worked out, is an interlocutory order, so far as regards the time for appealing from it.

Appeal from an order of Kay, J. (see 37 W. R. 569, 41 Ch. D. 518).

In 1886 R. Blakey brought an action against E. S. Latham and T. Lowden (trading as Latham & Co.) with reference to a trade-mark, and in 1887 the same plaintiff brought an action against the same defendants for infringement of a patent. The trade-mark action was tried before Chitty, J., in February, 1888, and judgment given against the defendants with costs. The patent action was tried before Kay, J., in April, 1888, and the action was dismissed with costs to be paid by the plaintiff. The plaintiff had appealed in the patent action, and on November 10, 1888, before the appeal had been heard, Kay, J., upon the plaintiff's motion in the patent action, made an order allowing the plaintiff to set off the costs of the trade-mark action payable by the defendants against the costs of the patent action payable by the plaintiff.

On December 20, 1888, the defendant Lowden was ordered to pay to the plaintiff the costs of a motion to commit in the trade-mark action.

On February 19, 1889, the plaintiff's appeal in the patent action was heard, Lowden appearing separately on the hearing of the appeal, and the appeal was dismissed as against Lowden, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On May 10, 1889, on a motion made in the patent action by the plaintiff, the defendant Lowden and his solicitor Green being the respondents, Kay, J., made the order now appealed from, whereby he declared the plaintiff entitled to set off against the costs payable by him under the order of February 19, 1889—i.e., the order of the Court of Appeal in the patent action—(1) the costs of the motion of November 10, 1888; (2) also (but subject to the lien, if any, which the taxing master should find Green to have, as solicitor for Lowden, for costs in the patent action) the costs of the motion to commit of December 20, 1888 (see 37 W. R. 569, 41 Ch. D. 518).

The order of May 10, 1889, was passed and entered on June 27, and on August 9, 1889, Green gave notice of appeal from that order.

On the appeal being opened

S. Woolf, for the plaintiff, took the prelimary objection that the appeal was out of time, the order appealed from being interlocutory: Collins v. Vestry of Paddington, 28 W. R. 588, 5 Q. B. D. 368.

T. T. Fillan and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the appellant.—The order now appealed from, is only a supplemental order made for the purpose of working out the final decree made in the patent action of Blakey v. Latham, and therefore it must be regarded as part of that final decree, and therefore as a final order: The City of Manchester, 5 P. D. 221; we rely on the observations of Brett, L.J., in Standard Discount Co. v. La Grange, 26 W. R. 25, 3 C. P. D. 67, at p. 71, as to what constitutes a final order.

Nov. 6.—COTTON, L.J.—The only question is whether the order appealed from is or is not interlocutory. In my opinion it is clearly interlocutory. It is true that Brett, L.J., in the case of Standard Discount Co. v. La Grange, used expressions which have been relied on to show that this must be a final order; his lordship said that no order, judgment, or other proceeding can be final which does not at once affect the status of the parties, for whichever side the decision may be given, so that if it is for the plaintiff it is conclusive against the defendant, and if for the defendant conclusive against the plaintiff; but he did not say that every order which does so settle the status of the parties is a final order for the present purpose.

In one sense every order comes to an end when judgment is delivered, but it does not come to an end so far as working out the directions contained in it is concerned. Any order, so far as it does not deal with the final rights of the parties, but merely deals with the manner in which final rights are to be worked out, is, in my opinion, interlocutory, just as an order made before judgment is interlocutory where it gives no final decision on the matters in dispute, but merely directs how the parties are to proceed in order to obtain that final decision.

The judgment of February 19, 1889, gives costs to the defendant Lowden, and the other two judgments give costs to the plaintiff.

The order appealed from (I do not at all enter into the question whether it was right or wrong) directed how the declarations in the final judgments were to be worked out. That, in my opinion, is an interlocutory, not a final order, and, therefore, the appeal ought to have been brought within the time limited for interlocutory appeals. It is admitted it was not so brought, and therefore the objection taken must prevail.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will not attempt to give an exhaustive definition of what is meant by "interlocutory," but of this I am satisfied, that where a final judgment has been given, and subsequently an order has been obtained for the purpose of working out that final judgment, that supplemental order has always been deemed, and rightly deemed, to be interlocutory. This is such an order, and therefore the notice of appeal was given too late.

Solicitors, A. V. Green; Salaman.

Jenkins v. Bushby (1891) 1 Ch. 486

From Chan. Div. Dec. 9.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. VYNER. (a.)

Practice—Action commenced in Chancery Division—Trial by jury.

If a plaintiff who has commenced an action in the Chancery Division desires afterwards to have it tried by a jury, the onus is upon him to show some reason why it should not be tried in the manner in which it would, in the ordinary course, be tried in that division. If he does not discharge that onus, an application by him to have the action tried by a jury will be refused.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed, but on different grounds.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action in which the present application was made was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Wallasey Local Board against Robert de Grey Vyner and the Seacombe, Hoylake, and Deeside Railway Co. for a declaration that certain footpaths were public highways and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing them. The relators were the urban sanitary authority for the parish and district of Wallasey in the county of Chester, and the footpaths in question lay within their jurisdiction. The defendant Vyner was the owner in fee simple of part of the land through which the alleged paths ran, and other parts of such land belonged to the defendant company, who had purchased them from Vyner for the purposes of their railway. It was alleged that the defendant company had obstructed the footpaths at various points in their passage through their land. Both defendants denied the existence of any public right of way.

The relators took out a summons asking that the action might be tried by a special jury, and on the 29th of November, 1889, an order was made at chambers for the trial of the action by a special jury of the county of Lancaster.

The defendants moved to discharge this order, and the motion was heard by Kekewich, J., who discharged the order on the ground that, as the plaintiffs by their pleading had alleged a public right of way over the ways and footpaths in question and a dedication of the same as highways to the public by the defendants and their predecessors in title, and as such allegations raised questions of law, the case was one which could not properly and effectually be dealt with by a jury.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

S. Hall, Q.C., for the appellant.—The question in this case depends on R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, rr. 3 and 4. Assuming that the case comes within rule 4 the rule laid down by Kekewich, J., was too wide; what he decided in fact came to this, that a case of this kind can never be tried by a jury.

O. L. Clare (Warmington, Q.C., with him), contrà.—This is a case which could have been tried by a judge under rule 4. [COTTON, L.J.—You need not argue that.] Then the judge has exercised his discretion, and that will not be interfered with. Furthermore, the onus is upon the plaintiff to show some reason why the case should not be tried by the Chancery Division in the ordinary course, and no such reason has been shown. But even if the case is one which ought to be sent for trial by jury, then, inasmuch as it has excited a great deal of local irritation, it is most important for the defendants that, at all events, it should not be tried in the neighbourhood.

S. Hall, Q.C., in reply.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application to discharge an order made by Kekewich, J., discharging a previous order made in chambers for the trial of this case before a judge and a special jury.

The action has been commenced in the Chancery Division, and I think it was an action which might properly be commenced in the Chancery Division, because it is one which before the Judicature Act could have been tried by the Court of Chancery. It would therefore come for trial by a judge alone without a jury. The plaintiff chose to proceed in the Chancery Division, where the trial is by a judge without a jury. In my opinion, therefore, the onus is upon him to show that for some special reason the action ought not to be tried in the ordinary way by the tribunal which he has selected. There may be many cases in which that may be made out, but here I can see nothing which enables the plaintiff to say that he has discharged the onus which I think is upon him. If he likes to come to the Chancery Division (and I cannot object to his preference for that tribunal) he must take the consequences, and must accept the ordinary course of trial in that division unless he can show that there are sufficient reasons for substituting for that, another mode of trial—that is to say, the mode adopted at common law. In the present case I think it highly probable that the questions will not be such as to require a jury to decide whether the witnesses on the one side or on the other are right, but for the judge to lay down the law to the jury as to what is the proper legal consequence of certain facts which are proved before him. I must not be taken as agreeing with the grounds expressed by Kekewich, J., so far as we see them from the note of his judgment before us, but I decide it on the ground that, the application being by the plaintiff to obtain a mode of trial different from that which is the ordinary mode in the Chancery Division, the onus of showing sufficient reason for the change is upon him, and that he has not discharged that onus.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The ground of our decision is a very narrow one, but I think one of good sense. Here is an action which might well have been brought on the common law side, in which case it would have been tried in the ordinary way with a jury at the Liverpool Assizes. It is a perfectly plain case, I should have said, and very like other right of way cases which have been tried ever since I have been in the profession, and for hundreds of years before, on the common law side. But then this is also an action which can perfectly well be brought in the Chancery Division. The ordinary course there is, that it should be tried before a judge. It is a case which may properly be tried before a judge. Right of way cases had been tried by a judge for many, many years before I ever saw a Court of Chancery. Now under these circumstances what ought to be done? The plaintiff elected, in the first instance, not to bring his action on the common law side, in which case it would have been tried by a jury in the ordinary way, but he selected that tribunal which tries without a jury and by a judge alone. He must have had some reason for that, and, although I am not going to disclose my secret convictions, I think I know why he chose the Chancery Division. However, he did choose it, and, having chosen it, he cannot eat his cake and have it too. He cannot have the advantages of the Chancery Division as long as he wants to have them, and then, at the last moment, without a word of reason, turn round and pretend that this is a case in which no tribunal except a jury could adequately do justice. That will not do. That is blowing hot and cold. If he chooses to select the Chancery Division let him stick to it, unless for good reason. If he could show, in spite of his having chosen the Chancery Division, that this was not an action which could properly be tried at all in that division, and could only be tried at common law, that would be enough; but this is an action which can be tried on either side. He has chosen the Chancery Division; let him abide by his choice. That is my view. I do not at all agree with the reasons given by the learned judge below. I think he assumed that it was not a case which could be tried by a jury, and I cannot say I agree with him in that. I put my decision entirely on the ground I have stated.

(a.) Reported by L. S. BRISTOWE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same mind. I am not uninfluenced by this fact, that the matter comes before us on appeal, and that this court has always been very unwilling to interfere with the discretion of the learned judge of first instance as to the mode of trial. It may, of course, be made out that his discretion has been wrongly exercised, but without saying that I should have arrived at the same decision if I had been the judge of first instance, there is, I think, a conflict of considerations which renders it undesirable and improper that we should interfere with the discretion of the learned judge, even although, in arriving at his decision, he treated the matter in a way in which I should not have treated it. This appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors, Frith Needham, for Danger & Nerille, Liverpool; Meredith, Roberts, & Mills, for Birch, Cullimore, & Douglas, Chester.

App. Bankruptcy. Nov. 22.

Ex parte HARRIS.
In re HARRIS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Appeal against any receiving order being made—Service of notice of appeal on official receiver unnecessary — Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 134—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, rr. 2, 15; ord. 64, r. 7.

*Where the ground of an appeal is that no receiving order ought to have been made, service of notice of appeal need not be made on the official receiver, nor need he be brought before the court in any way.

Appeal by the debtor against a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Hazlitt.

Preliminary objection was taken that the official receiver had not been brought before the court by service of a notice of the appeal.

H. Reed, for the respondent, cited In re Webber, 34 S. J. 35; Ex parte Ward, 29 W. R. 206, 15 Ch. D. 292; Ex parte Dixon, 32 W. R. 837, 13 Q. B. D. 118 (per Baggallay, L.J., at p. 126); In re Fletcher, 4 Morrell, 113.

Sidney Woolf and Cannot, for the appellant.—In re Webber was decided since the notice of appeal in this case. The practice has not been settled, and the other cases cited are not binding authorities.

The COURT retired to consult the other Lords Justices

LORD ESHER announced the judgment of the whole Court of Appeal as follows:—In this case the appeal from the registrar is based upon the ground that no receiving order should have been made. Notice of appeal on such a ground acts as a stay of all proceedings. The official receiver could not move further in the matter so long as the making of any receiving order at all was under appeal. We are all of opinion that, under such circumstances, the official receiver does not require to be served with a notice of the appeal or to be brought before the court in any way. Whether, under all circumstances of appeals against a receiving order, this rule can be laid down we are not yet prepared to say. That requires further consideration. In this case, however, we hold that he need not be served with notice.

Preliminary objection overruled.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. B. D. Lewis.

Solicitor for the respondent, Howell Thomas.

[Upon the hearing of the appeal the receiving order was discharged upon terms.]

App. Bankruptcy. Dec. 20.

Ex parte WEBBER.
In re WEBBER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Appeal against receiving order—Service of notice of appeal on official receiver—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, rr. 2, 15—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 130, 134.

In all cases of appeals against receiving orders, notice of appeal must be served on the official receiver within twenty-one days.

Application for leave to appeal from an order of a divisional court.

On the 22nd of May, 1889, a receiving order was made against the debtor in the Barnstaple County Court. On the 11th of June notice of appeal was served on the petitioning creditor. On the 18th of June—that is, more than twenty-one days after the making of the order—notice of appeal was served on the official receiver. The Divisional Court (Cave and Charles, JJ.) held that it was necessary to serve the official receiver within the twenty-one days, and, considering that the appellant was not entitled to any indulgence, dismissed the appeal, and refused leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal (see 34 S. J. 65).

Hindmarsh, for the applicant debtor.—The Divisional Court thought that, on the authority of Ex parte Fletcher, 4 Morrell, 113, and Ex parte Ward, 29 W. R. 206, 15 Ch. D. 292, it was essential to serve the official receiver. But, though he may be entitled to notice as an officer of the court, it is not a condition precedent to the hearing of the appeal that he should be served. Ex parte Ward was a case of a trustee, not of an official receiver.

H. Reed, for the petitioning creditor

Guiry, for the official receiver.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Divisional Court refused to proceed with an appeal, because the official receiver had not been served with notice, in accordance with a rule of practice laid down by the Divisional Court. That rule is that appeals from receiving orders made by county courts are not to be heard unless notice of the appeal has been served on the official receiver within the time specified for service upon the petitioning creditor. Whether the official receiver is a party "directly affected" within the meaning of R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 2, is a doubtful question, and one not necessary for us to determine. But if he is not,

---

* See Ex parte Webber, In re Webber (ubi infra).

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the court of appeal—that is, in this case, the Divisional Court—may order notice to be served on persons who are not parties. The Divisional Court, therefore, has power to lay down a rule that, in the case of appeals from receiving orders, notice must be served on the official receiver within the time limited for service on the petitioning creditor. Now can we say that this is a wrong rule? I have spoken to Cave, J., and he has convinced me that it is an advisable rule to adopt. It is true that the Divisional Court might, under ord. 58, r. 15, have gone on and heard the appeal, or might have adjourned it. But that was a matter for the discretion of the Divisional Court; the court were not bound to extend any indulgence to the appellant, neither do I see any reason why we should do so. Therefore the application must be dismissed.

We said lately in Ex parte Harris (ubi suprà) that we would consider what rule to follow in this court with regard to appeals against receiving orders. I have said that I think the rule laid down by the Divisional Court is a good rule, and it seems desirable to have the same rule with regard to appeals in this court. For the future, then, whether there has or has not been a stay of proceedings, notice must in all cases be served on the official receiver. Of course we reserve to ourselves the right to deal with particular cases under ord. 58, r. 15. Neither is this to interfere with the rules we have laid down as to the practice to be followed by the official receiver. If he has anything material to communicate to the court, he is right to appear at the hearing of the appeal, but not otherwise. He ought never to act as a partisan, but only to see that right is done to all parties.

LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred.

Application refused.

Solicitors for the applicant, Morice, Toller, & Blakesley, for Toller & Roberts, Barnstaple.

Solicitors for the petitioning creditor and the official receiver, Church, Rendell, & Co.

From Q. B. Div. Dec. 19.

FALCK v. AXTHELM. (a.)

Practice—Time for pleading—Peremptory order to plead—Subsequent order for particulars—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 8.

Upon an application by the defendant for an extension of time to plead, the master, on the 1st of August, made an order giving the defendant a "month peremptory" for pleading. On the 9th of August the defendant obtained an order for particulars of the plaintiff's claim, and these particulars were delivered on the 21st of August. On the 5th of September the plaintiff signed judgment for want of a defence. The defendant applied to set aside the judgment, on the ground that, under ord. 19, r. 8, he had the same time for pleading after the delivery of the particulars that he had at the return of the summons.

Held, that the effect of the "peremptory" order was that the pleading must be delivered within the specified time unless the order itself was expressly altered by a subsequent order; and that ord. 19, r. 8, which was inconsistent with it, did not apply so as by implication to extend the time for pleading; and that, therefore, the judgment was regularly signed.

Appeal from the judgment of a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division (Huddlestone, B., and Stephen, J.).

The action was one commenced by specially indorsed writ.

The defendant, having obtained extensions of time to deliver a defence, took out a summons for further time to plead, and on the 1st of August the master made an order giving "a month peremptory, pleading as of the 12th of August."

On the 9th of August the master, upon a summons taken out by the defendant, made an order that the plaintiff should deliver particulars of his claim within fourteen days, and the particulars were delivered on the 21st of August.

On the 5th of September the plaintiff signed judgment for the amount claimed, the defendant not having delivered a defence.

The defendant applied to set aside the judgment on the ground that under ord. 19, r. 8, he had the same length of time for pleading after the delivery of the particulars that he had at the return of the summons, and that, therefore, the time did not expire until the 12th of September.

The Divisional Court (Huddleston, B., and Stephen, J.), affirming the order of the master and the judge in chambers, dismissed the application. The defendant appealed.

Lynden Bell, for the defendant.—Under ord. 19, r. 8, the time allowed for pleading was suspended during the time occupied in delivering the particulars, that is for twelve days. The order giving a "month peremptory" to plead meant a month according to the rules, one of those rules being that the time occupied in delivering particulars is not to count. The word "peremptory" makes no difference. It was only the expression of the opinion of the master at the time. He referred to Beazley v. Bailey, 16 M. & W. 58.

Horne Payne, Q.C., and G. S. Bower, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The order of the Divisional Court must be affirmed. The construction of ord. 19, r. 8, which has been pressed upon us would be perfectly correct if there had not been an order of the court inconsistent with it, which order of the court would be altered and its effect done away with if the contention of the defendant were adopted. The defendant, who is either in default or thinks he will be, applies for an extension of time to plead, and an order is made giving him "a month peremptory." We have to consider what is the meaning of the word "peremptory" in such an order. It was contended that the word meant nothing at all, that it was only the expression of the opinion of the master at the time, and the case of Beazley v. Bailey was cited in support of that contention. My view of the meaning of such an order is that the pleading must be delivered within a month unless the order itself is altered or varied. In Beazley v. Bailey the contention was that the judge who made the peremptory order could not alter it. That contention went too far. In the present case the peremptory order was made, and no application was made to alter it, and so the order stood. Therefore the defendant had a month peremptory from the 1st of August to plead, which meant that if he did not plead by the 1st of September the plaintiff might sign judgment, unless the order was altered. The defendant in the meantime applied for and obtained an order for particulars, and the effect was that he took the new order subject to the previous peremptory order. He did not ask the master to alter the peremptory order to plead, and so he did not get any further time. It was said that it lay upon the plaintiff to ask the master to insert something into the order for particulars showing that the time for pleading was not to be suspended. In my opinion it lay upon the defendant to ask the master to alter the peremptory order to plead, and as he did not do it, the second order did not alter or suspend the previous order. The peremptory order therefore stood unaltered, and the judgment was rightly signed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant having taken out a summons for further time to plead, on the 1st of August the master made an order giving him a "month peremptory." What is the meaning of the word "peremptory" in that order? It does not mean that under no circumstances can the order be varied. It means that the time so granted is not to be extended unless under special circumstances a further order is made varying the previous order. I do not think the order can be varied by implication; the master's attention must be called to it. In the present case the defendant applied for particulars without calling the master's attention to the peremptory order, and he obtained the order without reference to it. It would be contrary to all reason to construe ord. 19, r. 8, as altering a previous peremptory order of the court which was inconsistent with it. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—It seems to me that ord. 19, r. 8, does not apply where it is inconsistent with an order previously made. That rule, if applied, would be inconsistent with the previous peremptory order to plead. The word "peremptory" in the order means that the extension of time to plead is final unless special circumstances are brought before a master to induce him to alter the order.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Emanuel & Simmonds.

Solicitors for the defendant, Hughes, Masterman, & Rew.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 25, 26.

BARTON v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Company—Stock—Transmission in consequence of death—Stock registered in the names of executors as such—Transfer by one executor—Forged transfer—Estoppel—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), s. 18.

One of two executors cannot make a valid transfer of shares or stock registered in their names under section 18 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, though their names are entered in the register as executors.

Railway stock was registered in the names of two executors as such. One of them sold certain portions of the stock without the knowledge of the other, and executed transfers to the purchasers, to which he forged the signature of his co-executor, and these transfers were duly registered by the company. On discovering the frauds, the executor whose signature had been forged brought an action against the company to compel them to replace the stock.

Held, that, under section 18 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the two executors in whose names the stock was registered became joint shareholders in respect of such stock, notwithstanding that their names were entered in the register as executors; and that the stock could only be transferred by a transfer duly executed by both, and that, therefore, the transfers were void.

Upon the occasion of the last forged transfer, the company sent the plaintiff notice that the transfer was at their office, and would be registered unless the company received notice to the contrary. The plaintiff, acting on the advice of her co-executor, did not answer this notice.

Held, that the plaintiff was not thereby estopped from alleging the invalidity of the transfer.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Manisty, J., at the trial.

The plaintiff, Ann Barton, and one Thomas Barton were the executors and trustees of the will of Samuel Barton, deceased. Samuel Barton died possessed of £12,000 worth of stock in the defendant company. Probate of the will was lodged with the defendants, and the defendants entered the names of the executors in their register of shareholders in respect of this stock as follows:—"The executors of Samuel Barton, Thomas Barton and Ann Barton." Thomas Barton at various times sold portions of the stock and executed transfers, forging the signature of Ann Barton thereto, and also the signature of the attesting witness. The transfers were registered by the defendants in the ordinary way, and on each occasion notice in writing was sent to Thomas Barton, whose name stood first on the register, that the transfer was at the defendants' office, and would be registered unless the defendants heard from him to the contrary. Upon the occasion of the last forged transfer, however, a similar notice in writing was also sent to Ann Barton, but she, upon the advice of Thomas Barton, did not answer this notice. The dividends upon the stock were paid to Thomas Barton, who accounted for them to the persons entitled thereto.

The forgeries having been discovered, Ann Barton and a new trustee appointed in the place of Thomas Barton, who had absconded, brought this action claiming that the defendants should be ordered to appropriate or purchase, and to transfer to and register in the name of the plaintiffs, the amount of the stock so transferred. Manisty, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., and O. L. Clare, for the defendants.—This stock was registered in the names of executors, and one executor can execute a transfer. The question turns upon the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. Section 7 makes the shares personal property. Section 18 relates to the transmission of interest in shares by death or otherwise. When persons are entered on the register as executors, they are not shareholders, their title being only a representative one. Their names are put on for the purpose of sending them notices and dividends. There is nothing in the Act to change the ordinary position of executors. Under section 24 of the Companies Act, 1862, an executor can transfer shares before he is registered as a shareholder. In Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 754, 38 Ch. D. 458, which also arose out of forged transfers of stock by Thomas Barton, the question was decided by Kay, J., against the company, but it seems doubtful whether the executors were registered as executors or not. [They referred to Buchan's case, 4 App. Cas. 594 (judgment of Lord Selborne), 28 W. R. Dig. 41; Simpson v. Gutteridge, 1 Mad. 609, 615; Charlton v. Earl of Durham, 17 W. R. 995, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 433; In re Tahiti Cotton Co., 22 W. R. 815, L. R. 17 Eq. 273; Spence's case, 17 Beav. 203; Williams on Executors, 8th ed., 916.] Again, as to the last forged transfer, the plaintiffs are estopped from denying the validity of the transfer, as notice in writing of the transfer was sent to Ann Barton, and she never answered the letter.

Rigby, Q.C., Winch, Q.C., and Whitaker, for the plaintiffs.—Section 18 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, is positive, and prescribes what is to be done in the case of transmission of interest. Executors must first be registered before they can execute a transfer or receive any dividends. By section 24 of the Companies Act, 1862, the executors of a member can transfer shares, although they are not themselves members of the company. There is no such provision in the Companies Clauses Act, 1845.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This action is, in substance, brought for a declaration that the defendant company, having been led innocently into registering the names of other persons in the place of the plaintiffs, should be ordered to correct the register by inserting the plaintiffs' names in the register as owners of this stock, or an amount of stock equivalent thereto. The company contend that they were entitled to do what they did, inasmuch as one executor is entitled to make a valid transfer, and that the company were bound to recognize the transfers. The argument of the company, therefore, is that Thomas and Ann Barton were co-executors, and that one executor can dispose of personal property (and this stock is personal property) without the concurrence of the other. It was said, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that that argument was true as regards personal property in general, but that this property consists of stock in a company which is regulated by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, and that, under that Act, where the names of executors are inserted in the register as such, they are inserted as the legal owners of the shares; that executors must have their names entered on the register if they wish to deal with the shares; and that, when once the names of two executors are on the register, the company have no right to register a transfer without the signature of both. In my opinion this argument is a sound one. Were, then, these two executors on the register as shareholders? That depends upon the true construction of section 18 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. That section provides that "if the interest in any share have become transmitted in consequence of the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any shareholder . . . such transmission shall"—that means "may," if the parties want the company to act upon the transmission of interest—"be authenticated by a declaration in writing as hereinafter mentioned, or in such other manner as the directors may require; and every such declaration shall state the manner in which, and the party to whom, such share shall have been so transmitted." This cannot be done without giving the names of the persons to whom the shares are transmitted—in this case the names of the executors. The section goes on: "And such declaration shall be left with the secretary"—here, again, executors are not bound to leave it with the secretary, but they must do so if they wish to make their rights against the company effective—"and thereupon he shall enter the name of the person entitled under such transmission in the register of shareholders." Therefore, when the declaration is left with the secretary, his duty is to enter the name in the register of shareholders.

In the present case the two executors made a declaration in the proper form, stating their names and the transmission of the stock to them as executors. The declaration was left with the secretary, and he entered the names in the register of shareholders. I shall assume that the executors, at any rate, desired their names to be entered in the register so as to limit their liability, but, in my judgment, though this were done with that intent both by the executors and by the secretary, it would have no legal effect to limit the liability. The names being on the register, the executors are shareholders, and the limitation falls to the ground. It is admitted that if the executors were on the register as shareholders, a transfer by one would not be sufficient. The company, therefore, were misled by the forgery into supposing that they had authority to register the transfers. They had no such authority, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the remedy they ask for.

Certain dicta of Lord Selborne in Buchan's case were cited as tending to support the opposite view, and I need hardly say that I regard the deliberate dicta of Lord Selborne as of almost equal weight to a judgment. But they do not seem to me to be in point. That case arose under the Companies Act, 1862, and it is clear that Lord Selborne had heard the speech of Lord Cairns and took the same view. That view was that, under that Act executors might make a contract of sale of shares before their names were on the register, and would have a right to go to the company and have the name of the transferee inserted in the register instead of their own, and by doing so executors would not become shareholders, and could not be made personally liable for calls. In that case the House of Lords said that the executors had not done that, but had their names inserted in the register as shareholders, and whether they were executors or not they were liable for calls. That was not a decision, that under the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, executors can sell their shares before their names are on the register so as to be entitled to call upon the company to register the name of their transferee. The Act of 1845 contains no such clause as section 24 of the Act of 1862. Executors can, of course, make a contract for the sale of shares before they are on the register, but before they can transfer those shares under the Act of 1845 so as to entitle them to call upon the company to register the transferee they must first get their names inserted in the register. It seems to me therefore that there is nothing in Buchan's case to compel us to construe section 18 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, otherwise than in its ordinary meaning.

It was then said that, as regards the last transfer of stock, the plaintiffs were estopped from denying its validity by reason of Ann Barton not replying to the letter sent her by the company notifying the transfer. It was further suggested that even if the plaintiffs were not estopped, as the plaintiffs were claiming equitable relief, and as Ann Barton had not acted fairly in not answering the letter, she was not entitled to such relief. The plaintiffs, however, are not claiming equitable relief, but a legal remedy to compel the company to keep their register correct. As to the estoppel, I cannot see that the case comes within any of the well-known legal grounds of estoppel. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case shows that it would be advisable that all companies should be regulated by one statute. We have now different provisions of separate Acts regulating and governing different companies. In this case we have to deal with the Companies Clauses Act of 1845. Section 18 is the section we have construe. Before construing that section, it is proper to refer to the provisions of sections 7, 8, 9, and 14, and then we come to section 18 relating to the transmission of shares in a company, which means the transmission without a deed, as by bankruptcy, death, &c. Transmission is used in contradistinction to transfer, and that really is the key to the whole section. Bearing that in mind in construing the section, it is clear that executors may leave the shares alone, but in that event they cannot transfer them or claim any dividends on them, though they may be sued as executors for calls. In that state of things the company has no remedy against the executors except in respect of calls. If the executors wish to deal with the shares or to receive the dividends, they must get their names put on the register, and once on the register they are shareholders in their own names, and whether they are called executors or not makes no difference. The names of the two executors here were placed upon the register, and transfers were executed by one, the name of the other being forged. The legal effect of that is that the transfers were void. The case presents no difficulty when once the provisions of the Act are understood. As to the question of estoppel, I do not think there is anything in it.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I shall add a very few words upon the important question whether these executors became shareholders in the company. The company is governed by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. The effect of section 18 is that executors must be themselves registered as shareholders before they can transfer the shares. Whether their names are registered simply or with the addition of "as executors" seems to me to make no difference. The addition cannot qualify the extent to which they are shareholders. In this case the executors were in fact entered in the register as shareholders, and the transfers by one were therefore void.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Stephens & Stephens, for H. Hand, Macclesfield.

Solicitor for the defendants, C. H. Mason.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } Dec. 6, 7.

In re HUISH.

BRADSHAW v. HUISH. (a.)

Will—Debt—Legacy to creditor—Direction to pay debts only—Satisfaction.

A direction in a will to pay debts only is sufficient to rebut the presumption of satisfaction of a debt by a legacy.

Testatrix gave a bond to her nephew (to whom she was not in loco parentis), to secure payment to him of £1,000 within twelve months after her death if he should be then living, or to his executors, administrators, or assigns if he should be then dead leaving issue, with interest from the day of her death. By her will she left him a freehold estate, a legacy of £3,000, and certain chattels. By a codicil she directed that all her funeral expenses and lawful debts should be paid at once.

Held, that the debt was not satisfied by the legacy.

Adjourned summons.

The point in this case was whether a debt of £1,000 payable by the testatrix or her estate within twelve months of her death was satisfied by a legacy of £3,000 bequeathed by her to the creditor.

On the 15th of March, 1878, Margaret Huish executed and gave to Marcus Bourne Huish a bond in the sum of £2,000 conditioned to be void if "the executors or administrators of the said M. Huish shall within twelve calendar months next after her decease pay to the said M. B. Huish, if he shall be then living, or to his executors, administrators, or assigns in case he, the said M. B. Huish, shall have died leaving issue him surviving, but not otherwise, the sum of £1,000, together with interest for the same after the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the day of the death of the said M. Huish."

By his marriage settlement of the same date M. B. Huish assigned the bond to trustees upon certain trusts. There was evidence that Margaret Huish intended that the bond should be included, and knew that it had been included, in the settlement.

Margaret Huish made a will, dated the 11th of January, 1887, and thereby devised a freehold estate to M. B. Huish, bequeathed to him a legacy of £3,000, left certain articles as heirlooms to trustees for him for life, with remainders over, and gave him various pictures and ornaments absolutely. All legacies were to be paid free of legacy duty.

On the same day the testatrix made a codicil to her will which contained this direction: "I wish all my funeral expenses and all just and lawful debts that I may owe to be paid at once."

Margaret Huish died on the 21st of March, 1889. She was the aunt of M. B. Huish, but not in loco parentis towards him.

Cann, for the executors.

Methold, for residuary legatees.—The debt is satisfied by the legacy of £3,000. A direction to pay debts alone is not enough to rebut the presumption of satisfaction, and the direction in this case only refers to the time of payment, it was not intended to alter the rights of the parties: Wathen v. Smith, 4 Mad. 325; Cole v. Willard, 6 W. R. 712, 25 Beav. 568; Montagu v. Earl of Sandwich, 32 Ch. D. 525, 34 W. R. Dig. 165. [KAY, J., referred to Edmunds v. Low, 5 W. R. 444, 3 K. & J. 318.]

Renshaw, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for M. B. Huish.—There is no satisfaction. The testatrix knew of the settlement, and she has not given the legacy to the persons to whom the bond is payable under the settlement. The bond bears interest from her death and the legacy does not; there is a direction that all legacies should be paid duty free; she gave him several legacies, so no intention can be inferred that one was a satisfaction more than another. A direction to pay debts is sufficient: Atkinson v. Littlewood, L. R. 18 Eq. 595; Lord Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. R. 2 H. L. 71; White & Tudor's Eq. Cas., vol. 2, 6th ed., 408; Rowe v. Rowe, 2 De G. & S. 294; Hales v. Darell, 3 Beav. 324; Pinchin v. Simms, 30 Beav. 119, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 106; Charlton v. West, 9 W. R. 884, 30 Beav. 124; Dawson v. Dawson, L. R. 4 Eq. 504; Paget v. Grenfell, 16 W. R. 820, L. R. 6 Eq. 7; Carr v. Eastabrooke, 3 Ves. 561.

Marten, Q.C., and Butcher, for parties not interested in this point.

Methold replied.

KAY, J.—I think it most expedient to abide by broad general rules in cases of this kind. By making fine distinctions in every case the law is left in an embarrassed and doubtful condition. Here is the case of a lady who in her lifetime gave a bond to Marcus Bourne Huish for £1,000 payable to him in certain events which have happened, and on her death, which has also happened. After the bond she made a will and gave him various different benefits, real estate, chattels, and a legacy of £3,000. She said nothing in her will about the bond. The bond was really given to him to be made the subject of a settlement which was then about to be executed, as she knew. She made a codicil to her will and thereby directed that her debts should be paid after her death. That is a direction to pay debts at once, but it affects this particular debt because the bond would not otherwise be payable for twelve months after her death. She may have had the terms of the bond in her mind when she gave that direction, but, however that may be, there is, what is not strictly necessary, a direction for payment of debts. It has long been settled that in cases where a debt is owing by a testator, and the testator afterwards makes a will and gives a legacy of the same or a greater amount to the creditor, and then in his will directs that his debts and legacies should be paid, that direction rebuts the presumption of the satisfaction of the debt by the legacy. What is the difference between a direction to pay debts only and a direction to pay debts and legacies? There is none, for the gift of a legacy is in itself a direction that the legacy shall be paid. So all that is material for this purpose is that the will should contain a direction that debts should be paid. If after giving a legacy to his creditor a testator says I direct my debts to be paid, that means that he thinks he has given a legacy to the creditor, and he directs that the debt to him should be paid too. It adds nothing to that, that he directs his legacy to be paid. Accordingly I think that Edmunds v. Low, which appears to have drawn a distinction between a direction to pay debts and legacies and a direction to pay debts only, was not sufficiently considered, and I find that the balance of authority is against it. Indeed the same learned judge, in a later case of Dawson v. Dawson, after referring to several other decisions, seems to have come to the conclusion that a direction to pay debts only was sufficient to rebut the presumption of satisfaction. I think it better to abide by that broad rule which is easy to understand. If the testatrix knew anything of law she may have put in the direction on purpose. It was not necessary to insert a direction to pay debts at all, and it may have been done in order to prevent any suggestion of satisfaction of this debt which she owed to Marcus Bourne Huish. I hold that there was no satisfaction of the debt, and that the debt and the legacy must both be paid to him.

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Frith Needham, for T. Hamilton Urry, Ventnor; W. E. Tyer; Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Chitty, J. } Dec. 4.

PRATT v. INMAN. (a.)

Practice—Sequestration—Duty—Death of contemnor—Administration action.

Where a writ of sequestration was issued to compel the performance of a duty, and the sequestrators obtained an order for sale of the contemnor's chattels, but, before the sequestrators sold, the contemnor died, and a creditor obtained an order for the administration of the contemnor's estate, which was alleged to be insolvent and not proved to be solvent,

Held, that, an order having been made for the continuance of the sequestration proceedings against the legal personal representative of the contemnor, the death of the contemnor was no ground to restrain the sequestrators from selling.

This was a motion which raised the question whether the death of a contemnor determined proceedings under a writ of sequestration.

On the 6th of May, 1889, an order was made in an action of In re Shephard, Shephard v. Shephard, whereby Mark Shephard, as surviving trustee of a will therein referred to, was, on the application of his cestuis que trustent, ordered within a certain time to pay the sum of £2,000 into court on account of a breach of trust committed by him.

The money was not paid into court, and on the 21st of June, 1889, a writ of sequestration issued, and on the 27th of June, 1889, an order was made that the sequestrators should be at liberty to sell certain chattels belonging to Mark Shephard. Shortly after this order was made an arrangement was entered into between Mark Shephard and the sequestrators, whereby the latter, in consideration of payments by Mark Shephard, agreed to delay making a sale under the writ of sequestration and order for sale.

On the 17th of August, 1889, Mark Shephard died intestate, and immediately afterwards an action In re Shephard, Atkins v. Shephard, was commenced by a creditor for the administration of the real and personal estate of Mark Shephard, and on the 21st of August, 1889, H. J. Pratt was appointed interim receiver of the personal estate of Mark Shephard.

On the 17th of September, 1889, letters of administration of the estate and effects of Mark Shephard were granted to Stuart Shephard, who was also the heir at law of Mark Shephard.

On the 21st of September, 1889, an order was made in the action of In re Shephard, Shephard v. Shephard, that the further proceedings in that action should be carried on against Stuart Shephard.

On the 25th of September, 1889, the judgment in the action of In re Shephard, Atkins v. Shephard was made, directing the usual accounts and inquiries, and continuing H. J. Pratt as receiver of the personal estate of Mark Shephard, and of the rents and profits of his real estate.

On the 9th of October, 1889, H. J. Pratt and Stuart Shephard, as plaintiffs, instituted this action against the sequestrators to restrain them from selling the chattels of Mark Shephard, and alleged in their statement of claim that Mark Shephard's estate was insolvent. They now moved for an injunction to restrain the sequestrators from selling.

The defendants waived the point that the plaintiffs in In re Shephard, Shephard v. Shephard were not made parties in this action, and did not attempt to disprove the allegation by the plaintiffs in the present action that the estate of Mark Shephard was insolvent.

Byrne, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the motion, referred to Ward v. Shakeshaft, 8 W. R. 335, and Johnson v. Burgess, 21 W. R. 453, L. R. 15 Eq. 398.

Romer, Q.C., and Clydesdale, contra, referred to Tatham v. Parker, 1 W. R. 491, 1 Sm. & Giff. 513; The Marquess of Carmarthen v. Hawson, 3 Swans. 294 (n); Burdett v. Rockley, 1 Vern. 58, 118; Hyde v. Greenhill, 1 Dick. 106; Rowley v. Ridley, 2 Dick. 626.

Byrne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J., after stating the above-mentioned facts, continued:—The writ of sequestration is a process for contempt—for example, to compel a defendant to answer or to perform a duty such as the payment of money.

In Hyde v. Greenhill a sequestration had issued to sequester the personal estate and the rents and profits of the real estate of the defendant. The defendant then died, and the suit was revived against his residuary devisee and legatee, who applied to the Lord Chancellor to discharge the sequestration. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Hardwicke said that a sequestration covered the personal estate, and that the court would direct a sale for a duty. Now in that case the Lord Chancellor declined to discharge the sequestration, inasmuch as it was issued for a duty and the suit had been revived. Accordingly, if this motion had been made in the first action, In re Shephard, Shephard v. Shephard, the court would not have discharged the sequestration. There is, therefore, no ground for this motion, and it must be refused, and as the parties have agreed to treat the hearing of this application as the trial of the action, the action must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, R. J. Witty; Coode, Kingdon, & Cotton.

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
North, J.

Nov. 15, 22.

GROSVENOR v. WHITE. (a.)

Practice—Striking out pleadings—Reasonable cause of action—Preliminary trial of question of law—Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4; ord. 34, r. 2.

A testator left £20,000 to trustees for G. for life, with remainder to her younger children, which was invested by the trustees in India Four per Cent. Stock. The Secretary of State for India gave notice to the holders of that stock offering equal amounts of India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock in exchange, and announcing his intention to pay off at par such of the holders of Four per Cent. India Stock as did not accept his offer. The trustees did not accept this offer, and were paid off at par, and they then allowed the sum received in payment to remain at the bank uninvested for seven months, after which they invested it in railway stock. The India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock stood in the market at a premium from the date of the offer of the Secretary of State for India down to the time of the investment by the trustees in railway stock.

An action was brought by G. and her younger children against the trustees, claiming in the writ (1) the loss of income occasioned by the delay in investment of the sum received in payment off of the Four per Cent. Stock; (2) the loss of capital incurred by the neglect of the trustees to accept the offer to take Three and a Half per Cent. Stock in exchange for the Four per Cent. Stock, with further relief. J., one of the trustees, paid into court the sum claimed for loss of income, which was taken out of court by G. The statement of claim stated the facts, including the payment into court by the defendant J. and the taking of the money out of court by G., and claimed (1) for loss of capital incurred by the neglect of the trustees to accept the offer of Three and a Half per Cent. Stock instead of Four per Cent. Stock; (2) costs.

The defendant J. then moved, under ord. 25, r. 4, that the statement of claim might be struck out as against him, on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

Held, that, as the statement of claim disclosed a cause of action for loss of income, which the defendant J. had admitted to be reasonable by his payment into court, and also asked for the costs of the relief sought in the action, it could not be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, even supposing the claim for loss of capital was bad; but leave was given to amend the notice of motion so as to apply for the determination of the question of law under ord. 34, r. 2.

The notice of motion was accordingly amended as follows:—"Whether (assuming, for the purposes of the arguments of such question, that the allegations in the statement of claim are true) there was any such duty on the part of the defendants or of the defendant J. to accept India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock as in the 9th paragraph of the claim alleged, and whether the defendants or the defendant J. were or was guilty of any negligence or breach of duty in not accepting such stock, and whether the defendant J. is under any liability to make good to the capital of the trust funds in the claim mentioned"—the loss therein mentioned. The defendant J. did not admit that he had in fact received the above-mentioned notice from the Secretary of State for India.

Held, that, as the notice of motion only assumed, for the purposes of the argument of the question, that the allegations in the statement of claim were true, and left it open to the defendant J. to raise other defences if the question were decided against him, that it would not be convenient to decide the question on the motion.

Motion.

Lord Annaly, by his will, dated the 29th of July, 1872, gave to C. W. White and W. L. Joynt a sum of £20,000 upon trust to invest as therein mentioned, and pay the income to Emilie B. Grosvenor for life for her separate use, with remainder to her younger children.

The testator died on the 3rd of September, 1873, and the trustees on the 9th of March, 1875, invested £19,800, the balance of the legacy after deducting the duty thereon, in the purchase of £19,141 19s. 8d. India £4 per Cent. Stock, which was redeemable at par on and after the 10th of October, 1888, upon one year's notice by the Secretary of State for India.

In April, 1887, the Secretary of State for India gave notice to the holders of that stock that he was prepared to grant them equal amounts of £3½ per cent. stock in exchange for the £4 per cent. stock; and that those who accepted the offer would on the 6th of July, 1887, receive interest at £4 per cent. on their old stock up to that date, and also 10s. on their old stock in advance up to the 10th of October, 1888, this being the difference for that period between the interest at the old rate and the interest at the new rate, and that the offer must be accepted by the 1st of June, 1887. The Secretary of State for India also announced at the same time his intention of giving notice to pay off on the 10th of October, 1888, at par such of the holders of the £4 per cent. stock as did not accept his offer.

It was alleged by the plaintiffs in the action in paragraph 8 of their statement of claim that C. W. White and W. L. Joynt, the trustees, who were the defendants, received this notice; but this allegation was not admitted by W. L. Joynt.

The trustees, C. W. White and W. L. Joynt, did not, however, accept the offer, and on the 10th of October, 1888, the sum of £19,141 19s. 8d. was paid them by the Secretary of State in pursuance of a notice to pay off given on the 4th of October, 1887.

The trustees, C. W. White and W. L. Joynt, allowed this sum to remain in a bank uninvested until the 14th of May, 1889, when they invested it in railway stock.

From April, 1887, the date of the offer of conversion, until the 14th of May, 1889, when the investment in railway stock was effected, the £3½ per Cent. India Stock stood at a premium in the market.

The action was brought in July, 1889, by Emilie B. Grosvenor and her younger children against the trustees, C. W. White and W. L. Joynt. The writ claimed (1) payment to Mrs. Grosvenor of the sum of £326 12s. 2d., the amount of income lost through the neglect of the trustees to find an investment for the sum of £19,141 19s. 8d. from the 10th of October, 1888, to the 14th of May, 1889; (2) that the defendants should, out of their own moneys, invest in their names upon the trusts of the will the sum of £1,818 9s. 8d., being the difference between the sum of £19,141 19s. 8d. and the market value of an equal amount of £3½ per Cent. India Stock on the 14th of May, 1889; and (3) consequential relief.

On the 1st of August, 1889, the defendant, W. L. Joynt, who was the acting trustee, paid into court the sum of £326 12s. 2d., in satisfaction of the claim by Mrs. Grosvenor for loss of income, which sum was taken out of court by her.

The statement of claim in the action, delivered in October, 1889, set out the above-mentioned facts, including the payment into court by the defendant W. L. Joynt, and the taking out of court by the plaintiff, Mrs. Grosvenor, of the sum of £326 12s. 2d. in satisfaction of the claim for loss of income, and alleged that that loss of income, and also loss of capital to the amount of £1,818 9s. 8d., had been occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, and their breach of duty in not accepting the offer of the Secretary of State for India for conversion of the 4 per Cent. India Stock into 3½ per Cent. Stock, and claimed (1) that the defendants should be ordered to invest out of their own moneys the sum of £1,818 9s. 8d. upon the trusts of the will; (2) payment of costs by the defendants; and (3) further or other relief.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a motion by the defendant, W. L. Joynt, under ord. 25, r. 4, that the statement of claim might be struck out as against him, on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action; that the action might be stayed or dismissed as against him; that judgment might be entered accordingly for him; and that the plaintiffs might be ordered to pay his costs incurred since the date of the payment into court by him. The object of the motion was the determination of the legal question whether the defendants were liable to make good the loss of capital above mentioned.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the motion.—The only remaining cause of action is in respect of the loss of capital disclosed by the facts set out in the statement of claim. This raises the question of law whether the defendants are liable to make good the loss of capital which has occurred, which can be decided in the quickest and least expensive way upon this motion. [They referred to ord. 25, r. 4.] The plaintiffs can recover their costs incurred in respect of the claim for loss of income under ord. 22, r. 7.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Elgood, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

NORTH, J.—In the writ of summons there are claims against the defendants in respect of alleged breaches of duty by them as trustees, one for loss of capital occasioned by their not accepting the offer of India £3½ per Cent. Stock instead of India £4 per Cent. Stock held by them, and another for loss of income in neglecting for some time to invest trust funds in their hands. These are separate and independent claims. The claim for loss of capital raises a point of law, which, in the interests of all parties, ought to be decided at the earliest date. The Rules of Court provide several ways by which a decision might be obtained. Thus ord. 25, r. 2, provides that any party may raise by his pleading any point of law, and that any point so raised may, by consent of the parties or by order of the court or a judge, be set down for hearing and disposed of at any time before the trial. It is said to be doubtful whether a point of law is raised by a party by his pleading unless the opposite party has pleaded to the point. I am not going to decide this. It was open to the defendant Joynt to raise the point by his pleadings and then proceed under that rule, but he has not done so. Then ord. 34, r. 2, provides that if it appear to the court or a judge that there is in any cause or matter a question of law which it would be convenient to have decided before any evidence is given or any question or issue of fact tried, the court or judge may make an order accordingly, and may direct such question to be raised for the opinion of the court either by special case or in such other manner as the court or judge may deem expedient. The defendant Joynt might have applied under that rule, but he has not adopted that course. He makes this motion under ord. 25, r. 4, which provides that "the court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action," and he moves that the statement of claim in the action may be struck out. But the statement of claim discloses two causes of action—one in respect of loss of capital, and the other in respect of loss of income. It alleges that a sum of money was paid into court by the defendant Joynt in satisfaction of the latter claim, and that that sum has been taken out of court by the plaintiff, Mrs. Grosvenor, and is, therefore, no longer recoverable in the action.

It has been contended that this has been mentioned in the statement of claim merely as part of the history of the case; but it is stated as one of the grounds of the relief which was sought, and which relief comprises the costs of the whole action.

The statement of claim, therefore, discloses two causes of action, one of which has been admitted by payment of money into court. If, therefore, after hearing the arguments on the motion, I came to the conclusion that the other cause of action disclosed is not reasonable, I could not order the statement of claim to be struck out. But as it is for the interest of all parties that the point should be decided, I will give leave to amend the notice of motion so as to enable this to be done. [His lordship then granted leave to amend the notice of motion by asking that, pursuant to ord. 34, r. 2, the point of law might be decided before any issue of fact was tried, stating the point of law, and asking that all further proceedings against the defendant Joynt might be stayed, and that such order might be made as to the costs of the action as the judge might think fit.]

Nov. 22.—The question of law now came on for argument as defined by the amended notice of motion—viz., "whether (assuming, for the purposes of the argument of such question, that the allegations in the statement of claim are true) there was any such duty on the part of the defendants, or the defendant W. L. Joynt, to accept India 3½ per Cent. Stock, as in the 9th paragraph of the claim alleged, and whether the defendants, or the defendant W. L. Joynt, were or was guilty of any negligence or breach of duty in not accepting such stock, and whether the defendant W. L. Joynt is under any liability to make good to the capital of the trust funds in the claim mentioned the sum of £1,818 9s. 8d. therein mentioned."

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the motion referring to the allegations in the statement of claim, stated that they did not admit that the notice of the Secretary of State for India was received by the defendant W. L. Joynt, as alleged in paragraph 8 of the statement of claim. [NORTH, J.—If you do not admit the facts the question of law may never arise: The Republic of Bolivia v. The National Bolivian Navigation Co., 24 W. R. 361. If the point were stated thus, were the defendants liable for the loss of capital (1) if they did receive the notice, and (2) if they did not receive the notice?; and if both (1) and (2) were decided the same way, there would be an end to the question; but if one was decided one way and one another, there would remain only the issue of fact did the defendants receive the notice or did they not.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. — The question whether the defendants received the particular letter or not would not be sufficiently exhaustive, as they might be affected with notice without actually receiving the letter.

Higgins, Q.C., and Upjohn.—The plaintiffs' deduction of law from their statement of facts is bad. If so, there is an end of their case. If not, the issue of facts must be decided. The point of law can be decided on this motion. The case of The Republic of Bolivia v. The National Bolivian Navigation Co. is not applicable to the present case.

They referred to Tattersall v. The National Steamship Co. (Limited), W. N., 1884, p. 32.

NORTH, J.—I cannot at this stage of the action decide the point of law. There is a question which will be left open. If it were one which I could dispose of by putting the question of law in an alternative form,

I should decide the question of law. But here, if I were to decide that the defendant Joynt was not liable if he did not receive the written notice of the Secretary of State for India, the plaintiff will say that, although the defendant did not receive that particular letter, he had notice of the offer in some other way. There is no way of disposing of all the alternative questions which may have to be decided between the parties; and, therefore, I do not see my way to exercise the discretion given me by ord. 34, r. 2. That rule provides that, "If it appear to the court or a judge that there is in any cause or matter a question of law which it would be convenient to have decided before any evidence is given or any question or issue of fact is tried, . . . the court or judge may make an order accordingly, and may direct such question of law to be raised for the opinion of the court either by special case or in such other manner as the court or judge may deem expedient." That is, if the judge sees his way to do so he may do it.

No statement of a point of law has been made, as I suggested when the motion was before me last week, and the notice of motion does not supply the deficiency. It only assumes, for the purposes of the argument of the question, that the allegations in the statement of claim are true. That is, the defendant Joynt intends, if I decide against him, to raise other defences upon the facts. I do not see my way to trying a question now which is raised by the defendant Joynt in such a way as to keep open points unless I decide in his favour. I do not think it would be convenient to decide the question of law before the issues of fact are tried. I think that the principle laid down in the case of The Republic of Bolivia v. The National Bolivian Navigation Co. is applicable to this case, although the facts there are different. I can make no order on the motion, except that the costs be reserved to be dealt with at the trial of the action.

Solicitors, Clarke, Woodcock, & Ryland; Tyrrell, Lewis, & Co.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Nov. 16.

In re Jones. (a.)

Practice—Originating summons—Appointment of new trustee—Vesting order on motion, validity of—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 55, r. 13*a* (Dec., 1888)—Judicature Act, 1875, s. 17—Trustee Act, 1850, ss. 35, 43.

An order appointing new trustees, made on motion in proceedings instituted by way of an originating summons, may also vest in the trustees a right to call for the transfer of stock under section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850.

Motion.

In May, 1889, proceedings were commenced by an originating summons intituled "In the matter of the trusts of the will dated the 25th day of June, 1878, of John Richard Jones, deceased, and in the matter of the Trustee Act, 1850." This summons was issued under ord. 55, r. 13*a*, of December, 1888, and under certain sections of the Trustee Act, 1850, and asked for the appointment of a new trustee of Mr. Jones' will, in the place of a trustee who was out of the jurisdiction, and for an order vesting the trust estate in the continuing trustee and in the new trustee jointly. On June 22, 1889, Kekewich, J., made an order on motion, in the proceedings thus commenced by summons, appointing a new trustee and vesting the trust property as desired by the applicants. The order vested the right to call for a transfer of a sum of Consols standing in the names of the trustees, but the Bank of England being advised that the order was invalid, declined to act upon it. The present application was that the Bank of England might be ordered to act in accordance with the order of June 22.

Neville, Q.C., and P. O. Lawrence, for the applicants.

Farwell, on behalf of other parties, supported the application.

Latham, Q.C., and T. Howard Wright, for the Bank of England, stated their objections to the order.

Kekewich, J.—Ord. 55, r. 13*a*, of December, 1888 (the order in existence when the previous motion was made, but for which there is now substituted ord. 55, r. 13*a*, of June, 1889), provided that "in all cases in which the court has jurisdiction to appoint new trustees upon petition, an application may be made to a judge in chambers by summons, and new trustees thereupon appointed." I must assume that that rule and the one substituted for it have been properly made, no slip or want of compliance with any formality having been shown. This is strictly a question of "practice or procedure" within the meaning of section 17 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and therefore comes directly within the power of the Rules Committee, and the rule made, therefore, is good. Finding thus a rule under which, where a trustee might formerly be appointed on petition, he may now be appointed on summons, I turn to section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850, which enables the court, on appointing a new trustee, by the same or a subsequent order to vest the right to call for a transfer of stock. That section must be read with section 43 of the same Act, which provides that "whensoever, in any cause or matter, . . . the facts necessary for an order under this Act shall appear to such court to be sufficiently proved, it shall be lawful for the said court, either upon the hearing of the said cause, or of any petition or motion in the said cause or matter, to make such order under this Act." The order must be made in some way pointed out by section 43. I think that, although proceedings commenced by originating summons have been held to be an action, they are not a "cause" within the meaning of section 43. But in this case there has been a motion, not in a cause, but in a "matter" commenced in the manner pointed out by the rules of court, and therefore, the Act has been complied with. There has been a proper appointment of trustees, a motion in that matter, and a vesting order, and it is difficult to see how that order could be bad. If, under the old practice, when trustees had been appointed on petition, a vesting order could be made on motion in that matter, why cannot the order be made on motion where the initiatory step is a summons instead of a petition? The objection of the bank must be overruled.

Solicitors, Venn & Co.; Pritchard, Englefield, & Co.; Freshfields & Williams.

(a.) Reported by C. Herbert Brown, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Dec. 6.

PROUT v. GREGORY.
SHARP (Garnishee). (a.)

Practice—Attachment for debts—Dividend payable in bankruptcy—Garnishee order on official receiver—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 58, 125—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 45, r. 1.

A dividend payable in a bankruptcy cannot be attached in the hands of the official receiver to answer a judgment obtained against the creditor to whom it is payable.

Appeal from an order of a master referred by Grantham, J., to the court.

The plaintiff, having obtained judgment against the defendant, made an application at chambers under ord. 45, r. 1, and obtained an order that all debts owing or accruing from one Sharp to the defendant should be attached to answer the judgment. Sharp was an official receiver, and as such was conducting the administration in bankruptcy of the estate of a deceased debtor, under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in which administration the defendant had proved as a creditor. On cause being shown why the garnishee should not pay to the judgment creditor the amount due to the judgment debtor in the administration, the master discharged the order. On appeal, Grantham, J., referred the case to the court.

Percy Gye, for the execution creditor.—This is an attachable debt. In a bankruptcy, under section 125, sub-sections (5) and (6) of the Act of 1883, the official receiver is to realize and distribute the property of the debtor in accordance with the provisions of the Act. By section 58, sub-section 1, "subject to the retention of such sums as may be necessary for the costs of administration or otherwise, the trustee shall, with all convenient speed, declare and distribute dividends amongst the creditors who have proved their debts." But if any such debt is attached, it is the duty of the trustee to pay in accordance with the order of the court. The Act does not take away the liability to obey an order of a court competent to deal with the debt. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The Act prescribes a code, by which it seems to be intended to secure an equal and unpreferential distribution. MATHEW, J.—There is no debt due from the official receiver. A creditor in a bankruptcy could not sue the official receiver for the debt.]

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, was not called upon to argue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We have to deal with a statute which provides for the administration of estates in bankruptcy. It lays down provisions for the distribution of such estates, and we cannot depart from them. The appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that there is no debt owing from the official receiver to the judgment debtor.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the execution creditor, J. and C. Robinson & Wilkins, for H. Goodger, Burton-on-Trent.

Solicitor for the official receiver, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Dec. 4, 5.

STAREY v. CHILWORTH GUNPOWDER CO. (a.)

Trade-marks—Sale of goods by firm of manufacturers—Name of firm attached—Goods not manufactured by firm—"False trade description"—Meaning of "intent to defraud" in Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, sub-sections 1, 2.

The defendants, a firm of gunpowder manufacturers, had contracted to deliver to her Majesty's Government a large amount of gunpowder, which they were in the habit of manufacturing under the trade name of "R. L. G. No. 4." Being prevented by an explosion from manufacturing the required amount, they imported similar gunpowder from Germany. This they placed in the barrels ordinarily supplied by the Government, and labelled the same "Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ltd. R. L. G. No. 4"; and so delivered them to the Government. Upon an information being laid against them under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, for "having unlawfully applied a false trade description" to the said gunpowder, the magistrates found that the name of the firm had been placed on the label where the name of the contractor was required to be inserted by the Government; that there had been no intent by the defendants to defraud the Government; and that there was no stipulation between the parties that the gunpowder to be supplied should be of English manufacture; but that the defendants were in fact manufacturers of gunpowder, and the gunpowder so delivered was not in fact manufactured by them.

Held, that, upon such facts, the magistrates ought to have convicted the defendants, under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, of the offence of applying to or selling goods with a false trade description with intent to defraud, inasmuch as such a description as was attached implied that the defendants were delivering gunpowder of their own manufacture when, in fact, it was not such; and that an intent to defraud under this Act did not necessarily imply an intent to cheat a customer as to the quality of the goods delivered, nor any fraud in a pecuniary sense, but that such intent is implied from the fact that the manufacturer or vendor supplies something else than that which the customer, from the description given to the goods, thought he was getting.

Case stated by the magistrates of Essex at petty sessions.

An information had been laid against the Chilworth Gunpowder Co. (Limited) by John Starey, the secretary of the Trade-Mark Owners' Protection Association (Limited) to the following effect—that the said company on the 7th and 11th of February, 1889, and other days, at Purfleet, in Essex, "did unlawfully apply, or cause to be applied, a false trade description, to wit, the letters, figures, and words 'Gunpowder, Chilworth G.P. Co. (Limited), R. L. G. 4,' to goods—namely, gunpowder—contrary to the statute 50 & 51 Vict. c. 28, s. 2."

Upon the hearing the following facts were proved:—

The respondents are an English company limited by shares and registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886. They are manufacturers of gunpowder, and have mills at Chilworth, in Surrey, and at Fernilee, in Derbyshire, and general offices in the City of London.

In May, 1888, the respondents entered into a contract with her Majesty's Government for the supply of 5,000 barrels of gunpowder of a description known as R. L. G. 4 (Rifle Large Grain, No. 4).

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said contract contained stipulations that the said gunpowder should be delivered on certain specified dates, and that in default of such delivery the respondents should be liable to a fixed penalty of 2½ per cent., and to be charged with the difference in price if H.M.'s Government should buy the gunpowder elsewhere. There were no stipulations in the said contract that the said gunpowder should be of the respondents' own manufacture, or that it should be of English manufacture; and it was proved that in other contracts between the same parties such express stipulations were inserted.

The respondents are manufacturers of the kind of gunpowder mentioned, and at the making of the contract intended to manufacture the gunpowder which they had agreed to supply, but they were prevented from carrying out their intention by two explosions at their mills. H.M.'s Government pressed for the delivery of the said gunpowder, and in order to fulfil their contract the respondents arranged with a German firm, and imported the whole of the said gunpowder from Germany in cylinders bearing a label "Manufactured in Germany."

By reason of having so to import the said gunpowder the respondents sustained a loss of 3s. or 4s. per barrel.

Upon receipt of the said gunpowder at their mills at Chilworth the respondents took it out of the cylinders and placed it in barrels supplied to them by H.M.'s Government according to a provision in the contract that it should be delivered in barrels supplied by the Government.

The respondents affixed or applied to each of such barrels the following label:—

"Gunpowder. 110lbs. Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ld. R. L. G. 4. March, 1889. Bag waterproof. Lot 179. T. R. 28."

This label is in the form which the Government prescribe for their barrels, the words "Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ld." being inserted in the place where the name of the contractor is required to be inserted.

There was no indication upon the said label or otherwise upon the barrels that the said gunpowder was of German manufacture, but the description of the gunpowder was accurately stated as R. L. G. 4, and it was equal in quality to powder of that description manufactured by the respondents.

The said gunpowder was accepted by the Government in fulfilment of the contract without complaint that it was inferior in quality, or that it did not answer the description of gunpowder contracted for, but it was admitted that no communication was made to the Government upon delivery or otherwise that the said gunpowder was of German manufacture.

Upon the facts aforesaid the magistrates found that the said label was not a false trade description within the meaning of the statute, and that there had been no intent to defraud on the part of the respondents, and therefore dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, upon the facts, we ought to have convicted the respondents.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and McKenna, for the appellant, representing the Trade-Mark Owners' Mutual Protection Association (Limited).—The label complained of conveyed a false description of the place of manufacture—that is a "false trade description" within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1888. The true description was on the labels fixed upon the cylinders. The Act was specially devised against marks of English manufacture being applied to foreign goods, such as Sheffield marks upon foreign cutlery. The magistrates have merely found that the respondents did not intend to cheat or defraud the Government as to the quality of the gunpowder; that is admitted. The special defence allowed by the Act, of there being "no intent to defraud," must be applied to the matters dealt with by the Act—i.e., trade-marks or trade description which would tend to deceive the public and give a wrong impression of the place of manufacture. The blank in the label was intended to show the place of manufacture as well as the contractor's name, where he was not himself the manufacturer.

Poland, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the respondent company.—There was no complaint by the Government of their having been defrauded in their contract with the respondents, and the magistrates have in fact found that there was no intent to defraud. The barrels as labelled were not to be dealt with in commerce, but merely for delivery. The magistrates find that the name of the company was inserted in the label where the contractor's name is required, and that it did not imply that they had manufactured the gunpowder. The actual meaning of the label is a question of fact for the magistrates, and they find that the label only implied that the company were the contractors delivering the gunpowder, and that with such a meaning attached to the company's name on the label there was no "false description" within the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The offence charged was "the application of a false trade description": section 2, sub-section 1 (d). The onus of rebutting the charge of fraud is on the respondents, and this they have done by the finding of the magistrate that there was no intent to defraud. If it be held that there was a false trade description in fact applied to this gunpowder, the respondents are still entitled, under sub-section 2 (c), to be acquitted if they "acted innocently." That they did so act is shown by the findings, that there was no stipulation in their contract that the gunpowder should be of English manufacture, and that there was no intent to defraud the Government in the delivery of what was in fact German gunpowder. "To deceive" in the Act means to intend to cheat a customer as to the quality of the goods offered for sale. Such an intention is a question of fact for the magistrates, and they have found in the respondents' favour: Gridley v. Swinburne, 52 J. P. 791.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case our first impression was that, if anything could be gained by our sending back the case to the magistrates in order that certain facts might be more specifically found, the case ought to go back, as it is one of great importance; but upon consideration we are both of opinion that nothing would be really gained by such a proceeding, and that we have enough stated before us upon which to come to the conclusion which I will presently state.

The facts as stated are as follows:—The respondent company consists of a large firm of gunpowder manufacturers. This company had a large contract with the Government to deliver 5,000 barrels of gunpowder. The Government presumably had confidence in the firm, and so far approved of their manufacture as to intrust them with this large order for the particular gunpowder known in the trade as "Rifle Large Grain No. 4," or shortly described by traders as "R. L. G. No. 4." The manufacturing company unfortunately had an explosion at one of their places of business, whereby their mills were rendered useless. Owing to this accident they found that they would be unable to fulfil their contract with the Government unless they could obtain gunpowder elsewhere. By their contract they were bound to deliver the whole amount of gunpowder required by a specific time, and if they failed to do so the Government could buy in elsewhere against them and recoup themselves from the respondent company by penalties to be exacted for their failure to deliver. It is admitted that the company would have had great difficulty in procuring a sufficient amount of such gunpowder in England elsewhere than from their own works had these been in good working order. They were, therefore, in a great difficulty as to how to fulfil their contract. They thereupon chose to obtain the required amount of gunpowder from Germany. They obtained it in barrels marked with a trade-mark of the locality of its manufacture sufficient to satisfy the Custom House authorities. Upon its arrival at the company's works they transfer the powder to barrels supplied by the Government and put upon them labels also supplied from the same source, but with a blank left for the name of the firm supplying the article in question. The whole question before us turns upon this label, which ran as follows:—"Gunpowder. 110lbs. Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ld. R. L. G. No. 4," with certain immaterial addenda.

In regard to this point the magistrates find that (1) "the label is in the form which the Government prescribe for their barrels"; and (2) "the words 'Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ld.,' were inserted in the place in which the name of the contractor is required by the Government to be inserted." Upon that I will observe that the word "contractor" is manifestly ambiguous. It may mean a person who is the manufacturer but not the vendor, or a vendor who is not the manufacturer, or one who is both manufacturer and vendor of the goods so labelled. Where, as in this case, it is extremely important to know whether the defendants were manufacturers only of the article so labelled with their name, and whether the label implied that they were so, the word "contractor" is obscure.

If this were not shown in the case itself it would be necessary to ascertain what their name on the labels did mean on this occasion, and to send back that to be specifically found by the magistrates; but the case does supply us with sufficient information on this point. The Chilworth Gunpowder Co. (Limited) are found in the case to have been manufacturers of gunpowder, and in a sense manufacturers only. It may be said that in this case they sold the gunpowder, not as manufacturers, but as vendors; but it is found as a fact that they never had, except in this instance, sold gunpowder not of their own manufacture—I mean in the course of this contract with the Government they had never done so. When they used the phrase "Chilworth Gunpowder Co. (Limited)" on the labels they must be taken, unless in this special instance, to have meant that they were the manufacturers of the gunpowder in the barrels so labelled. But in this instance they were, in fact, not the manufacturers of the gunpowder in the barrels so labelled. It is clear from that, to my mind, that such a description, under such circumstances, came within the meaning of a false trade description within the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

The cogency of this is enforced by the case cited by my brother Mathew—Johnson v. Raylton, 30 W. R. 850, 7 Q. B. D. 438. In that case the Court of Appeal held that where a person buys goods from a manufacturer, there is an implied warranty that the goods so supplied are of his own manufacture. Notwithstanding the dissent of Bramwell, L.J., that decision was assented to without an appeal to the House of Lords. It affords, therefore, a strong confirmation of our present decision that the magistrates were wrong upon their findings of fact in not holding that the defendant company had committed an offence under the Act cited. We hold that they had committed such offence.

But Mr. Poland has argued that that is not enough to secure their conviction, because in sub-sections 1 and 2 of section 2 of the Act they have a sufficient answer to the offence charged, if, under sub-section 1, there is proved to have been "no intent to defraud," or, under sub-section 2 (c), the defendant is proved to have "acted innocently." It is not necessary elaborately to go into the exact meaning of these sub-sections. They deal with different offences, and the language therefore naturally varies. Substantially the language is the same, and it varies only so far as the subject-matter to be dealt with is distinguishable. Sub-section (1) relates to the application of false trade descriptions to goods which may be defended by proof of no "intent to defraud." Sub-section 2 deals with the case of the sale of goods with a false trade-mark or such as is "calculated to deceive," but where the defendant is proved to have otherwise "acted innocently." It was once very sagely observed in regard to definitions that "if persons are once convinced by a definition that they understood differently what they meant by the same words, controversy on those words becomes superfluous or useless." In this case controversy becomes superfluous if once we are certain of the meaning. If "fraud" is interpreted in what I may call the money sense—i.e., if there is an intent to put off a purchaser with something else less valuable, or to take more money than what the purchaser understood to be agreed upon—in that sense I wish emphatically to state there is no evidence against the respondent company. Indeed, the contrary is expressly found by the magistrates. There has been no fraud or intent to defraud in the money sense. But that sense of fraud is not quite the true construction of these sections. What is pointed at by the Act is the wrongful use of a trade-mark—a putting off on the public of something which is not necessarily of less value, but of what the public would be less inclined to buy, or had not stipulated directly or indirectly to buy. There might, as has been said, be no difference in quality or substance between A.'s or B.'s fish sauce; but if A. gets people to buy his sauce, which is precisely as good as, or the same as B.'s, but which the public would not buy if they did not believe it was B.'s fish sauce, that is an intent to make the purchaser take something which he might not take if he knew it was not the maker's whose he thought it was. Some such sense must be taken to be the true meaning of the provisions of this Act. In that sense only we must hold that there was here on the part of the defendants an intent to defraud. It is clear, I think, that the defendants wanted to save their contract, and so escape the penalties for its default. That is a perfectly legitimate commercial object. They endeavoured to deliver the amount of "R. L. G. No. 4" contracted for. That "R. L. G. No. 4" was, I may observe, an English trade term for that particular gunpowder. They take similar gunpowder out of German barrels and put it into the barrels supplied them by the Government, and label it for delivery exactly in the same manner and for the same contract as the gunpowder of their own manufacture so contracted for, and they thereby avoid the penalties and other serious consequences entailed by the Government buying in gunpowder against them had they failed to deliver the full amount. However legitimate and genuine their endeavour might be, the defendants would seem to have broken the Act in using a similar trade-mark for such gunpowder as they used for gunpowder of their own manufacture, and they must be held to have done so with an intent to defraud within the meaning of the Act in that they left the Government to believe that they had got an article which the Government had, in fact, not got. I agree that there was no pecuniary fraud in the supply of this article, but I must hold, nevertheless, that in so doing they committed an offence under this Act.

Upon the third point, that the magistrates are said to have found as a fact that there was no fraud, and that, therefore, we cannot question their finding of fact, I hold that what the magistrates have left to the court is whether, upon such facts as they have found, they ought to have convicted the respondents of an intent to defraud. If they had found as a fact that there was no such intent to defraud or deceive as stated in the Act, the respondents were entitled by the Act to be acquitted. The magistrates cannot be taken to have left for us the question whether they ought to have convicted the respondents upon facts under which by the Act they were entitled to be acquitted. If their finding was conclusive on this fact the argument was a good one, but their finding does not go far as that. They only ask whether, upon such facts as they find, they were bound to convict the respondents of fraud under the Act. We hold that they were.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, strikes at transactions with goods the place of the manufacture of which is misstated or concealed. That is the offence. Was this a misstatement of the place of manufacture? The statement on the label used was exactly such a statement as that which the respondents used in the ordinary course of business, and must be taken to have conveyed to the Government that the article supplied was, as was usual, manufactured by the respondents as "R. L. G. No. 4." The respondents thereby clearly committed an offence under section 2 of the Act. But it is said there are limitations put to any conviction for such offence under the subsections of section 2. There was no intent to defraud. I will only add to what my lord has said that I admit unreservedly that there was no intent to palm off on the Government any inferior goods. There was, however, in all probability an intention to avoid the consequences of failure to fulfil their contract, consequences which might have been avoided by a more carefully framed contract in regard to any exceptional circumstances preventing them fulfilling the contract in time. The respondents' intention was to save their contract—a perfectly fair mercantile intention. I assume that the Government got the quality of article it intended to get. But I do not think that the words in the Act are limited to mean, as Mr. Poland would have us to say, that the guilty intent must be "to cheat customers." The Act purposely creates a new offence—namely, the use of a particular trade-mark which tends to deceive without necessarily any intent to cheat purchasers in so doing.

On the last point I think that the magistrates only ask us what they ought to have done upon such facts as they have found. We hold that they ought to have found the defendants guilty of the offence.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, McKenna & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Bircham & Co.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Dec. 3.

REG. v. COWPER. (a.)

County court—Costs—Particulars to be signed by solicitor—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10—Appendix on Costs (Lower Scale), rr. 1, 2.

Under ord. 6, r. 10, of the County Court Rules, 1889, read with the Appendix on Costs, rr. 1, 2, the particulars required to be indorsed by a solicitor must be signed in writing by the solicitor, otherwise the costs stated in the Appendix will not be allowed. A lithographed form of signature on forms for particulars ready prepared is not a compliance with the rule as interpreted by the Appendix.

Semble, a county court judge is at liberty to appear in the superior court against a rule calling upon him to hear and determine a matter, though he may not be entitled to have his costs for such appearance.

Rule calling upon Fitzroy Cowper, Esq., the deputy-judge of the county court at Croydon to show cause why he should not hear and determine a matter in an action entered in the county court.

The facts of the case were as follows:—Upon the issue of a summons in the Croydon County Court in an action of Rees v. Tassell a lithographed form of copy of particulars was indorsed, "Claim, £2 16s. 5d.; court fees, 4s.; solicitors' costs, 4s.," and the name of the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiff was lithographed below the indorsement. The defendant paid the whole sum into court minus the 4s. for costs. The registrar accepted the amount so paid in minus the solicitors' costs, on the ground that the solicitors had not signed the particulars as required by the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10, and Appendix "Costs on the Lower Scale," r. 1.

The deputy-judge upheld this ruling, and refused leave to appeal.

The plaintiff thereupon obtained a rule to show cause why the judge should not hear and determine an application for such costs.

Jelf, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the deputy-judge, showed cause against the rule.

Crump, Q.C. (E. Lewis Thomas with him), for the plaintiff Rees, took the preliminary objection that the judge had no right to be represented except on an appeal as to jurisdiction: Reg. v. Marylebone County Court Judge, 50 L. T. N. S. 98, per Day, J.

The COURT held that the judge might appear if he chose to do so, though it may not be the usual course, and though the result might be that he would not be entitled to any costs, but that there was no rule against his so appearing.

Crump, Q.C., subsequently further objected that counsel for the judge were instructed by the Treasury, who had no right to intervene.

The COURT held that the Treasury were entitled to defend a judge whose exercise of his duty was being attacked.

Jelf, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie showed cause.—This is either an attempt to appeal without leave, in an action for less than £20, against the provisions of section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, or else it is a review of the registrar's taxation of costs, for which other procedure is laid down in section 119 of the same Act; Jonas v. Long, 36 W. R. 315, 20 Q. B. D. 564.

Crump, Q.C., and E. Lewis Thomas, for the plaintiff.—There is no question of taxation here. The claim for these costs has never been adjudicated upon. The registrar has only taken into consideration the rule as interpreted by him. What is the true construction of the rule has never been adjudicated.

The COURT held that the matter was one of public importance, and that it was advisable for the defendant to allow the question to be argued upon its merits and to waive the technical objection, which, however, the court were, as at present advised, inclined to hold a valid one.

Jelf, Q.C., consented to waive the objection and to argue the case upon the merits.—The costs are strictly limited in principle in the county courts, and the solicitors must conform strictly to the conditions imposed for the recovery of costs. Ord. 6, r. 10, of the County Courts Act, 1889, requires the particulars to be indorsed by the solicitor, and the Appendix on Costs says they are to be signed, and the note adds: "No other costs are to be allowed than the above where the amount does not exceed £10 unless the judge certifies otherwise." The costs here are only recoverable when the particulars are signed by the solicitor. He cannot sign by anticipation or only in blank, as on a bill of exchange. He must certify by signing that the particulars are such as are described above his signature. The costs are for work done in setting out the particulars. Someone else might have done the work if a great number of these lithographed forms are available for use. This is not a case of a facsimile signature being stamped on after the particulars have been completely set out.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Crump, Q.C.—Where the solicitor has fulfilled the requirements of ord. 6, r. 10, by indorsing the particulars with his name and address, he has fulfilled the conditions entitling him to costs. He has certified the genuineness of the document. Stamped signatures have been held good under the Wills Act and the Registration Acts. A lithographed form of signature is analogous.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I yield to the objection taken by the defendant to this appeal on its merits with great reluctance. If rule 10 of order 6 of the County Court Rules, 1889, stood alone, I should decide against the objection without hesitation, and say that indorsement included other modes of signature than that in writing. But the order refers to the appendix to show what costs are recoverable and under what circumstances. The order and the appendix must be read together, and we must give effect to statutory words when they are clear, as these are. Ord. 6, r. 10, enacts that "the costs of entering the plaint by the solicitor shall not be allowed unless he shall indorse on the particulars his name, or firm, and place of business." What are these costs? For these you must turn to the "Appendix as to Costs on the Lower Scale." There you find that "where the particulars and copies are signed by a solicitor, and the amount claimed exceeds £2, and does not exceed £5 (as is the case here), there may be entered upon an ordinary summons, and upon a default summons, four shillings." This regulation of the appendix must be incorporated with, and read into, the rule above mentioned, and, that being so, the word "indorsement" in the rule must mean "signature." I yield to the objection, therefore, urged against the lithographed indorsement, though reluctantly, yet without hesitation, looking at what is the really plain meaning of the rule and the appendix taken together. They mean simply what they say, and they clearly say that the required indorsement is to be by the signature of the solicitor.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should certainly have been disposed, had the rule stood by itself, to have said that this very technical objection had no real force, but unluckily there can be no ambiguity in the construction of the word indorsement in the rule when the appendix is referred to. There it is expressly stated that "where the particulars and copies are signed by a solicitor" the costs allowed are recoverable. And the same phrase is used in the case of costs on the higher scale—viz., "Preparing particulars, &c., provided such particulars and copies are signed by the solicitor," and "Preparing further particulars, &c., when signed by the solicitor." I agree, therefore, that we are coerced to limit indorsement in ord. 6, r. 10, to the meaning of signature. There will be no costs allowed on this rule.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Aird & Hood.

Solicitors for the deputy-judge, Carter & Simpson.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } Divorce. } July 2, 1889.

WOOD v. WOOD AND WHITE. (a.)

Divorce — Question as to property — Procedure — Order to be made by court or judge—Inquiry before registrar — Report — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 17.

In a divorce suit a registrar has no jurisdiction to determine questions between husband and wife as to property under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Such questions must be determined by the court or a judge.

Where the registrar on summons made an order against the husband that he should deliver up certain articles, the court discharged that order and referred the question to the registrar for inquiry and report.

Motion to discharge a registrar's order made on the 13th of June, by which the husband, the petitioner in the suit, was ordered to deliver over to his wife, the respondent, or to her solicitor, certain articles which she claimed as her separate property. The husband alleged that the property was joint, as they were wedding presents.

The order was made on the hearing of a summons taken out by the respondent in the suit. The suit was by the husband for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery.

Deane, in support of the motion.—The registrar had no jurisdiction to make this order. It is only a judge or the court who can do so, and that power is given by section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

Middleton, for the respondent.

BUTT, J., held that the registrar had no power to make the order, which must, therefore, be discharged, and he directed the registrar to make an inquiry whose property the articles were, and to report to the court.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Lewis & Lewis.

Solicitors for the respondent, Chester & Co.

[See also Philips v. Philips, 37 W. R. 224, 13 P. D. 220.]

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). } Feb. 25, 26, 28; April 8, 1889.

COWPER ESSEX v. LOCAL BOARD FOR ACTON. (a.)

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 49, 63 — Compensation for "injuriously affecting" lands held therewith—Severance from other lands held therewith.

Where land is compulsorily taken under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the owner is entitled to compensation for depreciation of the value of his other lands, though such depreciation is due to the anticipated legal use of works to be constructed upon the land taken.

When the unity of ownership of parcels of land conduces to the advantage of the property as one holding, they are held together within the meaning of section 49 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and actual contact is not essential.

Reg. v. Chester Clerk of Peace (Stockport case), 12 W. R. 762, approved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (34 W. R. 587, 17 Q. B. D. 447) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported as Reg. v. Essex, 34 W. R. 587, 17 Q. B. D. 447.

The facts are set out in the report below, and are also summarized in the judgments of Lords Watson and Macnaghten.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C. (C. H. Anderson, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—The existence of these sewage works would depreciate the value of the land not taken, so as to be matter for compensation: Reg. v. Chester Clerk of Peace (Stockport case), 12 W. R. 762; Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ogilvy, 2 Macqueen, 229; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Walker's Trustees, 30 W. R. 569, 7 App. Cas. 259; City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Hunter, L. R. 2 H. L. (Sc.) 78; Reg. v. Sheward, 28 W. R. 506, 9 Q. B. D. 741. As to what constitutes severance see Holt v. Gas Light and Coke Co., L. R. 7 Q. B. 728, 735, 21 W. R. Dig. 126.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and E. H. Pollard, for the respondents.—This is not a matter for compensation. In re Penny and South-Eastern Railway Co., 5 W. R. 612, 7 E. & B. 660, 671; Hammersmith and City Railway Co. v. Brand, 18 W. R. 12, L. R. 4 H. L. 171; Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330; Rex v. Pease, 4 B. & Ad. 30; Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 8 W. R. 549, 5 H. & N. 679, were referred to.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

April 8, 1889.—HALSBURY, C.—For some time I was doubtful whether the question mainly argued in this case properly arose, since the direction of the under-sheriff, if I were to suppose it had been acted upon by the jury, would have raised another, and, to my mind, more serious, question than that upon which the respondents in this appeal insist.

I should hesitate very much to affirm the proposition that a belief in imaginary injury, though in fact an existing belief, and in fact affecting the marketable value of property, furnished any ground either for damages in an action, or for compensation under the Land Clauses Act.

The under-sheriff appears to have assumed that no possible injury, in the true sense of that word, could arise from the establishment of these sewage works, but that a compensation jury might award a sum of money if they came to the conclusion that a belief, however unfounded, that the sewage works would inflict injury upon the neighbourhood were established to have affected the marketable value of the land in the immediate vicinity of such sewage works. I should hesitate very much to acquiesce in such a view. But we are here discussing a question raised by the issue of a writ of certiorari, which writ, as it is expressly taken away by statute, can only issue where the jurisdiction has been exceeded, and if the jury had before it materials upon which it was entitled to award anything in respect of the injury actually likely to result from the establishment of the sewage works, then, as your lordships have nothing to do with the amount, you cannot say that the jurisdiction was gone because the jury may have awarded too much, nor because the under-sheriff overstated or understated the result of the evidence given.

Now, upon full consideration, I think there was evidence justifying the jury in awarding something. The account of the proceedings before the under-sheriff, imperfect and fragmentary as it is, nevertheless discloses this: that part of the argument directed to show that no injury would result, rested upon the proposition that if the works were not carefully and properly conducted they could be restrained by injunction as often as any annoyance arose to the neighbourhood from the improper mode of conducting them.

Now, I think that the liability of a neighbourhood to such even occasional and exceptional annoyances is a real injury to property, and not fanciful or imaginary.

It is doubtless attributed to Lord Hardwicke that he once said "the fears of mankind could not create a nuisance." But if Lord Hardwicke ever really did say so it is quite clear that that is not now the law, if the fears are assumed to be reasonable. The existence of a large collection of explosive matter in the vicinity of a town has been held to be a nuisance: see Reg. v. Lister, Dears & B. C. C. 209.

The good sense of mankind recognizes the fact that occasional negligence is one of the ordinary incidents of human life, and the common law, which embodies the common sense of the nation, proceeds upon common-sense assumptions. I do not think it is any answer to tell people who complain of the establishment of sewage works in their neighbourhood that if and when the sewage works become a nuisance, in the real and proper sense of that word, such works can be restrained by injunction. Land is certainly more marketable when it is free from works of that character than when such works are established, although the neighbours may have the ordinary right of citizens to engage in litigation against such works when they become a nuisance. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that it was open to the jury to find that the appellant's land not taken by the local board would be injuriously affected by the construction and use of the sewage works.

With reference to the main question I have had less difficulty, since I take it that two propositions have now been conclusively established. One is—that land taken under the powers of the Lands Clauses Act, and applied to any use authorized by the statute cannot, by its mere use, as distinguished from the construction of works upon it, give rise to a claim for compensation. But a second proposition is, it appears to me, not less conclusively established, and that is, that where part of a proprietor's land is taken from him, and the future use of the part so taken may damage the remainder of the proprietor's land, then such damage may be an injurious affecting of the proprietor's other lands, though it would not be an injurious affecting of the land of neighbouring proprietors from whom nothing had been taken for the purpose of the intended works.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It may seem at first sight a little strange that what is injurious affecting in one case should not be in the other. But it is possible to explain that apparent contradiction by the consideration that the injurious affecting by the use as distinguished from the construction is a particular injury, suffered by the proprietor from whom some portion of his land is taken, different in kind from that which is suffered by the rest of her Majesty's subjects.

It is, however, unnecessary to consider the question as if it were res integra, since I think that Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works has established the proposition in such a way as to be binding upon your lordships. I think it is impossible to explain away that case when the question expressly raised was whether the umpire had awarded damages in respect of the future use of the embankment as distinguished from its construction, and when it was admitted that he had awarded damages in respect of the use of the intended road, and your lordships affirmed the right to make such an award.

As I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, it proceeds upon the ground that, assuming injury, in fact, by the use of the sewage works and acquiescing in the decision in the Stockport case, it, nevertheless, comes to the conclusion that the lands injuriously affected were not "other" lands of the proprietor within the meaning of the statute, because, in the view their lordships entertained, some portion, at all events, of the land injuriously affected had been already severed by a railway.

I am unable to concur in the construction of the statute which that argument assumes. A person lays out a building estate in which unity of design, correspondence of the lines of building, adaptation of roads, open spaces, and the like, all have, or may have, relation to each other. Take the most familiar example: Suppose, in the proprietor's building plan, the roads were intended to take a particular direction, and, by the withdrawal of one piece of land, the whole arrangements of the intended building scheme should be dislocated, would it, in reason and common sense, be any answer to a claim for compensation to say the piece of land taken is at a distance from and even severed by some other construction from the place where you are going to conduct your roads? Many other examples might be given: arrangements for sewers, gas, water, and the like relate to the unity of the estate as one thing, the usefulness and market value of which might be interfered with by the withdrawal of part, and it is in each case a question of fact, dependent upon its own circumstances, whether what I have called the unity of the estate is interfered with. In this case I think it was properly for the jury, and has been lawfully adjudicated upon by them.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court restored; that the respondents should pay to the appellants the costs of this appeal and in the court below, and I move your lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant is owner of certain lands at Acton, two parcels of which have been let on long building leases, containing usual covenants prohibiting the erection or alteration of buildings without his consent. In 1866 the respondents, under a provisional order which incorporated the powers of the Land Clauses Acts, gave notice to take about five acres of the lands so demised for the purpose of constructing thereon works for the collection and deodorisation of sewage. Compensation was assessed by a jury, who allowed the appellant £8,737 for the purchase of his interest in the land taken, and also £4,000 for all damage sustained or to be sustained by reason of the injuriously affecting his other lands by the exercise of the respondents' statutory powers.

It was admitted on both sides of the bar that the sum of £4,000 was awarded in respect of damage to the appellant's remaining lands other than those let on building leases. The prospective damage, which the jury took into account in fixing that sum, can only be ascertained from the evidence submitted to them and the directions given them by the under-sheriff in his charge. The inference which I derive from these sources is, that the jury, in estimating compensation for injuriously affecting, were mainly influenced by the consideration that sewage works of the character contemplated by the respondents, though capable of being conducted, and usually conducted, so as not to create any actionable nuisance, are nevertheless, even when so conducted, distasteful to householders, and tend to depreciate the market value of building land in their vicinity; and also that negligence in the conduct of the works may occasionally give rise to actionable nuisance. It therefore appears that a considerable part of the compensation awarded in one lump sum by the second finding of the jury covers damage to arise from the future use of the works for statutory purposes.

The respondents are seeking in this suit to quash the verdict in so far as relates to the second finding; and, in the argument addressed to your lordships, they maintained that the jury exceeded their statutory jurisdiction, inasmuch as (1) they took into account damage to arise, not only from the construction of the sewage works, but from their authorized use after completion; (2) the prospective damage, for which they made an allowance, was too sentimental and remote to form the subject of statutory compensation; and (3) the lands in respect of which they gave compensation were not "other lands," or lands held "with" those taken, in the sense of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

In the case of a proprietor from whom nothing has been taken by the promoters, it has been settled by a series of decisions in this House that, although his land in the vicinity will necessarily be injured by the use of their works, yet it is not thereby "injuriously affected" within the meaning of the Act of 1845; and that he is not entitled to statutory compensation for injury so occasioned. The respondents argued that, upon a sound construction of the Act, the same rule ought to apply in cases where the promoters have acquired part of the claimant's lands for the purposes of their undertaking. I should have regarded the question thus raised as one of great nicety and difficulty if I had not been of opinion that it has been already determined in Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works. The arbiter in that case allowed a large sum by way of compensation for depreciation in the value of the claimant's mansion which he expected to result from the use for traffic, with its attendant dust and noise, of an embankment and roadway formed upon land taken from the claimant; and his award was sustained by Lords Chelmsford, Colonsay, Westbury, and Cairns. Although the noble and learned lords agreed in result, they did not arrive at that result upon the same general construction of the provisions of the Act with respect to compensation. Lords Chelmsford and Colonsay constituted the majority in Brand v. Hammersmith and City Railway Co.; but Lord Cairns, who constituted the minority, following the opinion which had been expressed by Lord Westbury in previous cases, disapproved of the limited meaning which the House in that case attached to the words, "injuriously affected by the execution of the works."

In Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works Lord Chelmsford, in whose judgment Lord Colonsay concurred, said, with reference to Brand's case and the subsequent case of City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Hunter:—"In neither of these cases was any land taken by the railway company connected with the lands which were alleged to have been so injured, and the claim for compensation was for damage caused by the use, and not by the construction, of the railway. But if, in each of the cases, lands of the parties had been taken for the railway, I do not see why a claim for compensation in respect of injury to adjoining premises might not have been successfully made on account of their probable depreciation by reason of vibration, or smoke, or noise occasioned by passing trains. I do not think that either Lord Westbury or Lord Cairns appreciated the distinction thus taken. These learned lords were prepared to hold that injury arising from the "execution of the works" included in all cases, not only injury occasioned by their structural form, but injury to arise from their subsequent use. That difference of opinion is, for the purposes of the present case, immaterial; the fact remains, that noble and learned lords, entertaining different views with respect to the construction of the statute, concurred in upholding the landowner's right to compensation, not merely in respect of the construction of works upon land taken from him, but of the subsequent use of these works authorized by statute."

In Caledonian Railway Co. v. Ogilvy, and also in City of Glasgow Union Railway Co. v. Hunter, land had been taken from the claimants for railway purposes, but the use complained of as injurious was not of that part of the railway constructed on the land so taken, and it was held in both cases to afford no ground for statutory compensation. It appears to me to be the result of these authorities, which are binding upon this House, that a proprietor is entitled to compensation for depreciation of the value of his other lands, in so far as such depreciation is due to the anticipated legal use of works to be constructed upon the land which has been taken from him under compulsory powers. The construction of the Act which has been thus adopted by the House had previously been enforced by Crompton, J., in the Stockport case.

I can discover no substantial distinction between the circumstances of this case and the facts which were before the House in Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works. The prospective use, in respect of which compensation has been given, is confined to that portion of the appellant's land which the respondents have acquired from him for statutory purposes; and the kind of depreciation which the jury had in view appears to me to be ejusdem generis with that arising from traffic upon a public thoroughfare. Neither the use of sewage works nor such traffic amounts in itself to a legal nuisance; but the existence of either may alter the character of land in the neighbourhood, and diminish its value in the market. When the erection of sewage works at once diminishes the value of the claimant's other lands to the extent of several thousand pounds sterling, I think he suffers substantial and not imaginary injury, although the depreciation may be due, in a great measure, to an unreasonable antipathy to such works, on the part of the purchasing or leasing public. These considerations appear to me to dispose of the arguments of the respondents, with the exception of that which relates to the position of the lands for which compensation has been awarded.

The "other lands" in respect of which an owner, who is selling to promoters, can claim compensation if they are injuriously affected, are indifferently described, in the Act of 1845, as "severed" from the land which is the subject of sale, or as held therewith. I cannot assent to the argument that there can be no severance within the meaning of the Act unless the part taken and the parts left were in actual contiguity. I think the expression "the severing," as it occurs in sections 49 and 63, read in the light of the context, merely signifies that what the promoters have acquired is separated from, in the sense that it can no longer be treated by the landowner as part of, the subjects which, until its purchase, he held along with it. What lands are to be regarded as "severed" from those taken is, in my opinion, a question which must depend upon the circumstances of each case. The fact that lands are held under the same title is not enough to establish that they are held "with" each other in the sense of the Act; and the fact that a line of railway runs through them is, in my opinion, as little conclusive that they are not. I shall not attempt to lay down any general rule upon this matter. But I am prepared to hold that, where several pieces of land, owned by the same person, are so near to each other, and so situated that the possession and control of each gives an enhanced value to all of them, they are lands held together within the meaning of the Act; so that if one piece is compulsorily taken, and converted to uses which depreciate the value of the rest, the owner has a right to compensation.

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, I see no reason to doubt that the lands in respect of which compensation has been awarded by the second finding of the jury were "held with" the five acres taken by the respondents. Their purchase has deprived the appellants of their power to regulate the class of buildings to be erected on these five acres, and has enabled the respondents to construct works the use of which, the jury have found, will sensibly diminish the value of the lands on the other side of the Hammersmith Branch Railway. It is quite conceivable that railway works may be of such a character that the value of land on one side of them will cease to have any dependence upon the use made of land on the other side. But that is not the case here.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Bramwell.—I think it convenient to consider, first, whether the land injuriously affected, or which will be injuriously affected, by the works of the respondents on the lands taken is land held with the land taken within the meaning of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 63. I think it is. I shall not attempt an exhaustive definition of those words; I should probably fail; I should leave out something that ought to be included, and include something that ought to be left out, and so give rise to future controversies. The words are not words of art. They are ordinary language, and must be understood with reference to their object. I think the present case is within them. The lands have one owner. I cannot think it matters that they are separated by a railway; I suppose it would hardly be said that one part of a park separated from another part by a railway was not land held with that other part. Here the lands are close; what is done on one part must or might affect what would be done on the other. For example, what I mean is this, Houses of a particular class or character built on one part would influence the class or character of what would or might be built on the other. The class of occupants of one part would in like way influence the character of that on the other. On these considerations I am of opinion that the land in respect of which the claim is made here was land held with the piece taken.

Then as to the next question. We cannot go into the question of quantum. If there was any damage which the jury could give, their verdict must stand. Now it is proved, admitted, and is common knowledge that the sewage works on the land taken will be a nuisance to the lands left; not a sentimental nuisance, but a substantial diminution of the comfort and a danger to the health of persons dwelling in houses on the land not taken. Whether if it was of a sentimental character only, as, for example, if the land was taken for a cemetery or a prison, and it was proved that the value of the other land was thereby diminished, the amount of the diminished value could be recovered, I do not say, either one way or the other. But in this case there is a substantial damage, a lessening of the health and comfort, or will be, to the land left by the taking of the piece, and the exercise of the powers of the Act; and it is admitted that the law is that no action would lie to recover any such damage. Then the case seems within the very words of section 48, and why is it not?

The argument of the Attorney-General, as I understand it, is this: But for the ownership of the piece, the appellant could not, by action or otherwise, recover compensation for damage to this land; if so, there is no reason why he should, because he is owner of the piece. Nay, the Legislature has designedly left persons without compensation by action or otherwise, who are damaged, but none of whose land is taken; therefore, it must be assumed that it meant to leave such cases as the appellant's without compensation, and that the injurious affecting in section 48 means an injurious affecting for which an action would lie if the nuisance was not caused in the exercise of statutory powers, in substitution for which action, compensation is given. He would read, therefore, into section 48 these words, "and for which, but for these powers hereby given, an action would lie." I see no reason for this; I think that the words of a statute never should in interpretation be added to or subtracted from without almost a necessity. The Legislature could have added these words if it had thought fit. But, further, it seems to me most reasonable that the owner of property should not be made to sell for its mere value a piece of his land the possession of which, and the use to be made of it, will do to the rest of his land damage to ten times the value of that taken. It seems to me that, according to the reasoning of Sir James Hannen, a man ought to be paid a sum which he may reasonably ask, and that a man may reasonably ask the value of what is taken, and a compensation for the damage that will be done on it to what is left. Take the case I put of two houses, each worth £50 a year, but the land on which they stand could be made worth £200 a year by their being pulled down and one house built on their sites. Would it not be contrary to all fairness and justice, would it not be robbery and plunder, if one house was taken rendering improvement of the other impossible, to make the owner take compensation for the loss of £50 a year only. I am unable to agree that the Legislature meant that persons injured where lands were not taken should have no compensation. It has been so held I know, and by this House, and that decision is binding when the case arises, but, for my own part, I cannot construe the statute by the help of what I must think a wrong decision.

Now I do not wish it to be supposed that I have a sort of spite against Rex v. Pease, and that it is a pet point of mine that it was wrong, but, in support of my present opinion, and with reference to the argument of the Attorney-General, I must make a few remarks upon it. It is very clear how the provisions in the local Act which the court had to consider in Rex v. Pease came there. By the original Act, 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 44, local and personal, "for making and maintaining a railway or tramway," &c., the company constituted had, by section 1, power "to make, complete, and maintain a railway." They had no power to act as carriers thereon. Their so doing would have been ultrâ vires. By section 81 "all persons shall have free liberty to use the railway with horses, cattle, and carriages, for the purpose of conveying goods, &c., and to pass with carts, wagons, or other carriages properly constructed." By the subsequent Act, which was before the court in Rex v. Pease, it was enacted that "it shall be lawful for the company or any person authorized or permitted by them to make and erect such and so many locomotive or movable engines, and use and employ the same for the purpose of facilitating the transport of goods," &c. This provision was necessary to enable the company to act as hauliers, and the provisions as to other persons were necessary to give them powers and rights as against the company.

If these provisions gave a right to commit a public nuisance or private injury, I feel sure they were not intended to do so. But, anyhow, this reasoning, even if it justifies a public mischief for the public good, does not justify a private loss and damage. But, of course, the statute on which the cases of Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co. and Brand v. Hammersmith Railway Co. depended, is 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. Did that authorize the commission of a nuisance public or private? I will not repeat the arguments I have already used in Brand v. Hammersmith Railway Co., by all of which I abide, but there are one or two additional remarks I wish to make. In section 86, which authorizes railway companies to act as carriers, the words are: "It shall be lawful for the company to use and employ locomotive engines, or other moving power, and carriages and wagons to be drawn or propelled thereby, and to carry and convey all such passengers and goods," &c. By section 87, "It shall be lawful for the company to enter into any contract with any other company, being owners, &c., of any other railway, for the passage over the railway of any engines, coaches, wagons, or other carriages." But by section 92 it is: "Upon payment of the tolls, &c., all companies and persons shall be entitled to use the railway with engines and carriages." Observe the difference. It is "lawful" for the railway company to use engines, but other companies are "entitled." The words as to the incorporated company are permissive and enabling, "it shall be lawful." As to other companies a right is given, "they are entitled." It is a noticeable thing that, according to the construction put upon this Act, the Festiniog Railway Co. would be liable for damage done on its own line by engines to neighbouring property, but directly it gets on a line to which the railway clauses apply, it would not be liable.

But, supposing Rex v. Pease, and Vaughan v. The Taf Railway Co. to be rightly decided, I should draw, not the conclusion that the Attorney-General wishes us to draw, but this: that while the Legislature thought that persons whose lands were injured by the operations on other lands of the same ownership which were taken, should have compensation, that right should not be extended to other cases, as that would give opportunity for vague and unfounded claims.

Now a word as to the authorities. The Stockport case is, I think, in point. I hope and think I meant no more than I said about it—viz., that I should like to think the matter over before I agreed to it. I have thought it over, over and over again, and do agree to it. I think also that the Duke of Buccleuch's case is in point. It is indeed strange that in that case no reference is made to the Stockport case, but I think that the principle is the same. As to Brand v. The Hammersmith Railway Co., I own I think it was rightly decided in this House. I said that I thought Rex v. Pease and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co. wrong; that the right of action was not taken away, nor compensation given. I added that if the House agreed with those cases I thought they should affirm the judgment, on the footing that if no action lay there must be a right to compensation, and that as the erection of the railway must be followed by its use, therefore the erection of the works injuriously affected the plaintiffs. The fallacy of the argument is in the last sentence. I am afraid I was influenced by the feeling of the gross injustice and hardship of the case. I think the judgment in this case should be reversed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—The decision of the Court of Appeal reversing the previous decision of the Divisional Court rested entirely on the ground that the lands alleged to be "injuriously affected" had been on some prior occasion severed from the lands taken by the local board by the construction of a railway, and could not therefore be deemed to be "lands held therewith" within the meaning of the 49th section of the Act or "other lands of such owner" within the 63rd section. That question has been satisfactorily disposed of in the several judgments which have been delivered, in which I concur, and can add nothing with advantage. The decision of the Court of Appeal cannot, therefore, be sustained. But for the supposed distinction in fact between the present case and the Stockport case the decision of the Court of Appeal must have been in affirmance of the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division.

The notice to treat coming from the Local Board of Acton claimed a right to take the plot of 5a. 1r. 35p. "for the purpose of providing for the sewerage and the disposal of, and utilization of, the sewage of the district of the local board and the necessary works connected therewith." There can be no doubt on the evidence that the immediate consequence was that the adjoining land of the appellant, which had been laid out for building purposes, and was separated from the land taken by the local board only by the permanent way of the railway, became at once actually "injuriously affected." The injury was no sentimental grievance, but a solid depreciation in the letting value, taking effect not remotely, but immediately. Mr. Baker says, "The mere fact of sewage works coming on that land coloured pink (the land taken) will depreciate the land coloured green 25 per cent. I may say I have had experience which confirms that." There was abundance of other evidence to the same effect. I am not surprised at it. It would only be by a material reduction in letting value of the land that parties might be tempted to build dwelling-houses in the immediate vicinity of a farm for the reception, disposal, and utilization of sewage with its real or supposed tendency to create and foster organisms injurious to human health and life.

There being no doubt that the appellant's building land was thus in fact injuriously affected, the question of law is whether the sheriff's tribunal had jurisdiction under the statute (sections 49 and 63) to assess compensation for the appellant in respect of his lands being thus injuriously affected.

It cannot be doubted that the Stockport case is in point on this question of jurisdiction. It was vigorously assailed in the Court of Appeal, and one of the Lords Justices suggested that the rule laid down in that case ought to be considered by the House of Lords with a view to its being probably overruled. That case has been the subject of much adverse criticism, but it has not been overruled, and up to the present moment the rule laid down by it has regulated right and liability in similar cases. It is said to have been adopted in principle in the Buccleuch case, and if that is so your lordships should follow the latter case I confess that I have some difficulty in adopting that view of the Buccleuch case, and prefer considering the Stockport case on its own legal merits.

I feel bound to say that had I been a colleague of Crompton, J., at the time I should probably have come to the conclusion that his interpretation of the statute was correct and in accordance with its language; and now, looking back at that decision through the quarter of a century that has since elapsed, and aided by the light of additional experience, I think that it was a sound decision, and certainly not now to be disturbed.

The anomalies or inequalities that have been pointed out arise from the statute, and not from the Stockport case, which follows its very language.

I concur in opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of the Divisional Court restored, with all the consequences.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—For the purpose of providing for the sewerage and the disposal and utilization of the sewage of the district of Acton, and the necessary works connected therewith, the Acton Local Board was authorized to put in force the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to certain lands containing 5a. 1r. 35p., of which the appellant was owner within the meaning of the Act.

The appellant had other lands at Acton adjoining the lands required by the local board. His property there was at the time in course of development as a building estate. Part, including the lands required, was let on building leases for a long term of years; part was let on shorter terms for brickmaking purposes; part was in hand. The property was cut in two by a railway running through it. There was apparently a communication of some sort between the lands thus severed. But there is nothing to be found in the evidence on the appeal to explain the nature of the communication or the configuration of the land bordering on the railway. A notice to treat, stating the purpose for which the lands were required, was served upon the appellant. No agreement was come to, and the question of disputed compensation was submitted to a jury.

The jury assessed the value of the lands taken at £8,737. As to that part of their finding there is no dispute. But they also awarded £4,000 by way of compensation for damage to the appellant's other lands by the exercise of the statutory powers which the local board was putting in force.

A portion of the land in respect of which compensation was awarded was situated on the same side of the railway as the lands taken, but separated from those lands by a piece of ground which was included in a building lease and in respect of which no compensation was claimed. The rest of the lands in respect of which compensation was awarded was on the other side of the railway; part was in hand, part was let for a short term of years.

The first objection to the verdict is that the lands in respect of which compensation was awarded were not lands that could be "injuriously affected" within the meaning of the Act, because they had been already severed from the lands required, and were not held therewith for one and the same purpose. It is difficult to see the force of this objection. Lands in respect of which a claim for compensation may arise are referred to in the Act, in contradistinction to the lands taken or purchased from the owner thereof, as lands "held therewith" or as "the other lands" of such owner. The Act says nothing about their being held along with the lands taken or purchased for one and the same purpose, nor does it require that they should be in contact with those lands. Apparently it is enough if both parcels of land are held by one and the same owner, and if the unity of ownership may conduce to the advantage or protection of the property as one holding. That condition seems to be implied. Otherwise the owner could hardly sustain injury by reason of the execution of the works on the lands taken.

If this view be correct, the severance created by the railway was not of itself a bar to the claim for compensation. It was a matter to be taken into consideration. But its effect must depend upon the circumstances of the case, including in those circumstances the configuration of the ground and the difficulty or facility of making communications across the railway. In an ordinary case severance by a railway is not a complete separation dividing the property into two distinct and independent holdings. And owners of lands affected by a railway are authorized, if they consider the accommodation works made by the railway company insufficient for the commodious use of their land, at any time to make such further works for the purpose as they think necessary, subject, of course, to the conditions prescribed by the Legislature.

The other objection is one of general importance. It was argued that the compensation awarded was given in respect of injury anticipated from the use of the works when executed, and not in respect of injury caused by the construction or execution of the works; and it was said that the jury were not at liberty to take into consideration the purpose or probable effect of the works which the local board was authorized to construct.

Speaking for myself, I am not altogether satisfied that the decision of this House in the Duke of Buccleuch's case can be treated as determining the question. Upon that point I am rather disposed to agree in the view expressed by Lord Blackburn in a subsequent case. But all the arguments on both sides were so thoroughly discussed in the Duke of Buccleuch's case in its different stages that it would, I think, be idle for me to do more than state generally the conclusion at which I have arrived.

I think it is impossible to read the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act without seeing that it was the intention of the Legislature that full compensation should be given in all cases where lands are taken under the powers of the Act for the purposes of a public undertaking. To give one instance of the extreme care shown in providing compensation, I may remind your lordships that, if the lands required are subject to a mortgage for a fixed period, the mortgagee is entitled to the costs of reinvestment in addition to the sum to be paid to him in respect of his mortgage; if the rate of interest secured by the mortgage be higher than can reasonably be expected on reinvestment, he is also entitled to compensation for the loss to be sustained by him by reason of his mortgage money being prematurely paid off. Suppose land let to a builder for the erection of first-class houses, and a mortgage by the lessee for a fixed period; and then suppose that part of the land is required for the purpose of some public undertaking likely to spoil the character of the neighbourhood, the mortgagee would be compensated to the utmost farthing; but if the respondents are right the lessee would be left without compensation. His scheme might be destroyed, his houses might be unsaleable, and he might be ruined, though the Act declares in so many words that he "shall be entitled to recover from the promoters of the undertaking compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by reason of the severance of the lands required from those not required, or otherwise by reason of the execution of the works."

It may be said that an adjoining lessee or owner from whom no land is taken might suffer in the same way, and that he would be without redress. That is true. But I cannot see why a person whose case is within the spirit and within the very letter of the Act should be deprived of the full measure of compensation because his neighbour, who is not within the Act at all, is perhaps hardly dealt with.

Where land is required for public purposes the injury, if any, to the owner's adjoining lands depends mainly on the character of the undertaking. There are various purposes for which local boards may be authorized to take lands. They may take lands for pleasure grounds. They may take lands for sewage purposes. But before putting in force any of the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act a local board is bound to publish the nature of the proposed undertaking, to define the lands required, and to collect, as far as possible, the views of all persons interested in these lands. Then comes a public inquiry, to be followed in due course by a provisional order, and an Act confirming it. These elaborate provisions, designed apparently for the protection of private as well as public interests, would be something of a mockery if a person from whom land is taken is to be told, when he asks for compensation, that at that stage of the proceedings it is all one whether his land be required for a public garden or for a sewage farm.

It was said that the objection to a sewage farm comes from an unfounded apprehension of possible mischief. Does that matter? Call it what you will—ignorance, or prejudice, or fancy—the loss to the owner who may want to sell is not the less real; the result to him is not the less practical. In such a case apprehension of mischief is damage of itself. And the depreciation in value must be the measure of compensation.

The promoters of an undertaking can only take lands for the purposes authorized by their Act. When the lands are taken the promoters can only use them for those purposes. It is the purpose of the undertaking, and that alone, which justifies its existence. Without the purposes defined and authorized by the special Act the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act are a dead letter. And yet it is said that on a question of disputed compensation the arbitrators or the jury, as the case may be, are to shut their eyes to the purpose of the undertaking, and to make believe that the intended works are some innocent and meaningless folly.

I do not think that there is anything in the Act which leads to a conclusion so absurd and so contrary to common sense. When lands are required for the purpose of a public undertaking, and the owner claims compensation for injury to lands held therewith, I think the tribunal which assesses compensation is bound to take into consideration the purpose of the undertaking, the consequences to the other lands of the owner likely to result from the execution of the works on the lands required, and any alteration in the character of his property which those works are calculated to bring about.

The Stockport case is precisely in point. It has been much criticized; but I think it has stood the test of criticism. In practice I believe it has always been followed, and I think it is perfectly right.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Order appealed from reversed; judgment of the Divisional Court restored; respondents to pay to the appellant his costs both in this House and below.

Solicitors for the appellant, Hedges & Brandreth.

Solicitor for the respondents, Alexander Helmsley.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. Dec. 12—14, 17.

Reg. v. Bishop of London. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Representation to bishop of illegal church decoration—Discretion of bishop to stop further proceedings—Grounds for application for a mandamus to bishop—Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), ss. 8, 9.

Under the 9th section of the Public Worship Act, 1874, a representation was made by qualified persons to the bishop of a diocese to the effect that certain sculptured figures in a reredos erected in the cathedral church of the diocese tended to encourage superstitious ideas and unauthorised devotions. The bishop declined to forward the representation to the ecclesiastical court, on the ground that, having considered all the circumstances of the case, he had come to the opinion that the main question of principle at issue had been already decided in a former case, and that, the difference of detail in the present reredos from that complained of in the former case being of so little importance in principle, further litigation would be mischievous.

(a.) Reported by Spencer L. Holland, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the bishop, having declared that he had considered all the circumstances of the case, and not having been shown to have declined to consider any circumstance of the case brought before him, nor to have considered and acted upon any circumstance outside the case before him, had acted within his jurisdiction; that this jurisdiction gave him a discretionary power to stay the proceedings; and that the court had no power to review his reasons for the exercise of such discretion, provided he had acted within his jurisdiction.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Manisty, J., dissentiente Pollock, B.) making absolute a rule for a mandamus.

A rule had been obtained, on behalf of four inhabitants of the diocese of London, calling upon the Bishop of London to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue ordering him to transmit a copy of the representation of the applicants, dated May 4, 1888, to the persons complained of—namely, the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, in the City of London, and to proceed therein in accordance with the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85).

The applicants, being all persons qualified to do so under the provisions of section 8 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, on the 4th of May, 1888, duly made a representation in writing to the bishop, stating: "(1) That the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, in the City of London, within five years before the date thereof—that is to say, in the month of January, 1888—have introduced into the said cathedral church and set up upon the altar-piece or reredos therein an image or sculptured subject representing our Lord upon the Cross, in a conspicuous position immediately above the communion-table, the figure of our Lord being of the height of five feet, or thereabouts;" "(2) that the said image or sculptured subject is so constructed as to have the appearance of such an altar crucifix as was used in the Church of England immediately before the Reformation, and so as to answer the purpose for which such a crucifix was intended;" "(3) that the said dean and chapter, within five years before the date thereof—that is to say, in the month of January, 1888—have introduced into the said cathedral church, and set up upon the altar-piece or reredos therein an image or sculptured subject representing the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the Child in her arms, in a conspicuous position a few feet above the first herein-mentioned image or sculptured subject, the figure of the Blessed Virgin being of the height of 5 ft. 3 in., or thereabouts;" "(4) that each of the said images or sculptured subjects tends to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorized and superstitious kind, and is unlawful;" "(5) that the said images or sculptured subjects are respectively additions to the fabric, ornaments, or furniture of the said cathedral church, and are decorations forbidden by law."

On the 23rd of May, 1888, the bishop, in pursuance of section 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, delivered his reply to the representation of the applicants in the following terms:—"We, Frederick, by the Divine permission Bishop of London, having, in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act, considered the whole circumstances attending the above representation, are of opinion that proceedings should not be taken thereon for the following reasons:—

"The proposed proceedings have for their object the determination of the question whether a reredos showing our Lord upon the Cross in a conspicuous position immediately above the communion-table, and also the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the Child in her arms, in a conspicuous position a few feet above, has any tendency to idolatry, and whether its erection is permitted by law.

"The main question of principle here at issue has been already decided in the Exeter case (Phillpotts v. Boyd). In that case the reredos showed a figure of our Lord in the act of ascending into heaven in a conspicuous position immediately above the communion-table, and this reredos was held to be lawfully erected."

"The sole object of the proceedings now proposed is merely to determine whether there may be exceptions to the principles laid down in the Exeter case, and whether the reredos erected in St. Paul's is such an exception. It appears to me impossible to say that the difference between the two erections is of very grave importance, or that one offers serious temptations to idolatry and the other does not."

"Litigation in these matters is sometimes necessary in order to settle disputed points of grave importance. But even in such cases litigation is a necessary evil. It keeps up irritation and party strife; it embitters men's feelings; it inflicts much mischief on the Church and on true religion; and it is only tolerable as a preventive of worse mischief that would otherwise follow."

"It is always possible after any great question of principle has been decided to keep up litigation indefinitely by raising minor points, and such litigation becomes more mischievous the longer it is continued, while the results obtained from it are of exceeding little value."

"I am satisfied that in the present instance the proceedings could not end in any result which would make up to the Church and to the religious life of the country for the mischief which must inevitably be inflicted on them by the litigation itself."

The applicants thereupon obtained a rule for a mandamus, which was made absolute by a majority of the judges in the Divisional Court, calling upon the bishop to transmit the representation to the official principal of the Court of Arches; against this order the bishop now appealed.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Jeune, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the Bishop of London, and Jeune, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.—It is admitted that the bishop has been given a discretion to refuse to send on a representation made to him under section 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874. If that discretion has been exercised judicially and bonâ fide, there is no jurisdiction in the temporal courts to review that discretion. The same principle must be adopted as is applied to the review of the discretion given to any inferior court: Reg. v. Boteler, 12 W. R. 466, 4 B. & S. 959. The bishop has not to decide the legality or illegality of the acts complained of in the representation. His discretion is analogous to that now given to a judge to refuse leave for criminal proceedings against a newspaper for libel: Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 64), s. 8; or to justices in prosecutions for Sunday trading: 34 & 35 Vict. c. 87, s. 1. The bishop's discretion is exercised by "considering the whole circumstances of the case," "forming an opinion on such circumstances," and "stating his reasons in writing for such an opinion." If he has considered other circumstances not material to the case, or given his reasons as being based upon some such circumstance, he has not exercised his jurisdiction. The words "the whole circumstances of the case" give the bishop an absolute discretion of a pastoral as well as judicial kind (per Lord Thesiger, L.J., in Reg. v. Bishop of Oxford, 4 Q. B. D. 598, 599, 27 W. R. Dig. 181). The discretionary power given to the bishop under section 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, is not new. It has been held by the House of Lords to be absolute under the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86) in Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214. If the Legislature had intended to limit that power they would have done so in clear and unmistakeable language. That they did not intend to do so may be inferred from Lord Cairns' remarks reported in Hansard and cited by Baggallay, L.J., in Reg. v. Bishop of Oxford. Assuming a mistaken view of the law or even a mistake of fact by the bishop in his statement of reasons, that is no ground for a mandamus if the discretion has been properly exercised. The bishop here is not shown to have made either mistake. His view of the principle of the decision in the Exeter case, Phillpotts v. Boyd, 23 W. R. 491, L. R. 6 P. C. 435, is correct. The principle there laid down was that sculptured images, in such a position or grouping as not to show on the view any tendency to encourage idolatry, are legal. No evidence was offered here to show that idolatrous worship in fact had taken place. The applicants only allege that certain images in the reredos were, in their opinion, likely to encourage such worship. The bishop forms an opinion that they were not. The images form part of a set of representations of historical events in the life of Christ. The application of the principles laid down in Phillpotts v. Boyd is illustrated by the decisions in Clifton v. Ridsdale, 1 P. D. 316, 2 P. D. 276, where the image, by its position and surroundings, was held, on the view and in fact, to encourage idolatrous worship, and in Hughes v. Edwards (the Denbigh case), 2 P. D. 361, where a scene of the crucifixion in a reredos was held to be legal for the opposite reason. The decision in the Exeter case was a circumstance of the case properly to be considered by the bishop. His other reasons of the evil of litigation upon minor differences between the reredos in question and a similar reredos are all derived from the circumstance of the bearing of the principles of the Exeter case upon the present application. They are, therefore, circumstances of the case to be considered. The obligation to put the reasons in writing and to convey them to the parties was to insure that the bishop had properly exercised his discretion and had considered all the circumstances of the case, possibly, also, by way of guidance and regulation upon future similar applications.

Sir W. Phillimore watched the case on behalf of the Dean of St. Paul's.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the respondents.—The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, was a new departure in ecclesiastical procedure devised to give proper complainants the right to put the law in force against illegal actions on the part of the clergy. Originally no criminal procedure could be put in force by laymen. Under the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86) power was given to laymen to proceed subject to the bishop's consent; then came the present Act, giving this right to particularly defined and responsible parishioners. That right cannot be taken away by a proviso. The arguments in Julius v. Bishop of Oxford do not apply. Lord Cairns expressly showed how the discretion might be limited where precautions were taken to limit complainants to persons interested in the particular church and who would be made responsible for costs in lieu of the bishop. The discretion of a bishop under this Act is not absolute, but permissive if exercised as a judicial duty (per Lord Cairns, Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford; Sergent v. Dale, 2 Q. B. D., p. 566, per Lush, J.). That exercise of duty is limited (1) to the consideration of the whole circumstances of the case; (2) to an opinion formed upon the whole circumstances; (3) to a statement of his reasons for such opinion in writing. Unless the whole circumstances are considered he has not properly exercised his discretion. His opinion must be judged by the reasons given, and those reasons must amount to an extract of "the whole circumstances of the case." The words are a limitation not an extension of the discretion. The reasons must be legally admissible reasons, and those are, by the terms of section 9, reasons formed upon the whole circumstances of the case. Reasons of general expediency will not be admissible: Reg. v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 250, 1 Q. B. D. 201. A mistake in fact or misreading of the law, if given as a reason by the bishop, will show that he has not considered the real circumstances of the case, and, if so, he has not exercised his jurisdiction properly and a mandamus will lie. The bishop here has wrongly interpreted the principles laid down in the Exeter case. The court expressly state that the decision does not apply to the question of the legality of any images: Phillpotts v. Boyd. The question of idolatrous worship must be gone into upon each case. The complaint here is as to the tendency of this sculptured crucifixion to encourage illegal worship. The bishop has not dealt with that question at all, nor does the Exeter case apply to the question here raised. The only other reason given is a general objection to litigation on such subjects. That is an inadmissible reason. It is not a circumstance of the case. If a bishop has allowed circumstances to influence him other than those in the case, or shows such circumstances to have been the motive of his opinion by the reasons which he states, he has not properly considered the whole circumstances of the case. An excess of reasons is sufficient to vitiate his opinion, even if he has considered the whole circumstances. Hughes v. Edwards does not decide that a crucifixion as a sculptured group is legal. There was no evidence there of a tendency to encourage idolatrous worship: In re St. Lawrence, Pittington, 5 P. D. 131. The bishop declines to act unless the complaint is a "very grave" one, or the images have a "very serious" tendency to idolatrous worship. He has no jurisdiction to limit proceedings to such cases.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., in reply.—Lord Penzance, in Hughes v. Edwards, expressly applies the principles laid down in the Exeter case; therefore the bishop was right in considering their application to the present case. The extent of discretion is rightly laid down by Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Bishop of Oxford, in his express reference to the Public Worship Act, 1874.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—LORD ESHER, M.R.—We have in this case to deal with the action taken by the Bishop of London upon a representation forwarded to him by admittedly qualified persons in reference to certain sculptured images upon a reredos erected in St. Paul's Cathedral. The bishop, assuming that he had jurisdiction so to do under section 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, has stated his opinion in writing, as required, that the proceedings ought not to be taken. Upon that state of things a mandamus has been granted by a majority of the judges in the Divisional Court ordering the bishop to transmit the representation to the proper ecclesiastical tribunal. It is alleged by the promoters of these proceedings that the bishop has either exceeded the duty vested in him by the statute mentioned, or has not undertaken that duty—i.e., that he has either exceeded or declined his jurisdiction. In order to determine whether he has so exceeded or declined jurisdiction, it is necessary to consider what jurisdiction has been given him under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874. If so, we must construe that Act. The only part necessary to consider is section 9, and the question of the proper exercise of the jurisdiction mainly turns upon the words, "After considering the whole circumstances of the case." It is said for the bishop, that these words are enabling words extending the bishop's discretion to an extreme width so as to entitle him to something more than mere words giving him an ordinary judicial discretion. On the other side it is contended that they are words of limitation. It is not denied that he has at some point to exercise a discretion, but his power or duty is said to be limited to the fact of his having considered the whole circumstances of the case—i.e., each and every circumstance; and that, if he fails to consider each and every circumstance, or if he considers circumstances other than those of the case, his discretionary power does not come into play. In construing this section we must adopt the well-known rule laid down by Lord Selborne—namely, of construing the words in the ordinary and grammatical sense of the English language as applicable to the subject-matter dealt with. If they are capable of a double meaning, then the history of legislation on the subject may become material in order to interpret them; but I do not think that in this case any argument based on previous legislation is necessary to the construction of the section in question. The order of the words is unusual; the section commences with a negative proviso: "Unless the bishop shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken, . . . he shall," &c. The section would be more clear if the sentences were transposed to this effect: "Where a representation under section 8 has been made, the bishop shall transmit the same, &c., unless he shall be of opinion," &c.

Now, all that the bishop has to do is to form an opinion. He has not got to determine the legality of the subject-matter of dispute. It is not within his discretionary jurisdiction at all to determine whether certain things are, or are not, contrary to law. He has to form an opinion whether further proceedings shall or shall not be taken. That that is a matter for his discretion under the section cannot be, and is not, denied. The bishop is not a judge to determine the matter in dispute, but is to act as a high public authority intrusted with the duty of saying whether the matter is to be tried or not before the proper ecclesiastical tribunal. When, however, so called upon to act, his decision must be in the nature of a judicial decision—that is to say, he must decide fairly, to the best of his ability, and impartially between the parties. He has the same duty thrown upon him as that imposed upon anyone else in a judicial position. I do not doubt that a bishop has to act in a judicial manner, and to decide as if he were judicially deciding any matter. In that sense his discretion is a judicial discretion. What is it which gives him jurisdiction? It is really the delivery of the representation. Then his duty commences. We must consider what that duty is. It is said that his duty does not commence until he has done something beforehand, without which being done he has no jurisdiction to exercise his duty. That preliminary thing is said to be his "consideration of the whole circumstances of the case"—i.e., each and every such circumstance; and if he fails to consider some one such circumstance his discretionary jurisdiction is said not to arise. Suppose the words were not there, and that the sentence only ran, "Unless the bishop shall be of opinion," &c. That gives him a judicial discretion. How much might he take into consideration under those words? Lord Selborne and Lord Cairns consider that even then he would not be confined to considering whether there was a primâ facie case made out in the representation or not, or whether there was primâ facie evidence to support a case. His discretion is to determine whether proceedings ought to be taken or not. Other things than primâ facie evidence might be taken into account.

But it is argued that by the insertion of the words "after considering the whole circumstances of the case," the bishop is prevented from acting, unless every circumstance is shown by him to have been taken into consideration. I am of opinion that the words must be read in their simple and ordinary sense. They are not meant to indicate a condition precedent to his discretion, nor that he is bound to consider every circumstance. They enable the bishop to go to any limit, provided that limit is confined to the circumstance of the case. If he has honestly and fairly undertaken the consideration of the circumstances of the case, and has not wilfully refused to consider some circumstances brought to his notice, or if he has considered some circumstances of the case so far as he thought such material circumstances, but has not considered certain others, I am of opinion that he has not, on that ground, failed to do his duty under the statute nor declined jurisdiction. But what are we to say as to whether he has exceeded his duty? He would exceed his duty if he considered some circumstance not a circumstance of the case, and which could not be such, and has acted upon such circumstance. The mere fact of his having considered some such circumstance is not sufficient ground to show excess of jurisdiction; he must have acted upon that circumstance which is not a circumstance of the case. To determine, then, whether a bishop has declined jurisdiction, it must be shown that he either refused to consider the case or any one circumstance of it brought to his notice, or that he has plainly acted without reference to the circumstances of the case at all. To determine whether a bishop has exceeded his jurisdiction it must be shown that he not only considered, but acted upon that circumstance which was not a circumstance of the case. But if he has undertaken the consideration of the case and its circumstances, and has not refused unfairly to consider any particular circumstance of it, the mere fact of his being shown not to have considered one circumstance of the case is not sufficient ground for a mandamus. If, again, he has exercised his proper jurisdiction, and has not gone beyond it, whether he has acted rightly or wrongly is not a matter into which the temporal court can inquire. If he has a discretion at all, which it is admitted he has, then when the time for the exercise of that discretion has arisen, and as long as he has exercised it within his jurisdiction, the rightness or wrongness of this actual exercise of it cannot be questioned. The bishop is to come to an opinion, and to state his reasons for that opinion. If, acting within his jurisdiction, he has come to an opinion, the question whether that opinion is a right or wrong one is not a matter for a mandamus; and if the reasons given are capable of being considered reasons in the opinion of the court, then, however wrong the court might, in fact, hold those reasons to be, they have no authority to inquire into the rightness or wrongness of the reasons themselves. The question, then, for us is, Has the bishop honestly and bonâ fide considered the circumstances of this particular case? or, Has he exceeded his jurisdiction in considering a circumstance which is not a circumstance of the case, and acted upon that? My opinion is that he has properly considered the circumstances of the case, and this opinion is supported by authority, which, though not binding, is to be treated as authoritative. Cockburn, C.J., upon the first hearing of Reg. v. Bishop of Oxford, has laid down what is a proper exercise of discretion. It is true that the decision in that considerable importance, and, out of deference to those from whom I differ, I have thought it right to put my judgment into writing. The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, materially altered the law respecting the right to take legal proceedings in various ecclesiastical cases and respecting the mode of proceeding in such cases. Under the Church Discipline Act any person, male or female, whether a parishioner or not, and whether a member of the Church of England or not, could complain to the bishop of any clerk in holy orders. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act the persons complaining must be an archdeacon or a churchwarden of the parish or any three male persons of full age, parishioners of the parish referred to in the complaint, and they must be members of the Church of England. The Church Discipline Act contains no express provision applicable to cathedrals or collegiate churches, whereas the Public Worship Regulation Act does (section 8). The complainants in the case of a cathedral must be three male persons of full age, inhabitants of the diocese in which the cathedral is situate, and must be members of the Church of England (ib.). The Church Discipline Act merely declared that upon complaint being made to the bishop it should be lawful for him to issue a commission to inquire into the matter complained of (section 3), or to send the case to the court of appeal of the province (section 13). There was no provision requiring him in exercising this power to give any reasons for the course he might think fit to adopt, and it was held, first in R. v. Bishop of Chichester, 7 W. R. 659, 2 Ell. & Ell. 209, and later in the Bishop of Oxford's case, that the bishop had a complete discretion as to whether further proceedings should or should not be taken, and that his only legal duty (if any) in the matter was to hear and consider the application. (See per Lord Blackburn, 5 App. Cas., p. 240).

The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, is materially different, for by section 9, on the receipt by the bishop of a proper representation, it is his duty, within twenty-one days, to take certain steps to have the complaint investigated and determined, "unless he shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation." Moreover, if he should be of this opinion, he is to state in writing the reason for his opinion, and such statement is to be deposited in the diocesan registry and a copy of it is to be transmitted to the complainant and to the person complained of. The statute, therefore, plainly casts upon the bishop the responsibility of stopping further proceedings. He is not required to sanction them; for unless he is of opinion that they should be stopped he is bound by the statute to do what is necessary to have the complaint heard and determined in one or other of the modes prescribed by the statute.

In this state of the law three questions arise—viz., (1) What is the duty of the bishop as regards forming an opinion that proceedings should not be taken? (2) Has he in this case performed that duty? (3) What jurisdiction has the High Court over him in the matter? (1) With respect to his duty. His duty is to form an opinion. Formation of an opinion is very different from a mere exercise of will. It is clearly not competent for the bishop simply to stay further proceedings by an arbitrary exercise of his will. He must be of opinion that they ought to be stayed. To form an opinion it is obviously necessary that he must consider the case to which his attention is directed. There could be no doubt on this point even if the statute went no further; but the statute expressly requires him to consider "the whole circumstances of the case." These words are to my mind very important. They show that he is to consider more than what in legal language may be described as the issues raised by the complainants. "The whole circumstances of the case" embrace more than the matters directly in controversy. The expression includes circumstances of time and of place, and the consequences which will follow in any particular case if the proceedings are stayed, and also those which will follow if they are not.

The court has no right to narrow these words. The effect of them is, on the one hand, to emphasize the duty of the bishop fairly to consider the particular case before him, and honestly to form an opinion upon it; and, on the other hand, the effect of the words is not only to empower him, but to require him to take a wide and not a narrow view of the case; to consider all its circumstances—i.e., every circumstance material for forming an opinion upon the question whether proceedings should not be taken. The bishop, as will be further pointed out presently, is not at liberty to set any law of the land at defiance, and he cannot, under cover of forming an opinion under the power conferred upon him by this section, prevent the law from being enforced against persons who persist in doing that which he knows to be plainly illegal.

But what is legal or illegal with respect to images, crosses, crucifixes, and other things of the sort in churches, depends on whether they do or do not, or will or will not, encourage or lead to idolatrous or superstitious worship, in the place where they are or are to be put; and if in any particular case the bishop is of opinion that a particular image, cross, crucifix, or other piece of sculpture has no tendency to encourage such worship, he is, in my opinion, perfectly justified in stopping litigation on the subject. In every such case it appears to me that the bishop may properly consider what are called the interests of the Church in the matter, by which I understand the advantages or disadvantages (to other persons than those complaining and complained of) which will result from stopping further litigation.

To exclude such considerations would, in my opinion, be unduly to limit his power and duty to consider "the whole circumstances of the case." The bishop is empowered, and is bound, to consider "the whole circumstances of the case," but it may well happen that one or two circumstances render all the others comparatively immaterial. When that does happen the bishop need no longer consider these. He is not bound to waste his time in thinking over any circumstance which is or which becomes unimportant. He has considered it as soon as he has made up his mind that it requires no further consideration. Having considered "the whole circumstances of the case," and come to the opinion that proceedings should not be taken on the representation, the bishop's next duty is "to state in writing the reason for his opinion." This must mean his reason for the opinion at which he has arrived; the reason which has influenced him and on which his opinion is based. If he does this he discharges his duty in this respect, even although other persons may think the reason unsatisfactory.

Whether his reason can be reviewed by any other tribunal is an entirely different question, which I will examine presently, but so far as the bishop is concerned he has complied with the statute.

(2) I pass now to the second question—Has the bishop in this case performed his statutory duty? It is urged that he has not, because, first, he has misapprehended the case, and, secondly, he has considered circumstances outside it, and which ought not to have influenced him. The contention that the bishop has misapprehended the case is based upon his view of the Exeter case and of its bearing on the present case. The differences between the two are obvious enough.

In the Exeter case there was no representation of a crucifix, nor of the Crucifixion, nor of the Virgin Mary; nor was there in that case any suggestion that any superstitious reverence had been, or was likely to be, paid to any figures forming part of the reredos. The reredos in St. Paul's, which the bishop in this case had to consider, does contain a representation of the Crucifixion and of the Virgin Mary, and the representation made to the bishop states that these do tend to encourage superstitious devotions.

Notwithstanding these differences, the bishop states in his reasons that the main question of principle here at issue has been already decided in the Exeter case; and that the sole object of the proceedings now proposed is merely to determine whether there may be exceptions to the principle there laid down, and whether the reredos in St. Paul's is such an exception. He further states that it appears to him impossible to say that the difference between the two erections is of very grave importance, or that one offers serious temptations to idolatry and the other does not. These statements of the bishop show, to my mind, conclusively that he has considered the present case; that he has compared it with the Exeter case; that he has come to the conclusion that the sculptures complained of in the St. Paul's reredos are parts of an erection which is decorative in its object and character, and are not likely to encourage superstitious devotion. This, in my opinion, is the fair meaning of the bishop's statement; and, this being its meaning, he has not, in my opinion, misapprehended this case in the smallest degree. Whether the reredos in St. Paul's does or does not tend to encourage superstitious reverence or idolatry is a question of fact or of opinion. The complainants say it does, and they want to have that question tried. The bishop has considered this very point and thinks that the reredos has no such tendency. If he be right, the Exeter case shows that the reredos in St. Paul's is not unlawful; if he be wrong, he will have made a mistake, the effect of which I will consider presently. But, right or wrong, he has not misapprehended the case before him, but has considered it carefully as by law he was bound to do.

It is next contended that the bishop has considered circumstances outside the case, and which ought not to have influenced him. His observations on litigation on such a matter as the reredos show, it is said, that he has exceeded his power, and that he has not performed the duty imposed upon him by the statutes. The bishop's observations are, however, made with reference to the case before him. He has already stated in effect that he apprehends no danger of the reredos being perverted to superstitious or idolatrous worship; and, that being so, he deprecates litigation on the subject. Here again his view of the innocent tendency of the reredos fully justifies him, in my opinion, in considering the effect of litigation about what appears to him so harmless an erection. If he had taken a different view of the tendency of the sculpture the case would have been entirely different. The conclusion at which I have arrived on this part of the case is that the bishop has performed the duty imposed upon him by statute.

But he may have made a mistake, and this leads me to examine the last question which arises—viz. (3) what jurisdiction the High Court has over him. The Public Worship Regulation Act gives no appeal from the refusal of the bishop to allow proceedings to be taken on the representation made to him. Nor is there any appeal from such refusal under any other statute or law. It follows that his decision is final and that there is no appeal from it. If he has made a mistake it cannot be rectified; and whether the mistake is one of fact or one of law is immaterial. The only remedy is to lay before him a fresh representation pointing out the supposed mistake. He could then, and, if satisfied that he ought, he, of course, would, correct his mistake by not staying proceedings on the renewed representation. But the High Court has no jurisdiction over him on the ground that he has made a mistake; nor can it review his reasons because those reasons appear to the court unsatisfactory.

The law upon this point was so fully examined in the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon it. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the High Court has no jurisdiction over bishops in such cases as those now under consideration. The duty of every bishop, as of every subject, is to obey the law, whether he approves of it or not, and if he fails to perform that duty he immediately becomes amenable to the High Court. If a representation is made to a bishop under the Public Worship Regulation Act, the bishop has no right to stay proceedings upon it until he has considered the whole circumstances of the case, and come to the opinion that proceedings upon it should not be taken. If he stays proceedings without considering the case, he can be compelled by mandamus to perform his duty; so if he refuses to state his reason in writing a mandamus would lie. By requiring the bishop to state his reason in writing, to deposit it in the registry, and to send copies to the parties the Legislature has done much to insure a careful consideration of the case under a due sense of responsibility, and has rendered it possible for a court of law to ascertain whether the bishop has done his duty or not. His duty is to consider each particular case submitted to him, to give his mind to that, and not to stay proceedings respecting it unless he is of opinion that in that particular case proceedings ought to be stayed. It is not to be supposed that a bishop is unworthy of the trust reposed in him by the Legislature, nor that he will not honestly endeavour to perform it. But if any bishop should be so ill-advised as to set himself against the law, and to stay proceedings with a view to defeat the law, he would be disregarding his duty; and the court would not be imposed upon by any specious argument to the effect that the bishop had duly considered the case. In such a case a mandamus would clearly lie, and this is the proper answer to many of the ingenious hypothetical cases suggested in the course of the argument. Reg. v. Boteler and Reg. v. Adamson illustrate the application of the law to such cases.

It was urged that, by requiring the reasons for a stay of proceedings to be put into writing, to be deposited in the registry, and to be transmitted to the parties, the Legislature must have intended that the reasons given by the bishop should be capable of being reviewed by some court. I cannot myself come to this conclusion, for, as already pointed out, there are other objects to be attained by these requisitions quite sufficient to account for their introduction into the statute. Whether, in this particular case, the bishop is right or wrong in his view of the alleged tendency of the reredos I do not pause to inquire. He has not decided anything whatever as to its legality or illegality. He has no right to decide that question even as between the complainants and their opponents at the stage at which he stopped the proceedings, nor indeed at any stage without their consent. All that he has done is to say that, having considered the whole circumstances of the case, he is of opinion that proceedings should not be taken upon it. The responsibility of saying this is upon him. If he has bonâ fide considered the case and come to the conclusion that future proceedings should be stayed, he has a right to say so, and it is his duty to say so. So long as he acts in obedience to the law his opinion cannot be questioned. The attempt to show that he has not duly considered the case or has not performed the duty imposed upon him by the statute has, in my judgment, entirely failed, and this appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LOPES, L.J.—To follow two such exhaustive judgments, in both of which I entirely concur, is no easy considerable importance, and, out of deference to those from whom I differ, I have thought it right to put my judgment into writing. The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, materially altered the law respecting the right to take legal proceedings in various ecclesiastical cases and respecting the mode of proceeding in such cases. Under the Church Discipline Act any person, male or female, whether a parishioner or not, and whether a member of the Church of England or not, could complain to the bishop of any clerk in holy orders. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act the persons complaining must be an archdeacon or a churchwarden of the parish or any three male persons of full age, parishioners of the parish referred to in the complaint, and they must be members of the Church of England. The Church Discipline Act contains no express provision applicable to cathedrals or collegiate churches, whereas the Public Worship Regulation Act does (section 8). The complainants in the case of a cathedral must be three male persons of full age, inhabitants of the diocese in which the cathedral is situate, and must be members of the Church of England (ib.). The Church Discipline Act merely declared that upon complaint being made to the bishop it should be lawful for him to issue a commission to inquire into the matter complained of (section 3), or to send the case to the court of appeal of the province (section 13). There was no provision requiring him in exercising this power to give any reasons for the course he might think fit to adopt, and it was held, first in R. v. Bishop of Chichester, 7 W. R. 659, 2 Ell. & Ell. 209, and later in the Bishop of Oxford's case, that the bishop had a complete discretion as to whether further proceedings should or should not be taken, and that his only legal duty (if any) in the matter was to hear and consider the application. (See per Lord Blackburn, 5 App. Cas., p. 240).

The Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, is materially different, for by section 9, on the receipt by the bishop of a proper representation, it is his duty, within twenty-one days, to take certain steps to have the complaint investigated and determined, "unless he shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation." Moreover, if he should be of this opinion, he is to state in writing the reason for his opinion, and such statement is to be deposited in the diocesan registry and a copy of it is to be transmitted to the complainant and to the person complained of. The statute, therefore, plainly casts upon the bishop the responsibility of stopping further proceedings. He is not required to sanction them; for unless he is of opinion that they should be stopped he is bound by the statute to do what is necessary to have the complaint heard and determined in one or other of the modes prescribed by the statute.

In this state of the law three questions arise—viz., (1) What is the duty of the bishop as regards forming an opinion that proceedings should not be taken? (2) Has he in this case performed that duty? (3) What jurisdiction has the High Court over him in the matter? (1) With respect to his duty. His duty is to form an opinion. Formation of an opinion is very different from a mere exercise of will. It is clearly not competent for the bishop simply to stay further proceedings by an arbitrary exercise of his will. He must be of opinion that they ought to be stayed. To form an opinion it is obviously necessary that he must consider the case to which his attention is directed. There could be no doubt on this point even if the statute went no further; but the statute expressly requires him to consider "the whole circumstances of the case." These words are to my mind very important. They show that he is to consider more than what in legal language may be described as the issues raised by the complainants. "The whole circumstances of the case" embrace more than the matters directly in controversy. The expression includes circumstances of time and of place, and the consequences which will follow in any particular case if the proceedings are stayed, and also those which will follow if they are not.

The court has no right to narrow these words. The effect of them is, on the one hand, to emphasize the duty of the bishop fairly to consider the particular case before him, and honestly to form an opinion upon it; and, on the other hand, the effect of the words is not only to empower him, but to require him to take a wide and not a narrow view of the case; to consider all its circumstances—i.e., every circumstance material for forming an opinion upon the question whether proceedings should not be taken. The bishop, as will be further pointed out presently, is not at liberty to set any law of the land at defiance, and he cannot, under cover of forming an opinion under the power conferred upon him by this section, prevent the law from being enforced against persons who persist in doing that which he knows to be plainly illegal.

But what is legal or illegal with respect to images, crosses, crucifixes, and other things of the sort in churches, depends on whether they do or do not, or will or will not, encourage or lead to idolatrous or superstitious worship, in the place where they are or are to be put; and if in any particular case the bishop is of opinion that a particular image, cross, crucifix, or other piece of sculpture has no tendency to encourage such worship, he is, in my opinion, perfectly justified in stopping litigation on the subject. In every such case it appears to me that the bishop may properly consider what are called the interests of the Church in the matter, by which I understand the advantages or disadvantages (to other persons than those complaining and complained of) which will result from stopping further litigation.

To exclude such considerations would, in my opinion, be unduly to limit his power and duty to consider "the whole circumstances of the case." The bishop is empowered, and is bound, to consider "the whole circumstances of the case," but it may well happen that one or two circumstances render all the others comparatively immaterial. When that does happen the bishop need no longer consider these. He is not bound to waste his time in thinking over any circumstance which is or which becomes unimportant. He has considered it as soon as he has made up his mind that it requires no further consideration. Having considered "the whole circumstances of the case," and come to the opinion that proceedings should not be taken on the representation, the bishop's next duty is "to state in writing the reason for his opinion." This must mean his reason for the opinion at which he has arrived; the reason which has influenced him and on which his opinion is based. If he does this he discharges his duty in this respect, even although other persons may think the reason unsatisfactory.

Whether his reason can be reviewed by any other tribunal is an entirely different question, which I will examine presently, but so far as the bishop is concerned he has complied with the statute.

(2) I pass now to the second question—Has the bishop in this case performed his statutory duty? It is urged that he has not, because, first, he has misapprehended the case, and, secondly, he has considered circumstances outside it, and which ought not to have influenced him. The contention that the bishop has misapprehended the case is based upon his view of the Exeter cases and of its bearing on the present case. The differences between the two are obvious enough.

In the Exeter case there was no representation of a crucifix, nor of the Crucifixion, nor of the Virgin Mary; nor was there in that case any suggestion that any superstitious reverence had been, or was likely to be, paid to any figures forming part of the reredos. The reredos in St. Paul's, which the bishop in this case had to consider, does contain a representation of the Crucifixion and of the Virgin Mary, and the representation made to the bishop states that these do tend to encourage superstitious devotions.

Notwithstanding these differences, the bishop states in his reasons that the main question of principle here at issue has been already decided in the Exeter case; and that the sole object of the proceedings now proposed is merely to determine whether there may be exceptions to the principle there laid down, and whether the reredos in St. Paul's is such an exception. He further states that it appears to him impossible to say that the difference between the two erections is of very grave importance, or that one offers serious temptations to idolatry and the other does not. These statements of the bishop show, to my mind, conclusively that he has considered the present case; that he has compared it with the Exeter case; that he has come to the conclusion that the sculptures complained of in the St. Paul's reredos are parts of an erection which is decorative in its object and character, and are not likely to encourage superstitious devotion. This, in my opinion, is the fair meaning of the bishop's statement; and, this being its meaning, he has not, in my opinion, misapprehended this case in the smallest degree. Whether the reredos in St. Paul's does or does not tend to encourage superstitious reverence or idolatry is a question of fact or of opinion. The complainants say it does, and they want to have that question tried. The bishop has considered this very point and thinks that the reredos has no such tendency. If he be right, the Exeter case shows that the reredos in St. Paul's is not unlawful; if he be wrong, he will have made a mistake, the effect of which I will consider presently. But, right or wrong, he has not misapprehended the case before him, but has considered it carefully as by law he was bound to do.

It is next contended that the bishop has considered circumstances outside the case, and which ought not to have influenced him. His observations on litigation on such a matter as the reredos show, it is said, that he has exceeded his power, and that he has not performed the duty imposed upon him by the statutes. The bishop's observations are, however, made with reference to the case before him. He has already stated in effect that he apprehends no danger of the reredos being perverted to superstitious or idolatrous worship; and, that being so, he deprecates litigation on the subject. Here again his view of the innocent tendency of the reredos fully justifies him, in my opinion, in considering the effect of litigation about what appears to him so harmless an erection. If he had taken a different view of the tendency of the sculpture the case would have been entirely different. The conclusion at which I have arrived on this part of the case is that the bishop has performed the duty imposed upon him by statute.

But he may have made a mistake, and this leads me to examine the last question which arises—viz. (3) what jurisdiction the High Court has over him. The Public Worship Regulation Act gives no appeal from the refusal of the bishop to allow proceedings to be taken on the representation made to him. Nor is there any appeal from such refusal under any other statute or law. It follows that his decision is final and that there is no appeal from it. If he has made a mistake it cannot be rectified; and whether the mistake is one of fact or one of law is immaterial. The only remedy is to lay before him a fresh representation pointing out the supposed mistake. He could then, and, if satisfied that he ought, he, of course, would, correct his mistake by not staying proceedings on the renewed representation. But the High Court has no jurisdiction over him on the ground that he has made a mistake; nor can it review his reasons because those reasons appear to the court unsatisfactory.

The law upon this point was so fully examined in the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon it. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the High Court has no jurisdiction over bishops in such cases as those now under consideration. The duty of every bishop, as of every subject, is to obey the law, whether he approves of it or not, and if he fails to perform that duty he immediately becomes amenable to the High Court. If a representation is made to a bishop under the Public Worship Regulation Act, the bishop has no right to stay proceedings upon it until he has considered the whole circumstances of the case, and come to the opinion that proceedings upon it should not be taken. If he stays proceedings without considering the case, he can be compelled by mandamus to perform his duty; so if he refuses to state his reason in writing a mandamus would lie. By requiring the bishop to state his reason in writing, to deposit it in the registry, and to send copies to the parties the Legislature has done much to insure a careful consideration of the case under a due sense of responsibility, and has rendered it possible for a court of law to ascertain whether the bishop has done his duty or not. His duty is to consider each particular case submitted to him, to give his mind to that, and not to stay proceedings respecting it unless he is of opinion that in that particular case proceedings ought to be stayed. It is not to be supposed that a bishop is unworthy of the trust reposed in him by the Legislature, nor that he will not honestly endeavour to perform it. But if any bishop should be so ill-advised as to set himself against the law, and to stay proceedings with a view to defeat the law, he would be disregarding his duty; and the court would not be imposed upon by any specious argument to the effect that the bishop had duly considered the case. In such a case a mandamus would clearly lie, and this is the proper answer to many of the ingenious hypothetical cases suggested in the course of the argument. Reg. v. Boteler and Reg. v. Adamson illustrate the application of the law to such cases.

It was urged that, by requiring the reasons for a stay of proceedings to be put into writing, to be deposited in the registry, and to be transmitted to the parties, the Legislature must have intended that the reasons given by the bishop should be capable of being reviewed by some court. I cannot myself come to this conclusion, for, as already pointed out, there are other objects to be attained by these requisitions quite sufficient to account for their introduction into the statute. Whether, in this particular case, the bishop is right or wrong in his view of the alleged tendency of the reredos I do not pause to inquire. He has not decided anything whatever as to its legality or illegality. He has no right to decide that question even as between the complainants and their opponents at the stage at which he stopped the proceedings, nor indeed at any stage without their consent. All that he has done is to say that, having considered the whole circumstances of the case, he is of opinion that proceedings should not be taken upon it. The responsibility of saying this is upon him. If he has bonâ fide considered the case and come to the conclusion that future proceedings should be stayed, he has a right to say so, and it is his duty to say so. So long as he acts in obedience to the law his opinion cannot be questioned. The attempt to show that he has not duly considered the case or has not performed the duty imposed upon him by the statute has, in my judgment, entirely failed, and this appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LOPES, L.J.—To follow two such exhaustive judgments, in both of which I entirely concur, is no easy matter; still, the case being so important, and as we are reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, I have committed my judgment to writing, putting it in the shortest possible compass, and I will read it. The considerations upon which the decision in this case depends are, in my opinion, more limited than those which have been advanced in argument, or which were discussed in the judgments in the court below. Abstract propositions of law and fact have been debated, which it is not necessary to decide in order to determine the question now before the court. Whether the order nisi for a mandamus should be made absolute depends on the true construction of sections 8 and 9 of the Public Worship Act, 1874. It does not seem material in detail to consider the law up to that time. It is clear from the decision in Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford that up to that time the bishop under the Church Discipline Act had a discretion with which the temporal court could not interfere, and the argument is pertinent that the Legislature would not be likely to take away that discretion without using clear and unmistakeable language to that effect. But it is admitted that under the Public Worship Act, 1874, the bishop has a discretion, but, it is said, a different kind of discretion, and of a more limited character than that which he possessed before that time. That it is different I agree, but that it is more limited I do not admit. It is a discretion which must be exercised in accordance with the terms of the statute, but when so exercised, it is as large and as incapable of being reviewed as was the discretion vested in the bishop before 1874.

I will now construe the 9th section of the statute as I understand it. Section 8 deals with the representation, which must now for the first time be made by somebody interested, and in this respect is different from the Church Discipline Act, where the bishop may be put in motion by anybody. Then section 9 provides that the bishop is, within twenty-one days after receiving the representation, to transmit it, unless he shall be of opinion, after considering the whole circumstances of the case, that proceedings should not be taken on the representation, in which case he shall state in writing the reason for his opinion. The bishop is bound to transmit unless he complies with this requirement. It is a condition precedent to his staying proceedings. I think these words are partly enabling and partly restrictive—enabling as declaring that the bishop may consider the whole circumstances of the case, by which I understand not only the direct circumstances to which his attention has been called by the representation, but also all other surrounding and collateral circumstances which are material to be considered; enabling, therefore, as enlarging the basis on which the discretion may proceed; restrictive as requiring him to state his reason in writing, and thus placing a fetter upon any arbitrary or capricious exercise of his discretion. An arbitrary or capricious exercise of his discretion would be no exercise at all. Before the Act of 1874 such an exercise was possible, and it could not have been reviewed, because there was no means by which it could be examined or discovered.

There are several objects, it may be suggested, which the Legislature contemplated when it required the bishop to state his reason. First, that which I have already stated—namely, to make it impossible for a bishop to act from mere caprice; secondly, to give publicity to the grounds on which he was acting; thirdly, to inform the complainants, and thus give them an opportunity of amending, if they thought fit, their representation. But I am clear that the Legislature never intended to fetter an honest exercise by the bishop of his discretion, or, so long as the statutory requirements were complied with, to make that reviewable by mandamus which was not reviewable before. If the reason or reasons given by the bishop was or were irrelevant to the matter in hand, if they amounted to no reason, were nugatory or illusory, I doubt not but that a mandamus would go, because the bishop would not have exercised such a discretion upon the matter as could be considered in point of law a discretion which he was justified in exercising. In point of fact he would have exercised no discretion. As to the sufficiency of the reason or reasons either in law or in fact no temporal court can inquire; that is a matter for the bishop, and the bishop alone. A court of law does not sit as a court of appeal from the bishop to say whether he has exercised his discretion, if he has one, wisely or not, though if he has no discretion it may compel him to do his duty and act. If there is any reason put forward upon which the exercise of the bishop's discretion may properly proceed, and the bishop honestly exercises it, in my opinion a mandamus will not go. I believe this to be the law, and the principle which has always governed the issuing to an inferior tribunal a writ of mandamus. To hold otherwise would be to give an appeal by mandamus when no appeal is given. It would be turning the right to a mandamus into a right of appeal against reasons and opinions of the bishop when he has exercised his discretion.

But it is said "after considering the whole circumstances of the case" are not words enabling the bishop to take all the circumstances of the case, whether direct or collateral, into his consideration, but compelling him to take into consideration every circumstance, both direct and collateral, and that if he omits one material circumstance, mandamus should go. I entirely disagree with this contention. The bishop may consider one material circumstance, think it enough, and, disregarding any others, found his opinion upon that. For instance, in this case, he might have said, "I have considered the allegation in the representation that these images tend to encourage ideas and devotions of an unauthorized kind. I think they are church decorations, and have no such tendency"—and this though there may be other circumstances in the case which he might, if he thought fit, have considered. But it seems unnecessary to pursue this contention, for I am of opinion that in this case the bishop had considered the whole circumstances of the case, and nothing which is not a circumstance in the case material for his consideration. The only way to gauge the circumstances which he has considered is to look at his reasons. I find nothing in them indicating any omission or commission—I mean any act of omission in not considering any material circumstance, or acts of commission in considering any immaterial circumstance. In order to justify this mandamus the bishop's reasons must lead the court to the conclusion that he has considered irrelevant circumstances, to the exclusion of relevant, or that his reasons are futile, and has thus, as I have said before, exercised no discretion at all.

This being my opinion, it is unnecessary to consider the matter any further, because it cannot be, and is not, suggested that he has considered irrelevant reasons to the exclusion of relevant, or that his reasons are futile. The suggestion, so far as I can understand it, is that he has considered more than he ought. I desire, however, to express the construction which I place on the language of the bishop in his reply to the representation. He says, in effect, "I have considered the whole circumstances attending your representation. I understand that you wish to litigate whether the images described in your representation have any tendency to idolatry, and whether their erection is permitted by law. I have looked at these images. I am well acquainted with the reredos at Exeter. I have carefully read the decision in Phillpotts v. Boyd. Between the images, which in that case were decided not to be idolatrous, and the images referred to in your representation there may be differences in detail, but those differences, if any, are so unsubstantial and insignificant that they are governed by the same principle as that laid down in Phillpotts v. Boyd."

Then the bishop proceeds to speak of litigation; he lays down no hard-and-fast rule against litigation; on the contrary, he says it is sometimes necessary, but undesirable when the matter is trivial and the result doubtful. He means that he doubts if there is any breach of church discipline in this case; that if there is, it is trivial, and not of sufficient substance to justify litigation. He does not put forward litigation as an abstract and independent reason, but rather as an amplification of what he has said before.

I cannot but think that this is the meaning of the bishop's language, and that anyone carefully reading it would so understand it. It is said the bishop has misapprehended Phillpotts v. Boyd. I do not think he has; on the contrary, he has, in my judgment, correctly understood it, and rightly applied the principles, there laid down, to the present case. But if he misapprehended Phillpotts v. Boyd, provided the consideration of that case was in his discretion, it would be no ground for a mandamus. The decision in that case was a circumstance for him to consider. Litigation and the probable result of litigation was also a matter which he was entitled to regard. In my judgment, the bishop has given in writing reasons upon which the exercise of his discretion may proceed, and has exercised that discretion honestly. He is not called upon to consider the whole circumstances of the case as contended for by the learned counsel for the complainants, but if he is, in my opinion the bishop has considered every material circumstance, both direct and collateral, and has not considered any circumstance which was irrelevant. The learned judges in the court below, whose decision prevailed, appear to me to have been terrified by the extent of the power and responsibility which, if his contention was maintained, would be reposed in the bishop. If the construction of the 9th section of the Act of 1874 is clear, it appears to me this is a matter with which we have no concern. Many of the arguments urged by the learned counsel for the complainants would no doubt have been most material matters to consider when the Bill was passing through Parliament, but are inapplicable now. The judges do not make the law; they administer it, and that however much they may disapprove or dislike it. Some people may think it undesirable that bishops should possess so large a discretion as that, which we think, under the Act of 1874, they are entitled to exercise. It is said that bishops are human, and may abuse the discretion reposed in them. So may judges and other high functionaries to whom great powers are intrusted. The guarantee for their integrity and honest discharge of their duties is their antecedents and the force of public opinion. I venture to think that, having regard to the high character of the men in whose hands discretion is placed by the Act of 1874, the risk of abuse is remote, and one which the Legislature might safely determine to encounter. I am of opinion that the decision of the Queen's Bench Division should be reversed, and the rule for a mandamus be discharged.

Appeal allowed, with costs, including the costs of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

Solicitors for the Bishop of London, Lee, Bolton, & Lee.

Solicitors for the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, Brooks, Jenkins, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Wainwright & Baillie.

From Chan. Div. Dec. 10, 11.

STUART v. DIPLOCK. (a.)

Covenant — Restraint of trade — Prohibition against carrying on particular business—Business of "ladies' outfitter"—Overlapping businesses.

The plaintiff carried on the business of "ladies' outfitting" on premises held under lease containing a covenant by the lessor not to consent to the business of "ladies' outfitting" being carried on at or upon the adjoining premises, also belonging to the lessor. The defendants became lessees of these adjoining premises, with notice of this covenant, and began to carry on thereat the business of "fancy drapers and hosiers," in the course of which they sold some articles the sale of which constituted part of the business of "ladies' outfitting" also. The plaintiff brought an action to restrain the defendants from carrying on the business of ladies' outfitting. It appeared from the evidence that the businesses of "fancy draper and hosier" and "ladies' outfitting" overlapped in respect of the sale of the above articles.

Held, assuming that the effect of the covenant was such as to make it obligatory upon the defendants, having notice of the covenant, not to carry on the business of "ladies' outfitting" (as to which the court gave no decision), yet that such an obligation was not broken by reason of the defendants selling, in the course of their business as "fancy drapers and hosiers," some of the articles, the sale of which constituted part of the business also of "ladies' outfitting," as the terms of the covenant did not prohibit the sale of any specific articles sold in the course of the business of "ladies' outfitting."

Feilden v. Slater, 17 W. R. 485, L. R. 7 Eq. 523, distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitting" at No. 9, Mount Pleasant, Tunbridge Wells, and the question raised on the appeal was whether the defendants, by reason of their selling certain articles of ladies' underclothing—viz., "vests," "drawers," "spencers," and "combinations" (which articles were all made on hosiery frames, and were composed of merino, wool, or cotton, but not of linen)—were in fact carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitting."

The plaintiff was the executrix of the lessee of No. 10, Mount Pleasant, and the lessors, who were also the owners of the adjoining houses, Nos. 9, 11, and 12, had covenanted with the lessee of No. 10, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that the lessors would "not permit or suffer to be carried on in or upon the adjoining dwelling-houses and shops known as Nos. 11 and 12, Mount Pleasant, the trades or businesses of ladies' outfitting, juvenile outfitting, or sale of baby linen, nor give their consent to such trades or businesses being carried on at or upon the shop No. 9, Mount Pleasant, then occupied as therein mentioned" (viz., by a wine merchant).

The lessee of No. 10, Mount Pleasant, and, after his death, the plaintiff, as his executrix, carried on at No. 10 the businesses of ladies' outfitting, juvenile outfitting, and sale of baby linen. In September, 1885, the assigns of the original lessors of all the above-mentioned houses agreed to grant a lease of No. 9 to the defendants, Messrs. Diplock Brothers, and the defendants, it was admitted, took with notice of the restrictive covenant entered into by the lessors in the lease of No. 10. In March, 1888, the lease of No. 9 was granted to the defendants, and the lease contained a covenant by the defendants with the lessors not to carry on upon the premises the businesses of "ladies' outfitting (except vests and stockings, which the trade term 'hosiery' includes), juvenile outfitting, or sale of baby linen, being the business carried on at the adjoining shop by Mrs. Stuart" (the plaintiff). The business of "ladies' outfitter," as it appeared from the evidence, consisted in the sale of all articles of underclothing required by ladies, and of some other articles also, such as hats, caps, and handkerchiefs. The defendants carried on at No. 9 the business or trade of "fancy drapers and hosiers," in the course of which they sold the four above-mentioned classes of articles of ladies' underclothing.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kekewich, J., held that as the sale of the above-mentioned articles formed an essential part of the business of "ladies' outfitting," the defendants, by reason of the sale of such articles, were in fact carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitting," and he accordingly granted the injunction against them asked for by the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Everitt, Q.C., and Dauney, for the appellants.—Covenants in restraint of trade must be construed strictly: German v. Chapman, 25 W. R. 802, 7 Ch. D. 271, at p. 276; Holt v. Collyer, 29 W. R. 502, 16 Ch. D. 718; and especially so in the the case of such a composite business as that of "ladies' outfitter." The trade of "ladies' outfitter" and that of "fancy draper and hosier" overlap each other in respect of the sale of certain articles, but the sale of such articles by a hosier cannot be said to constitute a carrying on of the business of "ladies' outfitter."

They referred also to Jones v. Bone, 18 W. R. 489, L. R. 9 Eq. 674, in which Feilden v. Slater, 17 W. R. 485, L. R. 7 Eq. 523, was explained.

Warmington, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for the respondent.—Though the covenant by the lessors of the plaintiff is only a covenant "not to consent to" the business of ladies' outfitting being carried on at No. 9, yet the defendants, having admittedly had notice of that covenant when they took their lease of No. 9, would in effect break that covenant by carrying on there the business of "ladies' outfitting": Nottingham Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778. The evidence shows that the business "ladies' outfitter" consists in the sale of all articles and garments worn underneath the outside dress of ladies; the sale of the four classes of above-mentioned articles which the defendants sell forms a substantial part of the business of a "ladies' outfitter," and such sale therefore constitutes a breach of a covenant not to carry on the business of ladies' outfitter: Feilden v. Slater.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an action brought by a lady who is entitled under a lease to the shop numbered 10, Mount Pleasant-avenue, where she carries on the business of "ladies' outfitting," and she sues to restrain the defendants from carrying on—as she alleges they are carrying on—the business of "ladies' outfitting," on the ground that the defendants took their lease with notice of a covenant contained in the lease made by their landlord to the plaintiff, and which covenant the plaintiff alleges prevents the defendants doing what they are doing

The covenant, however, is merely that the landlord shall not give his consent to the carrying on of the businesses of ladies' outfitting, juvenile outfitting, or sale of baby linen, in the house occupied by the defendants. The question whether such a covenant is one which, upon the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, would render the defendants liable to be restrained is an important question, but I do not propose to give any opinion upon it, as the point was not seriously argued before us by the appellant, and I only refer to the question to mention that I do not decide it.

The defendants say that they are not carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitter." The evidence shows that the business of "ladies' outfitter" is the selling of all articles of underclothing required by ladies, and also the selling of some other articles such as hats, caps, and handkerchiefs. The defendants carry on a hosiers' and drapers' business, and also sell some of the articles sold by a "ladies' outfitter." Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that the business of a ladies' outfitter could not be successfully carried on without the sale of these articles, and that, therefore, the defendants were carrying on the business of a ladies' outfitter, and he therefore granted an injunction against them. In my opinion, however, that is wrong, and the test applied is erroneous. If it were shown that the sale of these particular articles substantially made up the business of a ladies' outfitter, the case would be entirely different. But the mere sale of one or two essential articles sold by a ladies' outfitter —e.g., corsets or stays—is not carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitter," nor can it be said that anyone who sells corsets and stays only, is a "ladies' outfitter." As Bowen, L.J., put it during the argument, if a man sold a great number of things not sold by a "ladies' outfitter," and did not sell a number of things which a "ladies' outfitter" did sell, but did sell some of such things, could it be said that he was carrying on the business of a "ladies' outfitter"? The covenant does not prohibit the defendants from selling any of the articles sold by a "ladies' outfitter," but simply from carrying on the business of ladies' outfitter, &c. If it were proved that there was a mere colourable omission of some of the articles sold by a ladies' outfitter, the case might be very different. There is no evidence of anything of that kind.

In my opinion there is nothing on the evidence sufficient to show that the defendants are, in fact, carrying on the business of a ladies' outfitter. As to the case of Feilden v. Slater, there the terms of the covenant expressly prohibited the sale of wine and spirits, and as the defendant was selling wine and spirits he was breaking the terms of the covenant. The appeal must succeed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and as we are differing from the learned judge below I will add a few words.

I will assume—though by no means satisfied that it is so—that the defendants have come under an obligation not to carry on the business of "ladies' outfitter." That is not the same thing as an obligation not to carry on any part of the business of "ladies' outfitter." The business of ladies' outfitter is one business, the business of a hosier is another and distinct business. The two businesses touch each other in the sale of some four common articles. A man does not become a ladies' outfitter simply by reason of his selling in the course of another business some of the articles which are sold by a ladies' outfitter. I do not think the obligation which I have assumed the defendants to be under is broken by their taking what is an essential part of the business of a ladies' outfitter, if that part is also an essential part of the business which the defendants are carrying on bonâ fide as hosiers; nor even would the taking of a substantial part of the business of ladies' outfitter be a breach of their obligation by the defendants, if that part was also a substantial part of another business which the defendants were not prohibited from carrying on.

Of course the defendants would not be allowed, under the colourable pretence of carrying on the business of a hosier, to really carry on the business of ladies' outfitter, but that is not the case here. The appeal therefore succeeds, and the action must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I also cannot agree with the decision of Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff is suing the defendants on the ground that the defendants took with notice of the covenant contained in the lease to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff. [The Lord Justice read the covenant, and continued:—] In the case of No. 11 and No. 12 the lessors covenanted not to permit certain businesses to be carried on; in the case of No. 9 they only covenanted not to consent to those businesses being carried on. The defendants are the occupants of No. 9, and they admittedly had notice of that covenant. I will only say on this point that I am by no means convinced that the defendants can be restrained from carrying on the business of "ladies' outfitter" on the ground that they had notice of such a covenant as the above. But even if they could be restrained on such ground, in my opinion the plaintiff's case nevertheless fails. The covenant relates to the three businesses mentioned in it, but it does not relate to any parts of those three businesses; there is no covenant not to sell any particular articles with reference to those three businesses. In my opinion covenants of this kind ought not to be stretched beyond the ordinary meaning of the words and expressions used in them. The business of ladies' outfitting is conversant with the sale of ladies underclothing. A ladies' outfitter sells some articles sold also by hosiers and many articles not sold by hosiers, and vice versa. The two businesses overlap. Can it be said that because a person carrying on the business of a hosier sells some of the articles sold by a ladies' outfitter he is therefore carrying on the business of a ladies' outfitter? Such a conclusion could not be arrived at without the pressure of necessity. In my opinion the defendants are not carrying on the business of a ladies' outfitter, and the appeal must therefore be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, E. Chester; Sole, Turner, & Knight.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } Aug. 5, 1889.

In re ROBERTS. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Mortgage to solicitor—Solicitor's remuneration—Profit costs—Right to charge.

A solicitor cannot charge his client with profit costs for the preparation of a mortgage from the client to himself.

Adjourned summons.

In 1880 John Miles Evans applied to his solicitor, Thomas Roberts, to procure him a loan of £2,100 upon property he was about to purchase at Great Malvern. Roberts tried to obtain the money from various persons, but, finding he could not procure the whole amount, he arranged to obtain £1,200 of it at 4½ per cent. from a third person on first mortgage, and to lend the remaining £900 himself on second mortgage at 5 per cent., and to this arrangement Evans acceded. The purchase was accordingly carried out, and both mortgages were prepared by Roberts, the solicitor, and duly executed. The mortgage to Roberts contained a clause enabling him and any other person interested in the mortgage money as a solicitor, to charge and be paid for business done by him in relation to such mortgage money or the mortgaged premises in like manner as if he were not himself interested therein, and as if he were acting as solicitor for another person.

On the 26th of March, 1889, Evans obtained an order for delivery of Roberts' bill and taxation thereof, whereupon Roberts delivered a bill made out according to the system of charging before the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and comprising all the work connected with both the mortgages. Upon taxation the taxing master allowed the charges for preparing the £1,200 mortgage, but disallowed, amongst other items, the whole of the costs of preparing the £900 mortgage to Roberts, though he allowed certain items for work done after the execution of the mortgage, holding that such work came within the power of charging contained in the mortgage. Roberts carried in objections to the disallowance of the items for the preparation of the mortgage to himself, alleging, as his grounds of objection, that the work charged for had been undertaken upon Evans' own instructions, that the work was for Evans' benefit in enabling him to borrow money, and that he (the solicitor) was professionally responsible to Evans for the proper negotiation of the terms of the entire loan of £2,100, and also for the proper preparation and completion of the second mortgage for £900 (part thereof) to himself. The taxing master, however, overruled the objection, on the ground that a solicitor could not make a profit of his position as mortgagee.

Roberts then took out this summons to have his objections allowed, and for a reference back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly.

Marten, Q.C., and Maidlow, for Roberts.—There is no authority upon the question whether or not a solicitor who prepares a mortgage to himself from his client is entitled to profit costs; but, in the absence of an authority to the contrary, the solicitor is so entitled. It is unreasonable that, when a client asks his solicitor to advance him money on mortgage, the solicitor should not be entitled to charge for his time and trouble in preparing the mortgage. [KAY, J.—In Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, Kindersley, V.C., says that a solicitor-mortgagee acting for himself in a suit in defence of his own title cannot, as against a second mortgagee, claim more than his costs out of pocket.] That case is overruled by London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, 32 W. R. 523, 781, 12 Q. B. D. 452, 13 Q. B. D. 872, which decides that where a solicitor defends an action in person and obtains judgment he is entitled to the same costs as if he had employed a solicitor. And In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 33 W. R. Dig. 61, decides that where one of a body of mortgagees is a solicitor, acting as solicitor in enforcing the security, he is entitled to profit costs.

Levett, for Evans.—A mortgagee cannot, in the absence of express contract, affix to the mortgaged property any burden clogging the equity of redemption; neither can he impose a personal burden on his mortgagor. The mortgagee stands in a quasi-fiduciary relation towards the mortgagor. Here the mortgagee was preparing the mortgage in his own interest, and for his own benefit, and, therefore, he is not entitled to charge for it as solicitor. The mortgagee can only charge the mortgagor for the preparation of the mortgage by his, the mortgagee's, solicitor; but here the mortgagee had no solicitor, for he did the work himself. The mortgagor, therefore, cannot be charged with any profit costs for the preparation of this mortgage.

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—Profit costs were allowed to a solicitor-mortgagee in a redemption suit, Price v. M'Beth, 12 W. R. 818.

KAY, J.—In this case the solicitor not only prepared the mortgage to the third person—the costs of which, being mortgagee's costs, the mortgagor has admitted his liability to pay, and therefore allowed them to be included in the bill—but he has also charged profit costs for the preparation of the mortgage to himself. The reason why these costs should not be allowed is not that of any fiduciary relation between the solicitor and the mortgagor, but that they are not the mortgagor's costs at all. They are mortgagee's costs; and the only way in which they could be allowed is, if there is a mortgagee against whom they could be charged, and who would have to pay them to his own solicitor, and could then charge them to the mortgagor. But here there was no mortgagee who had to pay to any solicitor; the mortgagee has no solicitor to prepare the mortgage, for he does the work himself, and therefore he cannot charge any costs, because they never existed at all. I therefore disallow these costs.

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. CHRISTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood, for T. & T. Roberts, Worcester; Ellis, Munday, & Bartrum.

Chan. Div. North, J. } Nov. 16.

WOOD v. GREGORY. (a.)

Practice—Partition—Request for sale—Proof of title at hearing—Inquiry in chambers.

In a partition action the court will not, as a general rule, at the request of persons who claim to be interested in a moiety of the property, make an order for immediate sale without first directing an inquiry as to the persons interested in the property.

The court may, however, when the value of the property is small, make an order at the trial for immediate sale, on satisfactory evidence being produced as to the persons interested.

Action.

This was a partition action in which the plaintiffs were the owners of a moiety of the property and the defendants were the owners of the other moiety. The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, asked for a sale. The estimated value of the property was £10,000. There was an affidavit that all the persons interested in the property were parties.

H. M. Humphry, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs' desire an order for an immediate sale without an inquiry being first directed as to the persons interested. The affidavit is sufficient evidence that all the persons interested are parties to the action.

In re Stedman, W. N., 1888, p. 119, and Willis v. Willis, ante, p. 7, were referred to.

W. Baker; and Oswald, appeared for the various defendants.

NORTH, J.—I do not consider In re Stedman is an authority that in all partition actions the title to the property is to be proved in court at the hearing. Such a course may be very proper in simple cases, and especially if the value of the property is small. In the present case, however, the title appears to depend upon a complicated pedigree, and the value of the property is considerable. I think it will be more convenient and more for the interest of the parties in the present case that the ordinary inquiry as to the title should be made in chambers. I will give leave to apply in chambers for an order for sale.

Solicitors, Torr & Co.; W. Montgomery White; Chester & Co.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div. North, J. } July 9—11, 1889.

In re PARRY.

SCOTT v. LEAK. (a.)

Will—Annuity—Security for annuity—Right of annuitant to have estate converted.

A testator, after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, declared that the residue of his property, after payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies and annuities, should be divided among his next of kin and heiresses as though he had died intestate. The testator died possessed of real estate (consisting of freeholds and leaseholds) of large value. The leaseholds and part of the freeholds were subject to mortgages. All the testator's debts (other than the mortgage debts) and his funeral and testamentary expenses had been paid out of the personal estate, and there was a balance of £2,000 in the hands of the surviving executors. The annuities had been punctually paid. The annuitants claimed to have the testator's leaseholds sold and the mortgage debts paid out of the proceeds, and a sufficient sum invested to provide for their annuities.

Held, that the annuitants were not entitled to have the leaseholds sold; they were only entitled to have the annuities properly secured.

Webber v. Webber, 1 Sim. & S. 311, and King v. Malcot, 9 Ha. 692, approved.

S. H. Parry (who died on the 18th of December, 1887), by his will dated the 4th of May, 1887, after appointing John Leak and C. H. Hodgson executors, and giving to each of them £100, directed them to pay to his father and mother an annuity of £300, and to continue such annuity to the survivor of them for his or her life as the case might be.

The testator also bequeathed to his mother for her life a separate additional annuity of £100. And he directed his executors to pay an annuity of £100 to each of his four sisters, Emily, Katharine, Florence, and Edith; and in the event of the death of any one or more of his sisters, to give the survivors the benefit of their deceased sister or sisters' annuity, so that in the end the last surviving sister might enjoy the income of the four. And the testator also directed that the annuity of £300 thereinbefore bequeathed to his father and mother should go to his sisters or sister, as the case might be, on the death of the survivor of his father and mother, so that, in fact, the surviving sister, in the event of her outliving the parents, might become entitled for her life to £700 per annum. And the testator continued as follows:—"This will is merely made by me in consequence of the intestacy created by my recent marriage, and to provide for my parents and my sisters should my death occur, it being my intention, after due consideration of the subject, to make a will which shall deal with my entire estate. Meanwhile, should I die before signing such will, I declare that the residue of my property, after payment of my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies and annuities hereinbefore directed to be paid, shall be divided among my next of kin and heiresses as though I had died intestate with respect thereto."

At the date of his death the testator's real estate consisted (inter alia) of four theatres—viz., (1) the Avenue Theatre in London, which was held by the testator under a lease for a term of eighty years from the 29th of September, 1880, at the annual rent of £750. The testator had sublet this theatre for twenty-one years from the 1st of March, 1882, determinable at the end of the first fourteen years, at an annual rent of £2,276, reserving to himself two stalls and a box, which produced an average net annual income of £350. The theatre was subject to a mortgage for £5,000. The net profit arising from the theatre was £2,108 17s. 6d. (2) The Greenwich Theatre, which was held under a lease for a term of seventy-one years from the 28th of December. 1863, at the annual rent of £350. This theatre had been underlet by the testator for a term of fourteen years from the 18th of August, 1884, determinable at the end of the first seven years, at an annual rent of £350. It was subject to a mortgage for £2,000. The net profit arising from it was £186 8s. 4d. (3) The Hull Theatre, which was freehold. It was subject to a mortgage for £5,500. It had been let by the testator for seven or fourteen years at the annual rent of £1,317 6s. 8d., and the net annual income of it was £888 11s. 8d. (4) The Southampton Theatre, which was freehold. It had been let on agreement for lease at the annual rent of £700, and the net annual income of it was £629 11s. 6d.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator's mother died in his lifetime. His father survived him, and at the date of the testator's death was about eighty-two years of age. All the testator's four sisters survived, and at the date of the testator's death were of ages varying from fifty-eight to forty-one. Since the testator's death the annuities had been punctually paid.

This was an originating summons taken out by Mrs. Scott (one of the testator's two daughters) as plaintiff, against Leak, the surviving executor, the trustees of the marriage settlement of Mrs. Anderson (the testator's other daughter), Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, the testator's father, and the testator's four sisters as defendants, asking (1) That the executor might be at liberty to raise, by a mortgage of the Avenue Theatre, such a sum as (with the sum of £2,000 in the hands of the executor) would be sufficient to discharge the mortgage debts of the testator; (2) That the annuities bequeathed by the will should be secured by a first mortgage on the Southampton and Hull Theatres, the charge of the annuities on the residue of the testator's estate (subject to the mortgage to be created as aforesaid) remaining undisturbed, with liberty to the annuitants to apply to the court for additional or other securities in case the annuities, or any of them, should fall into arrear; and that, after payment of the interest on the said mortgage and of the said annuities, the residue of the annual income of the testator's estate should be paid as it accrued, as to one moiety to the plaintiff, and as to the other moiety to the trustees of Mrs. Anderson's marriage settlement.

All the testator's debts (except his mortgage debts) and his funeral and testamentary expenses had been paid out of his personal estate, and there was a balance of £2,000 in the hands of the executors.

There was evidence of a surveyor that if sold the Avenue Theatre would realize at least £25,680, and that the Greenwich Theatre would realize at least £2,600. With regard to the Hull Theatre another surveyor deposed that, if sold, it would realize at least £2,600. While as regards the Southampton Theatre another surveyor deposed that, if sold, it would realize at least £3,000.

The testator's father and four sisters desired that the leasehold theatres should be sold, and that out of the proceeds the testator's mortgage debts should be paid, and that the surplus should be invested in investments in which cash under the control of the court could be invested, and that the whole income of the estate should then be applied, first, in payment of the annuities, and, next, in the investment of the balance in securities to be approved by the court, after making such allowance as the court might think reasonable to the testator's two daughters.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and H. M. Williams, for the plaintiff.—The annuitants are only entitled to have the annuities properly secured. They have no absolute right to have the estate converted. The court will not appoint a receiver at the instance of an annuitant if the annuity is not in arrear, but will leave him to his remedy by distress.

They referred to Sollory v. Leaver, 18 W. R. 59, L. R. 9 Eq. 22; Kelsey v. Kelsey, 22 W. R. 433, L. R. 17 Eq. 495; Norman v. Johnson, 8 W. R. 300, 29 Beav. 77; Burrell v. Delevante, 10 W. R. 362, 30 Beav. 550.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and Haldane, for the defendants (other than the annuitants), referred to In re Potter, 50 L. T. (N. S.) 8, 32 W. R. Dig. 229.

Everitt, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the annuitants.—There is no trust to pay the annuities out of any particular property. There is merely a bequest of annuities, and in such a case the annuitants are entitled to have the residuary estate converted.

They referred to Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 334; Fryer v. Buttar, 8 Sim. 442; Taylor v. Taylor, 8 Hare, 120; Elliott v. Dearsley, 29 W. R. 494, 16 Ch. D. 322.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J. (after stating the provisions of the testator's will, and the other facts above mentioned), continued:—The right of the annuitants is plain to have the estate cleared and ascertained; they have a right, I think, to see that the testator's debts are paid off and discharged. When the mortgage has been dealt with in the way proposed, all the testator's debts will have been paid and discharged, subject to this observation, that, as regards the two leasehold theatres, the testator is the original lessee, and, therefore, his estate must remain liable for the payment of the rents reserved by, and the performance of the lessee's covenants contained in, those leases respectively.

Now it is proposed that the estate shall be further cleared for the benefit of the annuitants by selling the leases. But that will not really clear the estate any more than it will be cleared so soon as the mortgage to which I have referred to is made. The liability of the testator's estate in respect of the leases must necessarily continue until the leases have run out, or a surrender has been accepted by the landlords. That liability must continue, and, although, no doubt, the executor may be relieved from liability in respect of it, the liability of the estate must necessarily continue. It is impossible, by anything which is done now, to get rid of that liability, for no one has suggested that any application has been made to the lessors to release the testator's estate. This, of course, could only be done on terms.

Now the question is, whether, under these circumstances, the annuitants, who are entitled in law to a number of contingent legacies payable at the dates at which the successive instalments of their annuities become payable, are entitled to have the estate further cleared by the sale of these leasehold properties, or whether the proposal that security should be given for their annuities is one which I ought to adopt, it being obviously for the interest of the residuary legatees, who are absolutely entitled to the residue, subject to the annuities, to continue to receive the rents which these theatres produce. I say it is obviously for their interest; they say it is, and one can quite understand that it may be so.

Have, then, the annuitants a right to have these leaseholds sold? In my opinion they have not. Several cases were cited by the plaintiff's counsel, and I am not prepared to say that Mr. Everitt's comments on those cases other than In re Potter are not well founded. There are circumstances which distinguish those cases to some extent from the present. Then Mr. Everitt referred to two other cases as being authorities in his favour, but I do not think that I can derive much assistance from either of them. They are both very briefly reported. The first is Slanning v. Style. In that case the testator, "being seised in fee of some real estate," particularly a farm of £200 per annum (which he kept on his own hands), and possessed of a very plentiful personal estate, devised to his wife £30 per annum for her life charged on his real estate, and devised also to his wife an annuity of £40 per annum for the life of her mother charged upon the residue of his personal estate, payable quarterly," and subject to that, the residue of the personal estate was given to the testator's three sisters, who were married ladies, in equal shares. The question raised was as to the security which ought to be given for the annuity of £40. Nothing appears to have been said about the annuity of £30 which was charged on the real estate, whether it was considered hopeless to ask for security for that annuity or whether the parties were satisfied with the security I do not know. Security was asked for the £40 annuity, and the suggestion was that "as the personal estate was liable to be in a short time wasted (possibly by the husbands of the wives to whom the testator gave the residue)," therefore security ought to be given for the annuity. And it is to be noticed what was asked for: "Therefore it was insisted that the husbands of the wives should give some security for the payment of the same." I do not find that the court was asked to decide that the annuitant was entitled to have the property realized and invested in Consols, or something equivalent. There Lord Chancellor Talbot said: "Generally speaking, where the testator thinks fit to repose a trust in such case until some breach of that trust be shown, or at least a tendency thereto, the court will continue to intrust the same hand without calling for any further security than what the testator has required; but here the testator himself has charged the residue of his personal estate with this annuity which he intended should be duly and quarterly paid; and as this estate appears to consist of some bonds or securities, let such part thereof be brought before the master as may be sufficient to preserve this annuity of £40 per annum for the widow." That, as it seems to me, if it was a decision at all, was merely a decision that some bonds or securities forming part of the testator's personal estate were to be set aside for the purpose of securing the annuity. It certainly does not go the length of showing that an annuitant is entitled to have the personal estate converted and an amount sufficient to secure the annuity invested in Consols or other approved security. No conversion was directed, and, looking at the form of the relief which was asked, I cannot see that the Lord Chancellor decided that point one way or the other. Therefore, I cannot say that that case assists me at all in deciding the present case.

Then Fryer v. Buttar was referred to. But that, again, is an extremely meagre report, and, although I accept implicitly the decision, I am not satisfied how it was arrived at. The testator gave several legacies, and then he gave an annuity of £40 payable out of his stock of long annuities during the life of his servant, Mary Watson. Then he made a similar bequest to Mary Clarke, another servant, and he added, "in case of the death of the one or the other, the said Mary Watson or Mary Clarke, my will is that the survivor shall enjoy the annuity of the other as well as her own—that is, £80 a year—for her (the survivor's) life; and at the death of the survivor the principal out of which the whole of the annuity of £80 arose to go to my nearest of kin who may be then living. These annuities of £80 are to be secured at the decease of my wife on my stock of long annuities, and made payable to the said Mary Watson and Mary Clarke half-yearly." Then the residue was given to two persons mentioned. "The testator died possessed of £500 long annuities, and the question was whether £80 of the long annuities ought to be set apart to answer the annuities given to Mary Watson and Mary Clarke, in which case they would run the risk of the long annuities expiring in their lifetime, or whether their annuities were a charge upon the whole of the testator's long annuities." I take it, therefore, without knowing the dates, that the long annuities would very possibly expire before the deaths of the annuitants, and, if so, the appropriation of £80 long annuities would clearly not be sufficient to provide with certainty for the payment of the annuities. Then "the Vice-Chancellor held that a sum of £3 per cent. stock producing £80 a year ought to be purchased by money to be raised by sale of a sufficient part of the long annuities, and that the dividends of such stock ought to be paid to the annuitants and the survivor of them, and that the remainder of the long annuities fell into the testator's residuary estate," and the residuary legatees were entitled to it under the will. Then, again, I do not understand what the grounds were upon which the decision was arrived at. It was obvious that something more must be done than the setting apart of £80 long annuities. Moreover, the annuity was to be "payable out of the stock of long annuities," and whether there was an arrangement between the parties or a decision hostile to either party the report does not show. That case, therefore, does not give me much help in arriving at the principle which is to be followed in other cases, although it shows what the learned judge thought it right to do in the particular case with which he had to deal.

Now in the present case it is proposed, first of all, to appropriate the freehold theatres free from any other charge to the purpose of paying annuities. These freeholds produce at present a surplus income of £1,500 a year available to meet the £700 annuities. But that is not quite a fair statement of the case, because, in arriving at the £1,500, the interest, amounting to £247 10s., on the mortgage of £5,500 has been deducted. But as that mortgage will have been paid off from other sources, the clear income will be £247 10s. more—that is, over £1,700 a year. Now it is true that that income is produced by two theatres, and that a theatre is a somewhat speculative investment; but the experience of recent years, as appears by the affidavits, has shown that one theatre was built by the testator out of his own money, and the result is that from the land for which he pays a small rent he receives a very much larger rent.

Supposing that one of these theatres—say the theatre at Southampton—were unlet for a time, there would still be more than £1,100 a year available to meet the £700. If, on the other hand, the theatre at Hull were unlet for a time, the income from the other theatre alone available to pay annuities would be £629, which would be rather too little. But of course the other theatre itself would remain, even if it were not let, and upon the evidence I come to the conclusion that it is a very valuable property, although it might not fetch so much as if it were subject to a lease. I do not know whether it would or not, but sometimes if property is improving in value it might be all the better for the owner that it was not subject to a lease. But it seems to me what is proposed will give an ample security for the annuities.

Is there, then, any authority which justifies me in so treating it? I think the court in In re Potter, which was very like the present case, in principle took just the same view; and although I feel some doubt whether I should have applied the principle in the way in which it was then applied if I had been deciding that case, yet that does not affect the principle on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded. There are, however, two other cases which appear to me material on this point. The first is Webber v. Webber, 1 Sim. & S. 311. In that case the testator "gave to each of his daughters Sarah and Mary Elizabeth the sum of £10,000 on their respective marriages. And in case their mother should die before they were married, then after her decease he gave them an annuity of £1,200 to be equally divided between them so long as they both continued unmarried. And after the marriage or death of either of them after the death of their mother he gave to the other in lieu of her moiety of the annuities of £1,200 an annuity of £800 so long as she continued unmarried. Sarah, one of the daughters, married in the testator's lifetime. In November, 1796, the testator died leaving Sarah Webber, his widow, and his two daughters surviving. A suit having been instituted for the administration of the testator's personal estate, and the master having reported that all the testator's debts and legacies, except the £10,000 given to M. E. Webber, had been paid, and that £16,000 Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, part of the funds in the cause, were, according to the market price of such annuities on the day mentioned in his report, of the value of £10,000, that sum was carried over to Miss Webber's account, subject to the contingencies mentioned in the will concerning her legacy. On the 6th of May, 1819, Sarah Webber, the widow, died, upon which Miss Webber presented a petition insisting that, in the events that had happened, she was entitled under her father's will to an annuity of £800. Upon this petition an order was made directing two sums of £13,333 6s. 8d. bank annuities, part of the funds in the cause, to be appropriated to answer the annuity. Under these circumstances a petition was presented by some of the other parties to the suit submitting that, as Miss Webber could not be entitled both to the legacy and the annuity, the two sums of £13,333 6s. 8d. bank annuities would at all times be a sufficient fund to answer the legacy as well as the annuity, and therefore praying that the Accountant-General might be ordered to carry over the £16,000 bank annuities from Miss Webber's account to the credit of the cause generally; and that it might be decided that the two sums of £13,333 6s. 8d. bank annuities should be a fund for answering not only the annuity of £800 but also the legacy of £10,000.

Now, note the Vice-Chancellor's decision. "This legatee being entitled to receive a certain sum in money when the event of her marriage happens, her legacy is not capable of being secured by the present appropriation of any sum of stock. Let the residuary legatee receive the whole fund in court upon giving security to the satisfaction of the master for the payment of the legacy if the event happens. It may be secured upon land if he has land, or by a loan of money upon land." The whole fund, therefore, was ordered to be paid out upon that security being given.

That, as it seems to me, is a very strong authority in support of the view that the annuitants are not entitled to anything more than security for what is to come to them. I do not find that that case has ever been dissented from, and, indeed, it was expressly approved of by Turner, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor in King v. Malcott, 9 Hare, 692. In that case a lessor claimed security out of the estate of his deceased lessee for the payment of rent to accrue due and the performance of the lessee's covenants, the rent having always been duly paid down to the death of the lessee, and, there not having been any breach of the covenants, the Vice-Chancellor said:—"The case was likened in the argument to the case of contingent legatees. It was said that such legatees, and who, being volunteers, are not to be more favoured than creditors, have the right of retaining and impounding the assets of the testator. But every legatee has a present right, and the fund is impounded to answer the demand which exists, and is created by the will. The argument overlooks the difference between a contingent debt and a contingent legacy. A contingent legacy is separated from the assets, or secured, because it is a sum which in any event is certainly payable to some person, though it may be uncertain to whom it will become payable. But a contingent debt is a sum which it is altogether doubtful whether it will ever be taken out of the assets." I do not quite understand the distinction there taken between a debt and a legacy. I should have thought it was equally doubtful whether a contingent legacy would ever be taken out of the assets. However, the Vice-Chancellor goes on (and this is the important passage):—"Even in the case of a contingent legacy the legatee is not, as it was assumed at the bar, entitled to have a sum actually retained or appropriated to answer the legacy when the contingency arises. That is not an unusual way of providing for the legacy; but it is a matter of arrangement, not of right; and, in strictness, the legatee is only entitled to have security for the payment of the sum should the contingency arise. The case of Webber v. Webber illustrates the distinction."

These two cases seem to me to be very clear authorities on the point, and, therefore, I have only to see that a proper security is given for the payment of the annuities. I think the annuitants are entitled to have such a security as will make it practically certain that the annuities will be fully paid. Of course the appropriation of part of the assets will not release the rest of the estate. Recourse might still be had, if necessary, to the rest of the estate. But, in my opinion, the proposed appropriation of a mortgage upon the freehold estate, notwithstanding that it is theatrical property, will be an amply sufficient security.

But the residuary legatees have, in fact, offered more, and I see no reason why the annuitants should be deprived of what is offered to them. Therefore, I propose to make an order in the terms of the summons.

I should add that one very important feature in the case is the fact that the annuities have all been paid down to the present day; there is not a penny in arrear. If the annuities had fallen into arrear the result might have been very different.

Solicitors, A. C. Spaull; Collyer, Bristow, & Co.; Parker, Garrett, & Parker.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } June 20, 22; Aug. 7, 1889.

In re WELLS' TRUSTS.
HARDISTY v. WELLS. (a.)

Appointment — Revocation — Special power—Appointment by will—Subsequent appointment by deed containing power of revocation and new appointment—Date at which will takes effect—Contrary intention—Election—Wills Act, ss. 19, 23, 24, 27.

By a settlement dated in 1842, and made on the marriage of A. (then an infant) with B., A. and B. covenanted that, as soon as A. attained twenty-one, certain real estate of which she was tenant in tail, and certain personal estate to which she was entitled, should be conveyed and assigned to the trustees upon trust, after the death of A., for the children of the marriage as A. and B. by deed, or the survivor of them by deed, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by will, should appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for the children of the marriage in equal shares. B. also settled a policy of assurance upon his life upon the same trusts. The joint power was never exercised, and A. died in 1857. No disentailing assurance of her real estate had ever been executed, and, on her death, C., her eldest son, entered into possession thereof as heir in tail.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a deed dated in 1864, B., after reciting the death of A. without barring her estate tail, and that C. was her heir in tail, appointed all the funds comprised in the settlement other than the real estate to his four younger children, and reserved to himself a power of revocation and new appointment by deed or will. The trustees thereupon divided the funds, other than the moneys secured by the policy, equally among the four children.

By his will, dated in 1869, B., in express exercise of the power contained in the settlement of 1842, appointed certain specific sums to his children, including C., and the residue of the funds thereof to C.

By a deed dated in 1878, B., after reciting the deed of 1864 and the division of the trust funds, and that the only fund then subject to the trusts of the settlement was the policy-moneys, in exercise of the power reserved to him by the deed of 1864, revoked the appointment therein contained, and appointed the policy-moneys in equal fifths between his four surviving children, including C., and the children of his deceased daughter; and he again reserved to himself a power of revocation and new appointment.

By a deed dated in 1883, B. made the appointment to C. in the deed of 1874 irrevocable, and in 1888 he died.

Held, that B.'s will did not speak from his death so as to revoke the appointment by the deed of 1878, there being sufficient evidence of a "contrary intention" within section 24 of the Wills Act from the fact that the will was dated before that deed.

Held, also, that the will operated as to the one-fifth ineffectually appointed by the deed of 1878 to the children of the deceased daughter.

Held, further, that C. was not bound to elect as regards any interest taken by him under the deed of 1878, but that he was bound to elect as regards the real estate and any interest which might be coming to him under the will.

Adjourned summons.

By a settlement, dated the 31st of January, 1842, and made upon the marriage of the Rev. F. B. Wells and Jane R. F. Wells (then J. R. F. Hardisty and an infant), F. B. Wells as to his own acts and deeds and those of persons claiming under him, and J. R. F. Wells as to her own acts and deeds and those of persons claiming under her, covenanted that so soon as conveniently might be after the said J. R. F. Wells should have attained twenty-one years certain parts of the real estate, to which she was tenant in tail, and certain personal estate to which she was entitled should be conveyed and assigned to the trustees of the settlement upon the trusts thereinafter declared, and by the same indenture the said F. B. Wells assigned to the trustees of the settlement a policy of insurance on his life for the sum of £3,000, and the moneys thereby secured and which might become payable thereunder upon the same trusts. Those trusts, so far as they are material for the present report, were, after the death of Mrs. Wells, for all and every or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the children of the marriage as Mr. and Mrs. Wells should by deed appoint, and in default of such appointment then as the survivor of them "by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, to be given by him or her, sealed and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, or by his or her last will and testament in writing" should direct or appoint, and in default of such last-mentioned appointment in trust for all and every the children or child of the marriage who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or respectively marry under that age, equally to be divided between them.

The marriage was duly solemnized; no appointment was ever made in exercise of the joint power reserved to Mr. and Mrs. Wells, and Mrs. Wells died on the 5th of April, 1857. There were six children of the marriage—viz., Rose, who died an infant and unmarried in 1864, the defendant William Howley, the eldest son and heir-at-law of Mrs. Wells, Frances, who married in 1867 the defendant John Duncan Cameron, and died in 1871 intestate, leaving three children, who were still infants and were defendants, the defendant Francis John, and two other daughters who were defendants—viz., Mary Julia, who in 1886 married the defendant Charles Outen Fulbrook, and Charlotte Anne, who in 1871 married the defendant Martin Thomas Friend.

No disentailing deed of the shares of real estate by the settlement covenanted to be conveyed to the trustees thereof was ever executed by Mrs. Wells, and on her death the defendant W. H. Wells became entitled thereto as tenant in tail, and ever since her death he had been in possession thereof.

By a deed poll dated the 27th of July, 1864, under the hand and seal of F. B. Wells and duly attested, after reciting to the effect (inter alia) that Mrs. Wells had died without having barred her estate tail in the above mentioned parts or shares of real estate, and that the defendant W. H. Wells was her heir in tail, the said F. B. Wells, in exercise of the power contained in the settlement of the 31st of January, 1842, directed and appointed that all the trust funds and premises comprised in or subject to the trusts of the said settlement, other than the real estate of which the said J. R. F. Wells was tenant in tail (including therein the proceeds of sale of certain of such real estate which had been sold and the income thereof), should thenceforth remain and be in trust for such of them the said younger children—namely, Frances Wells, Mary Julia Wells, Charlotte Anne Wells, and Francis John Wells—as, being a son, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being daughters or a daughter, should attain such age or should respectively marry under that age, equally between them if more than one as tenants in common. And the deed provided that it should be lawful for the said F. B. Wells "by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, with or without power of revocation and new appointment to be made by him, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, or by his last will and testament in writing, or any writing in the nature thereof, or any codicil thereto," to revoke all or any of the trusts thereinbefore declared, and if the said F. B. Wells should choose so to do, but not otherwise by the same instrument to appoint or declare any new or other trusts for or for the benefit of some or one of the children of the marriage. In accordance with this deed poll the trustees divided the whole of the trust funds with the exception of the policy-moneys between the four children named therein, who thereupon severally granted releases to the trustees.

F. B. Wells duly made his last will, dated the 3rd of September, 1869, and thereby, after reciting that under the settlement made on his marriage with his late wife certain sums of money were settled upon certain trusts therein mentioned, and that the said settlement contained a power enabling him, either by deed or deeds executed as therein mentioned, or by his last will and testament, to appoint and dispose of the said trust funds between and amongst his children in such proportions as he should think proper, the testator directed and appointed as follows:—"Now I, in exercise and execution of the said power and of all other powers enabling me in that behalf, do by this my last will and testament direct, limit, and appoint that the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said settlement, shall pay, assign, and transfer the sum of £781 to my son, William Howley Wells, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of £650 to each of my daughters, Mary Julia Wells and Charlotte Anne Wells, and the sum of £1,100 to my son, Francis John Wells, and I further appoint the residue of the said trust funds to and in favour of my son, the said William Howley Wells, his executors, administrators, and assigns."

By a second deed poll, duly executed and dated the 15th of March, 1878, after reciting (inter alia) the deed poll of the 27th of July, 1864, the death of Mrs. Cameron, leaving three children, the division as above-mentioned amongst the four children named therein, and that the only fund then remaining subject to the trusts of the settlement of the 31st of January, 1842, was the sum of £3,000 secured by the policy on his life, and the bonuses thereon, F. B. Wells, in exercise of the power by the deed poll of the 27th of July, 1864, reserved to him, and of every other power, revoked, determined, and made void the appointment in the last-mentioned deed poll contained, and the trusts and provisions in the same deed poll declared concerning the trust funds and premises thereby appointed, and in further exercise of the power by the same deed given to him and of every other power, directed and appointed that the sum of £3,000 to become payable under the said policy should be held by the trustees of the settlement upon trust to pay one-fifth part to the defendant William Howley Wells, one other fifth part to the defendant Mary Julia Fulbrook, one other fifth part to the defendant Charlotte Anne Friend, one other fifth part to the defendant Francis John Wells, and that the said trustees should hold the remaining one-fifth part in trust for the three children of the said Frances Cameron in manner therein mentioned; and, secondly, that all bonuses in respect of the said policy should be paid to the defendant William Howley Wells. And by the deed poll now in statement it was provided that it should be lawful for the said F. B. Wells, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, to be executed as therein mentioned, or by his will and testament or any codicil thereto to revoke all or any of the trusts therein-before directed, and to appoint or declare any new or other trusts to or for the benefit of some or one of his children of and concerning the premises, the trusts thereof should be so revoked.

By a deed poll duly executed and dated the 17th of November, 1888, F. B. Wells released the appointment made by the deed of the 15th of March, 1878, in favour of William Howley Wells from the power of revocation and new appointment therein contained, and directed and appointed that the appointment by the deed poll of the 15th of March, 1878, made in favour of William Howley Wells, should be final and irrevocable, and take effect accordingly; and it was declared that nothing therein contained should prejudice or affect the power of revocation and new appointment contained in the deed poll of the 15th of March, 1878, so far as the same extended to appointments thereby made other than that made in favour of William Howley Wells.

F. B. Wells died on the 21st of March, 1888, and his will was proved on the 24th of July, 1888.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executors of the last surviving trustee of the settlement of 1842 to obtain the opinion of the court as to who were the persons entitled to the funds remaining subject to the trusts of the settlement, and in what shares and proportions.

Buckley, Q.C., and H. King, for the plaintiffs.

Hastings, Q.C., and Prior, for the defendant W. H. Wells, submitted that in any event the will operated as to the one-fifth share appointed by the deed of 1878 to Mrs. Cameron's children, who were not objects of the power, and that no case of election was raised against W. H. Wells.

Warrington, for Francis J. Wells.—The will operated as a new appointment of the funds, notwithstanding the deed of 1878, except as regards so much thereof as was irrevocably appointed to W. H. Wells.

He referred to Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 290; Airey v. Bower, 35 W. R. 657, 12 App. Cas. 263; Wills Act, s. 24.

Fellows, for the trustees of Mr. and Mrs. Cameron's settlement, and for the infant children of the marriage, admitted the infant children of Mr. and Mrs. Cameron, not being objects of the power, could not take under the deed of 1878, but contended that W. H. Wells was put to his election whether he would take the real estate or under the will.

Methold, for Mr. and Mrs. Pulbrook, and Mr. and Mrs. Friend, and their trustees, contended that it was essential to the valid exercise of a power of revocation that there should be an intention to revoke a subsisting appointment: Pomfret v. Perring, 3 W. R. 81, 5 De G. M. & G. 775; Griffiths v. Gale, 12 Sim. 354. As regards the operation of the Wills Act, there was a distinction between a special and general power: In re Ruding's Settlement, 20 W. R. 936, L. R. 14 Eq. 266.

Warrington, in reply.—In re Ruding's Settlement was overruled in Boyes v. Cook, 28 W. R. 754, 14 Ch. D. 53, and In re Clarke's Estate, Maddick v. Marks, 28 W. R. 753, 14 Ch. D. 422.

He also referred to Cooper v. Martin, 16 W. R. 234, L. R. 3 Ch. 47.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply, upon the question of election, referred to In re Vardon's Trusts, 34 W. R. 185, 31 Ch. D. 275.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 7.—Stirling, J. (stated the facts and continued:—).—The first question is whether the will of 1869 executed the power of revocation contained in the subsequent deed poll of the 15th of March, 1878. The argument in support of the contention that it did, is based on two propositions—first, that if the will had borne date subsequent to the deed poll, it would have operated as an execution of the power of revocation and new appointment; secondly, that by virtue of section 24 of the Wills Act, the will, though dated before the deed poll, speaks from the death of the testator, and has the same effect as if it had been dated subsequently to that deed.

Now, as to the first proposition, the case of Pomfret v. Perring establishes that an instrument which exercises a power of revocation and new appointment must show, not merely an intention to appoint, but an intention to revoke the subsisting appointment. In that case the donee of a special power under a settlement to be exercised by deed or will partially exercised it by deed, reserving a power of revocation. Afterwards the donee made a will, and, by virtue of every power contained in the settlement "or otherwise howsoever" appointed all the real and personal estate which under the settlement, "or otherwise," she had power to appoint, and it was held that the will operated on the unappointed part only, and was not an exercise of the power of revocation and new appointment. In that case Knight Bruce, L.J., said (at p. 780):—"I apprehend that it is not according to the true import or correct interpretation of the words used by the testatrix to say that they exhibit of themselves an intention to exercise a power of revocation. But if the will shows an intention to have existed, which, without so construing them, cannot be effectuated, they may certainly be so construed. I conceive, however, that the will here does not show such an intention. Every word of the instrument may, in my opinion, be satisfied without ascribing to the testatrix any idea of dealing with the power of revocation or the property subjected to it." Then Turner, L.J., said :—"Here an actual appointment has been made with a power of revocation, and that appointment was to be undone before the power of new appointment would arise. To show that a power of this description has been exercised it is not, I think, enough to show an intention to appoint. An intention to revoke the former appointment ought, I think, also to be shown. The principles acted on in other cases with respect to the exercise of powers seem to me to apply to this. If a person has an interest in one subject and a power over another, and uses general words of disposition only, those words will not operate as an exercise of the power. It is otherwise when he has no interest, but only a power. The same principle must, I think, apply to a case where a person has a power of appointment and also a power of revocation and new appointment. The general words of appointment ought not to be held to be an exercise of the power of revocation. If there was no power except one of revocation and new appointment it would be different, and the general words would be then held to be an exercise of that power. I think it clear that an intention must be shown to revoke and undo what has been already done." It appears, therefore, that, in the words of Turner, L.J., "the intention to revoke and undo what has been already done" may either appear by the express terms of the instrument, or be inferred from the circumstances that the will would otherwise be ineffectual. This agrees with what is laid down by Lord St. Leonards in the passage cited from his treatise on Powers (see Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., at p. 290), and by Lord Cairns in Cooper v. Martin. The foundation, however, for such inference is this: that no other explanation can be given of the language used by the donee of the power. In the present case, if the will of 1869 had borne date subsequently to the deed poll of 1878, I am unable to see how effect could be given to it except by means of an exercise of the power of revocation contained in the deed poll; and, consequently, I think that, in that event, the intention to exercise that power might have been inferred. In my opinion, therefore, the first of the two propositions is well founded.

The second proposition assumes that section 24 applies to wills made in the exercise of a special power of appointment, such as is contained in the settlement of 1842. Now that power is one of selection and distribution. The property affected by it is vested in the trustees of the settlement. The office of a will made in exercise of the power is, not to pass that property, but to indicate to the trustees which of the children of the marriage are to enjoy the property beneficially, and in what shares, and for what interests; and the will operates and takes effect by being read into and becoming part of the settlement.

The question then arises whether such a will can be said to "comprise" the property subject to the trusts of the settlement. I have been unable to find any decision which enables me to answer that question either way. Certainly the cases of Boyes v. Cook and Airey v. Bower, which were referred to in the argument, do not cover the point. Both of them relate to general powers of appointment. They establish that a will containing a general devise or bequest operates (unless a contrary intention appears by the will) as an exercise of a general power of appointment created (even by the testator himself) subsequently to the date of the will; but this conclusion does not rest on section 24 of the Wills Act alone, it is arrived at through the combined operation of sections 24 and 27. Now the language of section 27 is remarkable. It relates to general powers, and provides that "a general devise of the real estate of the testator, or of the real estate of the testator in any place or in the occupation of any person mentioned in his will, or otherwise described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any real estate, or any real estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will: and in like manner a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be) which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." It was thought necessary, therefore, to provide, not merely that the general devise or bequest should operate as an exercise of the power, but that it should be construed to "include" (which seems to be equivalent in meaning to "comprise") the real or personal estate subject to the power.

This seems to have been done for the purpose of making section 24 applicable. In Airey v. Bower the Lord Chancellor appears to allude to this when he speaks of the Legislature having provided that a general power of appointment should be treated as the property of the testator. None of this reasoning applies to special powers. It is, however, unnecessary in this case to decide whether section 24 applies to a will made in exercise of a special power such as exists in the settlement of 1842; for I have come to the conclusion that even if it does, still the consequences sought to be deduced do not follow. The question, it is to be borne in mind, is whether the testator has shown an intention, not merely to appoint the fund, but also to revoke an appointment actually made. Apart from the section of the Wills Act, no such intention could be inferred where the will bears a date prior to that of the instrument which reserves the power of revocation. Section 24 provides that "every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." That is a very different thing from saying that the will is for all purposes to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator. The question is one of intention and of intention to undo what has been done; and, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention, I am entitled to look, not merely at the part of the will which immediately deals with the subject-matter, but also at any other part of the instrument, including the date; and the date appears to me to show decisively that no intention to undo what was only done at a subsequent time can be attributed to the testator, and that his language is to be ascribed to a totally different cause. In my judgment the terms of the section are not such as to compel me to impute to the testator an intention which manifestly never existed in fact. I am of opinion, therefore, that the will of 1869 does not operate to revoke the deed poll of 1878. That deed, however, purports to appoint one-fifth of the fund to the children of Mrs. Cameron, being grandchildren of the testator; and as the power only authorizes an appointment to children of the testator, the deed is, to this extent, ineffectual.

The next question is as to what becomes of this one-fifth share? Now the deed poll of 1878, though it removes four-fifths of the fund from the operation of the will of 1869, does not purport to revoke that will, and although it can hardly be doubted that the testator, had he known the true effect of the deed of 1878, would have made some other disposition of the remaining one-fifth, yet section 19 of the Wills Act provides that "no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances." It was hardly disputed, and I think properly, that as to this one-fifth the will of 1869 remains in force, and that that share of the fund must go and devolve accordingly.

There still remains the question whether William Howley Wells, the eldest son and heir-in-tail of Mrs. Wells, is bound to elect between the real estate which devolved on him as such heir-in-tail and the benefits coming to him under the deed poll of 1878 and the will of the testator.

Now the general intention of the author of every instrument is, no doubt, presumed to be that effect shall be given to every part of it, but such intention, to use the words of Fry, L.J., in In re Vardon's Trusts, "may be repelled by the declaration in the instrument itself of a particular intention, inconsistent with the presumed and general intention"; and such particular intention may obviously repel the general intention either wholly or in part. In the present case there is not to be found in the settlement of 1842 any indication of a particular intention inconsistent with the general and presumed intention. Under that deed, however, F. B. Wells, in the events which happened, had power to appoint the property subject to the settlement among the children of the marriage. It was open to him, I apprehend, expressly to direct that the benefits conferred by any appointment on W. H. Wells should be in addition to those taken by him as heir-in-tail of his mother; and such express directions, if actually given, would, on the principle of In re Vardon's Trusts, have excluded the doctrine of election. No express direction is to be found in the deed poll of 1878, and the question is whether a like intention is not to be inferred.

Now, by the deed poll of 1864, the testator took notice that the real estate covenanted by Mrs. Wells to be settled had devolved on W. H. Wells as her heir-in-tail; and he made an appointment under which W. H. Wells took no interest; and, on the footing of this appointment, a considerable portion of the trust funds was distributed. By the deed poll of 1878 the testator took notice of the deed poll of 1864 and the distributions made in pursuance of it, and it is then recited "that the only fund now remaining subject" to the trusts of the settlement was the sum of £3,000 secured by the policy, and upon that footing he proceeds to revoke the deed of 1864, and to make a fresh appointment under which W. H. Wells took a share of the policy-moneys, together with all the bonuses. I think the meaning of that is that what had previously been taken by W. H. Wells, as well as by the other children, was to remain undisturbed, and, consequently, that the appointor has shown that particular intention which is sufficient to override the "presumed and general intention" so far as relates to any benefits derived by W. H. Wells under the deed poll of 1878. No such inference, however, can, as I think, be drawn with reference to the benefits derived by him under the will of 1869, which takes effect by the operation of law, and independently of the intention of the appointor.

I think, therefore, that W. H. Wells is not bound to elect as regards any interest taken by him under the deed poll of 1878, but that he is bound to elect as regards any interest which may be coming to him under the will of 1869.

Solicitors, Hardisty, Rhodes, & Hardisty; Vallance & Vallance.

Chan. Div.)
Kekewich, J.) July 5, 1889.

Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co. (a.)

Patent—Action to restrain threats—Cross-action for infringement—Costs—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

A solicitor's letter saying that proceedings will be instituted is a threat within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

The action pointed at by the section is an action by the patentee against the person whom he has threatened, not against any other person who may be infringing.

In an action to restrain threats the defendant is not bound to assert his rights by defence or counter-claim, but is entitled to bring a separate action for the alleged infringement of his patent; but, if he does so, arrangements ought to be made so that the proceedings in one action should be stayed to abide the result of the trial in the other.

A. commenced an action under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, against B. to restrain threats. B., within ten days, brought a cross-action against A. for infringing his patent. After pleadings had been delivered and notice of trial given in both actions, A. offered to stay his action for threats until B.'s action was concluded, but B. refused, and forced A. to proceed, and both actions came on together for trial. B.'s action having been dismissed, with costs,

Held, (1) that, on the true construction of the section, A.'s right of action was taken away by B. having, within a reasonable time, commenced and prosecuted with due diligence his cross-action for infringement; and (2) in consequence, A.'s action must be dismissed, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

Both the plaintiffs and defendants were proprietors of patents for improvements in weighing machines. The defendant company instructed their solicitors to write to the plaintiffs a letter, dated the 21st of September, 1887, of which the following are the material parts:—

"We are instructed by the Automatic Weighing Machine Co. (Limited) to write to you on the subject as to an automatic weighing machine exhibited by you at the Bodega, Bucklersbury, and elsewhere, which our clients state is an infringement of their patent.

"We have, therefore, to inform you that, unless such machines are at once withdrawn from public exhibition and destroyed, and unless you undertake that no more shall be manufactured, we are further instructed to commence proceedings for an injunction to restrain you from infringing our clients' patent and for damages. We shall be glad to hear from you at your early convenience, and, in the event of your refusal to comply with our clients' demands, be good enough to send us the names of your solicitors, who will accept service of process."

The plaintiffs' secretary replied:—

"Your letter of yesterday's date received, which will be brought before the directors at our next meeting, and their decision shall be forwarded to you."

The plaintiffs thereupon at once, on the 27th of September, 1887, issued the writ in this action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from representing or asserting that the plaintiffs were infringing their patent.

On the 30th of September, 1887, the defendants commenced a cross-action against the plaintiffs, asserting the validity of their patent and claiming an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from infringing the same and consequential relief.

(a.) Reported by C. Herbert Brown, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pleadings in both actions were delivered, and, on the 22nd of March, 1888, the plaintiffs set down the defendants' cross-action for trial; and, on the 27th of April, 1888, offered to stay all further proceedings in their action until the defendants' cross-action was concluded; but the defendants refused to allow that course, and, by notice dated the 2nd of May, 1888, threatened to apply to dismiss the plaintiffs' action for want of prosecution if it were not proceeded with. The plaintiffs accordingly, though urging that every point in their action was covered by the defendants' cross-action, set down their action for trial, and gave notice that they would ask for the costs occasioned thereby.

On the 11th of January, 1889, both actions came on together for trial before Kekewich, J., when his lordship held that the plaintiffs had infringed the defendants' patent, and gave judgment for the defendants in their cross-action against the plaintiffs, and accordingly this action, which was only formally opened, was dismissed, with costs.

On the 3rd of May the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Kekewich, J., in the defendants' cross-action, and dismissed it, with costs, and remitted this action to his lordship to be dealt with as he might think fit, the costs in the appeal to be costs in the action.

The action now came on to be heard.

Warmington, Q.C., Morton Daniel, and Firminger, for the plaintiffs.—The result of the defendants' threats has been to paralyze our business so far, and, unless the defendants come within the proviso of section 32 in the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, we are entitled to restrain their threats by injunction, and to an inquiry as to damages. The intention of the Act was to prevent the injury caused by threats. The proviso does not mean that if the person making threats brings an action at any time he will be protected. Our action was the first, and the proviso does not apply to this case, because the defendants did not bring and prosecute their action with due diligence: Challender v. Royle, 36 W. R. 357, 36 Ch. D. 425. Further, the defendants have caused unnecessary litigation and expense. All the questions in their action could have been raised by way of defence or counter-claim to our action. They forced us on when we offered to stay proceedings. We ought, therefore, to have the costs of this action.

Aston, Q.C., Neville, Q.C., and R. Griffin, for the defendants.—Under the old law a patentee was within his right in issuing threats: Halsey v. Brotherhood, 30 W. R. 279, 19 Ch. D. 386. Section 32 of the Act of 1883 renders him liable for his threats if he does not commence an action with due diligence. When we sent the letter we had already commenced an action against one Knight for infringing our patent. Our so-called threats were the commencement of proceedings. There was no want of diligence on our part. Their writ was issued whilst we were waiting for a reply from their directors, which was a device to mislead us. A solicitor's letter is not a threat within section 32. Lastly, the plaintiffs cannot complain of our having forced them on. They ought to have stopped their action directly we issued our writ. But they waited until all the pleadings and particulars of objections had been delivered and heavy costs incurred and notice of trial given, and then they make their offer. But it was then too late.

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

Kekewich, J.—This is a case of some importance to all who are interested in patented inventions, and it is the more important because it not only touches some of the questions already decided on the 32nd section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, but raises others entirely new. The section is a legislative puzzle, and I am not sure that it can be properly solved without the assistance of Parliament. I cannot conceal from myself the probability that the Legislature has failed to express what was intended, but I do not propose to guess at what was intended. It is my duty merely to construe the section. The one thing to remark on this section, which is of a general character, is that it creates a new remedy. That is to say, before 1883 it was within the right of a patentee honestly—that is to say, without doing anything improper—to threaten with legal proceedings a person whom he thought to be infringing his patent. Now the Act of 1883, by this section, provides that those threats shall give a right of action. The party aggrieved may commence an action, and succeed in that action, provided certain terms are complied with. That is a new remedy. It creates a new right of action. This is the clue to the construction of the section.

The first point to be considered is, was what was done in this case a threat within the meaning of the section? The section says, "Where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention," and there is no doubt the defendants here were claiming to be patentees, "by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise, threatens any other person with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of any alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention" that shall give a right of action, and it is argued that that does not apply to a solicitor's letter to the offender telling him that unless he withdraws his manufacture from the market, or otherwise complies with the patentee's just demands, legal proceedings will be commenced against him. It was not suggested that the patentee personally must act, and he could not have very well done so in this case, because the owners of the patent were a corporation. Therefore, apart from that there can be no doubt that the patentee may do it by an agent, and if by an agent why not by a solicitor as well as by any other agent? But a solicitor's letter saying proceedings will be instituted is said not to be a threat. But for the argument I should have been under the impression that legal proceedings could not have been threatened in a more direct or unmistakeable manner than by a letter from the solicitor stating that he will issue a writ against you. I think that is a sufficient answer to this objection. As to the damages which might be recovered in such an action, in the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary for me to determine that question. As to the proviso introduced modifying language which otherwise might, I think, have been reasonably plain, it really introduces the whole difficulty, and I think it may assist the construction of the clause if I were to read the proviso into a different part of the section. The section might have said, altering the construction, "Where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention, and not with due negligence commencing and prosecuting an action for infringement of his patent by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise," &c., and that seems to me what must be the meaning of the proviso. It is said that a man does not commence an action for infringement of his patent if, having a patent which is imitated in many different ways, he threatens one man, and commences an action against another, and still more so if he threatens a man who is alleged to have infringed his patent in one way and commences an action against a man who is infringing his patent in an entirely different way.

In this case the defendants in this action were plaintiffs in an action for establishing their patent and restraining infringement against one Knight, and that action was pending at the time the threats which were in question here were made, and they contended that they had commenced an action for the infringement of their patent. I cannot think that the Legislature intended anything of that kind. Such an intention would seem to me to be utterly at variance with the language used in the Act. I think the plain meaning of the language is that the action referred to must mean an action for infringement against the same manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats relate. I do not understand either of the Lords Justices in Challender v. Royle to have so decided, though I think the language of both points that way. Cotton, L.J., says: "In my opinion the proviso is satisfied if an action to test the validity of the patent or the fact of infringement is honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person, or any of the persons, to whom the threats have been made." And Bowen, L.J., after having said something to the same effect, says: "I do not express any opinion as to whether any other sort of action would or would not satisfy the proviso." Now I can quite understand it being held that if the patentee commences an action against a man who is selling or manufacturing precisely the same article which is manufactured or sold by the threatened person, that might do. But the Lords Justices do not suggest that an action against an infringer of a different character would meet the proviso. It is said that the defendants here, in commencing an action against Knight, were endeavouring to establish the validity of their patent. That might be quite true, but if the Legislature meant this to be sufficient it could easily have said so in plain terms, which it has not done. It says "if he commences an action for the infringement of his patent." It is true that in an action for infringement the question of validity is generally raised. The Legislature has said it shall be an action for infringement. I think that means infringement of the same character as that which is threatened.

Now the real difficulty in this case is that, the threats having been made, they were not followed up within nine days by an action to prevent the particular infringement. In the meantime the action for restraining the threats had been commenced. Mr. Aston does not hesitate to say that that was a trick, and ought not to be regarded as an honest action. I do not agree. Assuming, for argument, that there was a want of courtesy on the part of the solicitors in the matter, they might quite properly have advised their clients that they had better at once commence an action under this 32nd section to restrain the threats. The plaintiffs in the action for threats might have thought that they were right, and that the patent was bad, or the infringement could not be proved, and that the sooner they stopped the threats and prevented the paralysis of their trade the better. On the other hand it seems to be impossible, even apart from authority, to hold that the patentees did not commence their action with due diligence when they commenced it within the fortnight after the threats were made.

I am therefore left in a difficult position. I find a plaintiff properly commencing his action and exercising the right which is given him by Act of Parliament at the time of issuing his writ, then possibly, if one construction of the Act should prevail, defeated by something entirely future which happens after his action is commenced, so that what was right on the 27th of September becomes wrong on the 30th. The right of action given by the Legislature and properly exercised at the time is apparently on that construction taken away by the Legislature three days afterwards. It is a serious conclusion to arrive at, but if the Legislature has so said I must adopt the Legislature's express meaning. How has the Legislature so said? Having given that right of action the section says: "It shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences an action for infringement of his patent." I hold that he has commenced his action with due diligence, and it is an action for infringement, and under those circumstances it follows that this section does not apply. It is a strange result, but the language, to my mind, is perfectly plain. It has given with one hand a right of action and taken it away with the other. Because if my view is correct a man may wait any reasonable time—and it is impossible to lay down any fixed rule, three months having been held to be a reasonable time—to see what is likely to come of the action founded on his threats look up a little more carefully than he has hitherto done the question of the validity of the patent and the details of infringement and so forth, and may within such reasonable time commence his action for infringement, and say: "You were right till this morning, but now you are wrong. I have commenced an action with due diligence and there is an end of your case." Such seems to me to be the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

Now, as regards the question of prosecution, there is one fact and one fact only which is of any importance in this case. I do not pause to guess why the Legislature put in those words "with due diligence commences and prosecutes," because when once an action has been commenced the defendant is able, if he is so minded, to press the plaintiff on, and if the defendant is satisfied that he is right, or if there is any urgent reason for having the action disposed of, he can at any rate do it sufficiently to prevent the action being dropped altogether, and prevent the result which would otherwise follow on his own action being got rid of. The Legislature has recognized the duty of the patentee not only to commence but to prosecute with due diligence. It seems at a certain date the defendants had set down the action for infringement for trial, and I recognize all that Mr. Warmington says on that point. I think primâ facie if you find an action set down by the defendant that is evidence, and cogent evidence, that the plaintiff has not prosecuted his action with due diligence. But when I look into the dates and see what occurred, I find that the defendants in the infringement action had been obliged to give, not only once, but for a second time, further and better particulars of their objections to the patentee, and though I think that the plaintiffs in that case might with propriety have taken a somewhat different course from what they did take as regards procedure, and delayed the setting down, still I do not think it would be right to allow the defendants, who were in default as regards their own particulars, to take advantage of the few days' delay in setting down the action for trial. I cannot hold that there has been any want of due diligence in the prosecution of that action. My conclusion, therefore, on the construction, is that there were threats within the meaning of the section, that there was a proper action to restrain those threats, and that that right of action has been barred by the operation of the proviso, an action for infringement having been commenced and prosecuted with due diligence. This, therefore, is a decision against the plaintiffs here. Then I have to consider the question of costs. The Court of Appeal has left it to me. I have now here all the facts before me necessary for giving a decision. It is impossible to say that a patentee is bound to try the question of infringement with validity and so forth, by a counter-claim, but I think that, where there is an action to restrain threats, if the patentee does not choose to try the question in that way he ought at any rate to attempt to stay the action and offer terms to get rid of the action founded on the threats. I think that the course that the patentees have taken here has been to oblige the plaintiffs in the threats action to go on. Letters have been read to me which showed that that was their intention, that they insisted upon having that action set down for trial and disposed of, and the plaintiffs in the threats action are brought here because they so insisted. I think that is entirely their own fault, and if I could with propriety make them pay the costs I should be disposed to do so. I cannot do that. I dismiss the action, but I shall certainly dismiss it without costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Perkins & Sawyer.

Solicitors for the defendants, Adam Burn & Son.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) — Dec. 10.

REG. v. HOLT (VICE-REGISTRAR OF THE OFFICE OF LAND REGISTRY). (a.)

Local government — Land charges — Registration — Sanitary authority — Expenses charged on premises — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 257—Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 51), ss. 4, 10.

Expenses incurred in respect of premises by a local authority in carrying out the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the repayment of which the owner of the premises is liable, are, by section 257 of that Act, made "a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

Held, that such charges are not "land charges" within the meaning of the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, and do not require registration.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained on behalf of the Corporation of Nottingham for a mandamus directing the vice-registrar of the Office of Land Registry to register two charges on land. The two charges in question had been made under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, upon houses situate in Blake-street and Montpelier-road, Nottingham, in respect of which houses expenses had been incurred by the corporation as urban sanitary authority.

The expenses were of a kind for the repayment whereof, with interest, the owner of the houses is made liable under the Act, and section 257 provides that in such a case "until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

A question arose as to whether such charges required registration under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, in order to preserve their priority over subsequent registered charges. In order to have this question decided the corporation obtained this rule, but as they did not desire to have the necessity for registration established, they appeared by counsel, not in support of, but in opposition to, the granting of the mandamus.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., and Griffin, showed cause.—The definition of "land charge" in section 4 of the Act of 1888 must be limited by sections 10—13, and so read it cannot include these charges. They are not created pursuant to an application by the owner of the land, as is the case with charges under the Drainage and Improvement of Land Acts. It is charges made pursuant to such applications which are alone contemplated by section 10. The Act is not applicable to charges like these, which are made in invitum. These charges are really "improvement rates," and in many cases it would be impossible to register them. The rules as to registration made under section 18 of the Act could not be complied with: see rule 4, form 3, in schedule.

R. S. Wright, for the corporation.—We have obtained this rule as the only means of getting this question decided, but we are entitled to be heard in opposition to it: R. v. Postmaster-General, 1 Q. B. D. 658, 24 W. R. Dig. 294. The matter is one of great importance to all sanitary authorities, for the expenses of registering these very minute charges would be very great. In Nottingham the mere fees for registration, without any professional charges, would, it is estimated, amount to £250 per annum. These charges are sometimes intermittent, their existence depending on whether or not the premises are occupied. Such charges could not be registered, and it was not the intention of the Legislature that they should be.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The argument in this case has been all on one side, and it was difficult to see the object against which it was directed. We have come to the conclusion that the rule should be discharged. The definition of "land charge" in section 4 of the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, is wide enough, with perhaps a little straining, to include these charges under the Public Health Act, 1875. But if you look at the later sections, which explain what kind of land charges are to be registered, and exclude what they do not include, it appears to me that these charges are not within the Act. In the proviso to section 10 reference is made to "the person by or on behalf of whom the application was made pursuant to which the land charge was created." Now this implies that no land charge is to be registered except one created in pursuance of an application. These are not such charges, and though, looking at section 4, one might think that they were included, yet when one looks at section 10, which is the real registration clause of the Act, it is plain that they are not within the scope of the Act, and do not require registration. The rule must be discharged.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

Solicitor for the vice-registrar, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Solicitors for the corporation, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchard, & Sharpe, for S. G. Johnson, Nottingham.

Q. B. Div. (Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J.) — Nov. 28, 29.

STEVENS v. HOUNSLOW BURIAL BOARD. (a.)

Contract — Corporation — Contract under seal — Extra work — Right to recover — Metropolitan Burials Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), ss. 24, 31—County court practice — Transfer of action — Payment into court — Time — Return day — County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 107, 186—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1).

A builder had entered into a contract with a burial board under the seal of the board for the execution of certain repairs to the buildings at the board's cemetery; the repairs to be done and the terms upon which they were to be done were specified in the contract. Further repairs were necessary, and were executed by the builder at the instance of the board's surveyor, and approved by him when done.

Held, by Fry, L.J. (Mathew, J., dissenting), that the builder was not entitled to recover in respect of these further repairs, there being no contract under seal as to them.

A summons was issued in a county court on the 14*th of March; the return day was the* 12*th of April; on the* 1*st of April the action was transferred to another county court, where the return day was the* 15*th of April. The* defendants paid money into court under County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1), on the 8th of April.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the return day was the 15th of April, not the 12th of April, and that the payment in was made five clear days before the return day within the meaning of the rule.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of his Honour Judge Stonor, the judge of the Marylebone County Court, under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff was a builder and the defendants a burial board subject to the provisions of the Burials Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134), which, by section 7, incorporates sections 10—42 of the Metropolitan Burials Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85). Certain repairs to the buildings at the defendants' cemetery being required, a written contract, under the seal of the board, was entered into on the 5th of September, 1888, between the defendants and the plaintiff for the carrying out of the repairs (which were specified in a schedule) for the sum of £38. As the work went on it became evident that some further repairs were necessary, and at the instance of the defendants' surveyor the plaintiff carried out these repairs also; these repairs are referred to in this report as "extras"; they were inspected and approved by the surveyor when they were completed. The plaintiff sued the defendants in the county court for a sum alleged to be due under the written contract and for the work done in respect of the extras. The judge held that £10 was due under the contract, and that £11 was the value of the extras, but in respect of the extras he disallowed the plaintiff's claim on the ground that, there being no contract under seal as to them, he was not entitled to recover. The plaintiff appealed.

There was a cross appeal by the defendants from a decision of the county court judge that a payment into court by the defendants in respect of the work done under the contract was not made five clear days before the return day, and that the defendants were bound to pay the plaintiff's costs occasioned by their default. The facts relating to the cross appeal were as follows. The action was commenced in the Brentford County Court by summons issued on the 14th of March, 1889, returnable on the 12th of April. On the 1st of April the action was transferred to the Marylebone County Court, the return day in that court being the 15th of April; the payment into court was made on the 8th of April. The county court judge held that the "return day" within the meaning of ord. 9, r. 11 (1), of the County Court Rules, 1889, was the 12th of April and not the 15th of April, and that the payment in was too late, not having been made five clear days before the return day.

Lowe, for the plaintiff.—The rule that a corporation can only contract under its seal is subject to two exceptions, and the present case falls under both: (1) where the contract deals with small matters of such frequent occurrence that a written contract in respect of them would be highly inconvenient; (2) where the corporation has taken the benefit of the contract they cannot be heard to say that it does not bind them.

He referred to Haigh v. Guardians of North Brierley Union, 6 W. R. 679; Hunt v. Wimbledon Local Board, 26 W. R. 830, 3 C. P. D. 208; Nicholas v. Guardians of Bradfield Union, 14 W. R. 731, L. R. 1 Q. B. 620.

Yelverton.—These extras to a builder's contract are not within the exception as to small matters: Homersham v. Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., 6 Ex. 137; Lamprell v. Guardians of Billericay Union, 3 Ex. 283. The burial board represents the ratepayers, and cannot go outside the Act.

He referred to sections 24 and 31 of the Act of 1852.

Lowe replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The defendants' cross appeal was then argued, the contention on the part of the plaintiff being that, upon the true construction of section 186 of the County Courts Act, 1888, "return day" meant the day originally appointed for the hearing at the Brentford County Court—i.e., the 12th and not the 15th of April—and that the payment in was too late. A question was also raised as to the sufficiency of the amount paid in to meet the plaintiff's claim under the written contract.

NOV. 29.—FRY, L.J.—The plaintiff in this case, who is a builder, sues the defendants, the Hounslow Burial Board, for moneys alleged to be due under a contract made under the seal of the board, and in respect of extra work which has been certified by their surveyor. The learned judge of the county court has found that the value of the work is £10 for that which is the subject of the contract, and £11 for the extras, and as to the extras he has held that the defendants are not liable, because there is no contract under seal in respect of them. The law which governs this case is to be found in the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, and the two important sections are section 24 and section 31, which latter section makes special provisions as to contracts entered into by burial boards. [His lordship read the section.] The subject-matter of the contracts is there described, and it is to be remarked that the words, "for executing and doing any other works and things necessary for the purposes of this Act," are very wide and general words. There are four requisites which are to be specified in all these contracts—viz., the works to be done, the prices, the times of completion, and the penalties for non-performance; and the contracts are to be entered in the books of the board. Now the scope and object of these provisions is to prevent facilities for entering into contracts which might lead to what is known as "jobbery." The proviso as to advertising contracts above the value of £100 was inserted for the same purpose. The circumstances here are these. The burial board had chapels and a lodge in their cemetery and walls which enclosed it, and they thought that these were in want of repair and redecoration. They therefore had prepared a specification of the work required to be done, and they advertised this specification. On the 5th of September, 1888, they entered into a contract with the plaintiff, who undertook to do the work for £38. That contract was under the seal of the board, and contained the requisites which, as I have mentioned, are provided for by section 31.

It appeared, as time went on, that some further work was necessary. This extra work relates to the same subject-matter as the original contract, and some of it consists of such small additions as would make the repairs more complete—for instance, painting and varnishing a wall and making a cupboard in the lodge of the cemetery. These items might, in my judgment, have been included in the specification. They are things to be done for the purposes of the Act just as much as the items in the specification. As to these extras there was no contract, and I have come to the conclusion that the county court judge was right in disallowing the claim in respect of them. If we were to reverse his decision we should be doing this—enabling a surveyor who had friendly feelings towards the builder to alter a definite contract into a much larger affair. These items should have been inserted in the contract itself, and not having been so inserted they cannot be allowed. The amount claimed in respect of them is more than a fourth part of the sum agreed upon under the contract. That sum is under £40, and the sum due (if any) for the extras is £11. If we were to allow this claim we should be letting in the mischief which this Act meant to exclude. It is said that these extras are trivial matters and come under the well-known exception. It may be that these items might in some cases be so, but here they were part of the larger enterprize. In my opinion the appeal ought to fail.

Then the county court judge took the view that the payment into court was too late, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to his costs: County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11. The facts are these. The summons was issued out of the Brentford County Court on the 14th of March and was returnable on the 12th of April. On the 1st of April the action was transferred by order of the registrar to the Marylebone County Court, where the return day was the 15th of April. Payment into court was made on the 8th of April. The question is whether the return day was April the 12th or 15th. If it was the 12th, then the payment in was not made five clear days before the return day; but it seems clear to me that the 15th, and not the 12th, was the return day within the meaning of the rule, and that therefore the payment in was in time, and the plaintiff was not entitled to his costs.

MATHEW, J.—I regret that I am obliged to differ from my learned brother. In reference to the main question I think the plaintiff ought to succeed. In respect of small everyday occurrences required in an undertaking of this kind the board have a right to contract without seal. Do these extras belong to that class of work? The plaintiff was employed to do various small jobs; the defendants took advantage of his work, and are now taking the technical objection that the contract ought to have been under seal. The Lord Justice has treated all these items as being included in the scope of the original employment; but I cannot come to that conclusion. I cannot doubt but that if another tradesman had been employed to do these jobs he would have been entitled to recover, and can the fact of this particular tradesman having made a written contract with regard to other matters make any difference as to his rights? I think not. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal should be allowed. But I withdraw my judgment.

As to the point of county court procedure, I agree.

Appeal dismissed; case referred back to the county court judge to decide whether the payment into court was sufficient in amount, having regard to the decision that it was made in time; leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Charles Robinson & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Ruston, Clark, & Ruston.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Nov. 22.

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. PANCRAS. (a.)

*Metropolis Management Acts—Vestry—*Mandamus *to—Superannuation allowance to officer—Amount of allowance—Discretion of vestry as to—*29 & 30 Vict. c. 31, ss. 1, 4.

A metropolitan vestry has, under the Act 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31, a discretion to grant or refuse a superannuation allowance; but, if they decide to grant any allowance, then the amount of such allowance is not within their discretion, but must be according to the scale in the Act.

Where a vestry considered the amount according to the scale too large, and offered a smaller sum, and, on this being declined, refused to grant any allowance at all,

Held, that the vestry had no power to do so, as they had agreed to grant some allowance, and that a mandamus should issue to the vestry to compel them to hear and determine the matter, on the ground that they had not properly exercised the discretion vested in them.

Rule for a mandamus to the Vestry of St. Pancras directing them to consider a claim for a superannuation allowance, and to take the necessary steps to secure such allowance according to the provisions of the Act 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31—an Act to provide superannuation allowances of officers of vestries and other boards within the area of the Metropolis Local Management Act.

The prosecutor, Richard Westbrook, had been a rate collector for the vestry of St. Pancras, and having been in the service of the vestry as such collector for above thirty years, and being over seventy-two years of age, and of infirm health, he wished to resign. He accordingly wrote to the vestry in December, 1888, stating that he wished to resign as from the following Lady-day, and he asked that a retiring allowance might be given to him. His salary had been at the rate of £480 a year, and according to the scale laid down in the Act the superannuation allowance would have been £230 a year, and he asked that this allowance of £230 should be granted to him. This letter was referred by the vestry to their finance committee, who considered it, and recommended that an allowance of £230 should be given. This report was referred back again by the vestry to the committee to communicate with Mr. Westbrook to ascertain if he would accept a smaller sum than the £230, and the vestry at the same time stated that if he agreed to accept £150 a year this sum would be voted unanimously. The committee communicated with Mr. Westbrook, and he declined to accept a smaller sum than the £230, to which he said he was entitled under the Act. The attention of the vestry seems in the meantime to have been called to the case of Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, 35 W. R. 841, 19 Q. B. D. 538, where it was held that if an allowance were granted the vestry has no discretion as to the amount, but the amount must follow the scale laid down in the statute. The vestry then resolved by a large majority to dismiss Mr. Westbrook without granting any pension at all, and he was accordingly dismissed, after a month's notice, without any superannuation allowance whatever, and a successor was appointed in his place.

A rule was obtained, at the instance of Mr. Westbrook, for a mandamus to the vestry directing them to hear and consider the matter, and to grant the allowance according to the scale laid down in the statute.

It was admitted that the amount of the allowance, according to the scale in the Act, would be £230 a year, as claimed by Mr. Westbrook.

Section 4 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31 (which applies within the area of the Metropolis Local Management Act) enacts:—"Subject to the provisions herein contained, the allowance to be granted after the commencement of this Act to persons who shall have served in an established capacity as officers as aforesaid . . . shall be as follows: (that is to say)" and then is given the scale of superannuation allowances, which in no case can exceed two-thirds of the salary.

C. A. Russell, for the vestry, showed cause.—This is a matter in which this court cannot interfere; the grant is in the discretion of the vestry, and the vestry have fully considered this application and determined the matter, and there is no room for a mandamus. Before the Act there was no power to make a superannuation allowance at all, and the Act was passed to enable vestries to make such allowances. It has already been held by this court, in the case of Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, that the vestry have a discretion to give or to refuse a pension. Here they have refused to grant a pension, and they had a power to do so.

Morton Smith (Henn Collins, Q.C., with him), for the prosecutor, in support of the rule.—Here the vestry did agree to grant a pension, and the only question open was as to the amount. They resolved that if Mr. Westbrook agreed to take £150 a year instead of the larger sum that amount would be granted to him unanimously.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

That was equivalent to saying he ought to have a pension, though they differed as to the amount of such pension. They had no power to do that, because, although they might have a discretion to grant or refuse a pension in the first instance, they would have no power to determine the amount of such pension if they once determined to grant a pension. In such case the amount is fixed by the statute, and the vestry would have no power to depart from the statutory scale. The vestry have a judicial discretion to exercise, and they are bound to exercise it judicially: Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 2nd ed., p. 147; Rooke's case, 5 Coke's Rep. 100a; Reg. v. Overseers of Withyham, 2 C. L. Rep. 1657; Rex v. Young and Pitts, 1 Burrow, 556; Reg. v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 250, 1 Q. B. D. 201; Rex v. Askew, 4 Burrows, 2186; Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214; Biddulph v. Vestry of St. George, Hanover-square, 11 W. R. 524; Reg. v. Governors of Darlington School, 6 Q. B. 682; Macbeth v. Ashley, L. R. 2 Sc. App. 352, 22 W. R. Dig. 38.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a case by no means easy to decide, but upon the whole I think the mandamus should go.

I admit in the plainest terms and in the fullest manner the discretion of the vestry to entertain the question or not to entertain it in the beginning. The words that "a vestry may at their discretion grant to an officer a pension" seem to me to show that Parliament meant to entrust to them a discretion to entertain the question or not to entertain it in any particular case. This is the more likely as there was no power before these Acts to grant a pension, and it is more likely that Parliament would have empowered, rather than would have compelled, parties to do what for the first time they were enabled to do. It is clear to my mind that the vestry have, in the first instance, the discretion to entertain this question, and a discretion which, I am of opinion, this court could not compel them to put in force in the first instance.

But that does not by any means dispose of the case. The substance of the case I take to be this. [His lordship then stated the facts of the case.] It seems to me that, although the discretion of the vestry is, in a sense, absolute, that expression must be taken with some considerable comment. It may be, it probably is, that it is in their discretion to begin or not to begin, but in this case it appears to me that the vestry had committed itself, and had expressed its opinion that Mr. Westbrook was entitled to a pension. They were then confronted with the law, which said, If he is entitled to a pension he is entitled to this pension. Then they said, We do not think he is entitled to this pension, we will go back from what we said and will grant him none. Now a discretion must be, in bodies of this kind, legal discretion; it does not mean mere caprice, or mere personal or private feeling; it must be discretion founded upon grounds of justice and reason, and showing that the mind of the persons exercising the discretion has been brought to bear on the subject-matter before them.

We are not without authority upon this matter, and authority of a very high character. If the matter had been a matter of the discretion of justices, the books are full of cases in which, while the courts, on the one hand, have entirely disclaimed the right or the desire to act as courts of appeal and to review discretion, they have nevertheless been firm in saying that they will see that real discretion has been exercised, and that where discretion has been exercised upon grounds which ought not to have influenced it, they will treat it as not having been exercised at all, and send their mandamus to the body that has so declined really to exercise the discretion committed to it. One of the most striking cases with regard to magistrates is the case of Reg. v. Adamson, where the magistrates heard evidence, and they appeared to have exercised a discretion; but the court sent a mandamus upon the ground that it clearly appeared that, although discretion seemed to have been exercised, real discretion had not been exercised at all, because they proceeded upon considerations, extraneous and extra-judicial considerations, which ought not to have affected their decision, and which was the same as declining jurisdiction. That is an exceedingly strong authority in point of principle in the present case. Here it appears, to my mind, that the vestry acted as they did, not because they thought or meant that Mr. Westbrook was not entitled to a pension at all, but because they thought they were bound to give him £230 if they gave him anything, and as they thought that sum too much, therefore they would evade the Act of Parliament and give him nothing.

Now it appears to me that that is a thing which they could not, in point of law, do, and the case I have referred to is a strong authority to show that, under these circumstances, the court will hold that they have not acted judicially and have not exercised a real discretion. But it may be said that the cases to which I refer are cases with regard to magistrates, over whom the jurisdiction of this court has been long established, yet this is a different body, and that the considerations are different and do not apply. But there is a case of Reg. v. The Mayor of York, 1 W. R. 149, 1 E. & B. 588, where it was held, in the case of a town council, that they were bound to exercise a deliberate discretion, and if they refused to exercise it or exercised it colourably, then a mandamus would lie. That seems to me to be a case very much in point as showing that over a body very analogous to the body in the present case this court in the time of Lord Campbell asserted that if there was a colourable exercise of discretion, which was none in truth, the court would compel them to exercise their discretion.

It seems to me that these cases are very strong; they have never been interfered with, overruled, or questioned; and they show that this court, over bodies analogous to such a body as the present, where discretion has clearly been committed to those bodies, will see that there is a real discretion exercised by those bodies, and compel them so to exercise it by mandamus, and where discretion has apparently been fairly exercised, yet, when the grounds on which it has professedly been exercised are not legal grounds, are not grounds which the body professing to exercise the discretion ought to have taken into account, the court will treat the discretion as unexercised, and will make the body exercise it.

It seems to me that the vestry had here decided that this gentleman was entitled to a pension, but what they disliked was the judgment of this court compelling them to give £230 or nothing. They had agreed to give something, but when they found that they were obliged to give £230 they thought that sum too much and then they said they would give nothing.

That to my mind is a thing they had no right to do, and upon those grounds in my judgment this mandamus must go.

MATHEW, J., concurred.

Solicitors for Mr. Westbrook, Beal, Phillips, & Beal.

Solicitors for the vestry, Cunliffes & Davenport.

Q. B. Div. (Divnl. Ct.) (Field and Cave, JJ.) May 29, 1889.

HORNE v. POUNTAIN. (a.)

Practice—Charging order—Fund in court—Lunatic—Judgment debt—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14—3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1.

A fund was standing in the books of the Paymaster-General of the Chancery Division to the credit of one J. T. P., "a person of unsound mind." A judgment creditor of the lunatic applied for an order charging this fund, and a judge at chambers ordered that "so much of the defendant's interest in the fund so standing as aforesaid should stand charged with the payment of the . . . amount due on the judgment as the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy might deem applicable to payment of the judgment debt."

Held, that the proper form of order upon such an application was to make an order charging the fund, or such part of it as the judge should think fit, and that the judge had no jurisdiction to leave it to the discretion of the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy to say how much should be so charged.

Appeal from decision of judge at chambers.

One John Pountain having, on June 25, 1888, been found a lunatic, a committee was appointed on June 29, 1888. The plaintiff in this action was a judgment creditor against the lunatic for £51 14s. 6d. and £9 18s. costs recovered on January 30, 1889. A sum of £3,204 2s. 8d. New Consols was standing to the credit of the defendant on March 1, 1889, in the books of the Paymaster-General of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, and on an application in chambers, Mathew, J., made an order that "so much of the defendant's interest in the fund so standing in the books of the Paymaster-General as aforesaid, stand charged with the above-mentioned amount due on the said judgment as the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy may deem applicable to payment of the said judgment debt." Costs to be in the discretion of the Lords Justices.

The lunatic had no other property, and the cost of his maintenance in an asylum was about £250 to £300 a year.

Hewtall, for the plaintiff.—The judge at chambers ought to have himself exercised his discretion as to what part of the fund should be charged, there being no power in him to leave this to the Lords Justices.

Swinfen Eady, for the defendant and his committee.—The fund stands in the books of the Paymaster-General to the credit of a person of unsound mind, and therefore is a fund in Lunacy. The fund can only be administered in Lunacy, hence the Lords Justices are the proper persons to direct how much shall be charged, and they will regard rather the interest of the lunatic than that of his creditors: In re Pink, 31 W. R. 728, 23 Ch. D. 577. If the judge at chambers assumes jurisdiction to deal with the fund, that of the Lords Justices to deal with the property of lunatics will be excluded.

FIELD, J.—The question we have to decide arises out of the true construction of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82.

The plaintiff is a judgment creditor, and within the language of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. The fund in question is the property of a lunatic. The judge at chambers had, in my opinion, power to deal with the fund, since 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1, entitles him to make, in respect of a fund standing in court in the "name of the debtor or of any person in trust for him," such order as "shall entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor." The order that has been made relegates to the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy the duty of saying how much shall be applicable to the payment of the judgment debt. I think the learned judge ought not to have omitted to say what portion of the fund should stand charged. The fund being £3,204 2s. 8d, and the debt only £61 12s. 6d., it is not right to give the creditor a charge over the whole fund, but to ascertain what sum, part of that fund, ought to be charged. His order, in effect, does not give the judgment creditor the remedy provided by statute, but sends the creditor to the Lords Justices. We have only to see whether the judgment creditor has a right under the statute to have the order made. It is urged that, as the debtor is lunatic, his property is under the management of the Lords Justices. I cannot yield to that argument. In In re Hastings Lord Eldon decided that he would not interfere to hand over a sum of £5,000 in the bank to creditors of a lunatic, and if we had been sitting here as a court applied to by the creditors to hand over funds under our control, we might have been called on to act on the same principles. The creditor had the right to execute a ca. sa. "I cannot help it," said Lord Eldon in effect, "I must maintain the debtor when in gaol, or the creditor may sequester the living or issue an elegit. I cannot prevent it." At first I thought our order would be of no effect anywhere, but now I am not sure of that, for if the judgment creditor applies in Chancery to have the funds sold, he may or may not have a right to have them sold, with or without reference to the jurisdiction of the Lords Justices to care for the interest of the lunatic. But that is the time when the question, as to the right to dividends or interest or whether the Court of Chancery may postpone the rights of the creditor to the maintenance of the lunatic, will arise.

Understanding that Chancery does not interfere with the legal right, I can understand the principle of the cases, from which it appears that when dealing with the funds of a lunatic in Chancery the court says, "the man shall not starve, if you want our help in dealing with them we will see that he is kept alive." Just as, when application is made to Chancery by a husband to enable him to reach property in right of his wife, the court will not give it him without a settlement on his wife, or in the case of an equitable mortgagee by deposit of deeds, where Chancery says, "if you have to come to us you shall do what we think right," and the jurisdiction exercised in In re Pink seems to rest on the same principle. These matters, important to consider before the fund is handed over, are not for us to deal with. Our duty is to give effect to the Act. I find in it no exception, nor anything pointing to any distinction between a sane person or a lunatic. If an order could have been made before the petition and inquisition in Lunacy, I think it may be made now, otherwise it would be in the power of the court—itself a court of equity—to abstract from all the creditors of the lunatic the whole of their common law rights, and, if the fund was small and the expense of keeping the lunatic large, to deprive them of all their legal remedies. We ought to see clear statutory language leading to such a conclusion before arriving at it. On the simple construction of the statute the order as framed cannot be supported, and should be varied by charging £70 of the fund under this order.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. A lunatic must pay his debts, and his creditors have the ordinary rights of creditors to obtain payment of their debts. When Lord Eldon decided Ex parte Hastings, 14 Ves. 182, he thought his duty was to the lunatic only, and that he was not bound to assist the creditor to get payment of the lunatic's debts out of funds not within the creditor's reach; but the Lord Chancellor also clearly recognised the fact that the creditor ought to be allowed to have recourse to all the means which the law afforded him to obtain payment of his debt. The remedies of creditors were subsequently extended by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, under which the creditor could obtain a charging order on certain funds and other securities standing in the name of a debtor or of a trustee for him. This was again extended by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, by which the rights of creditors were extended to funds standing in the name of the Accountant-General in Chancery for their benefit. No distinction is drawn in the Act between lunatics and sane persons. Nor has this distinction been drawn in other cases—for instance, a lunatic can be made bankrupt. The Chancellor and the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy never interfere to prevent payment of a lunatic's debts, they only decline to assist a creditor when his remedy is defective. There is no objection to an order framed in the terms proposed by Field, J., but as originally framed it was not right to leave it to the Lords Justices to determine what part of the fund should be charged. If the Lords Justices are to exercise the same jurisdiction as that of the learned judge at chambers, there is no ground for applying to them. If however they are to exercise it in a different manner, treating the fund as some property which could not be touched without their assistance, and considering the interest of the debtor, I think that would be wrong; for it is not what the Legislature intended. I think the order should be absolute, and not conditional as it was made at chambers, and should be limited as suggested by Field, J.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Warriner & Kinch.

Solicitors for the defendant, Aldridge, Thorn, & Morris.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Dec. 20.

PHILLIPS v. CAYLEY. (a.)

Power of appointment — Exercise of power—General power of appointment of personal estate by will referring to the power—Will containing general bequest of personal estate, but no reference to the power—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.

In section 27 of the Wills Act, after the words "which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper," some such words as "by the will in question" must be read in from the context and the general scope of the Act.

A testator who, under a settlement made in 1884, had a general power of appointing some stock by writing under his hand (not being a will or codicil), or by will or codicil expressly referring to the power, bequeathed all his personal property to trustees upon certain trusts, but without any express reference to the power or to the property subject to it.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the condition in the power restricting the class of wills whereby the power was to be exercised to wills expressly referring to the power was a perfectly lawful restriction not forbidden or invalidated by any statute; that the testator, therefore, had not in the present case power to appoint in any manner he might think proper, within the meaning of section 27 of the Wills Act, but only (in the case of wills) by the particular class of will aforesaid; and consequently the will in question, not being a good exercise of the power apart from that section, was not made so thereby.

In re Marsh, Mason v. Thorne, 37 W. R. 10, 38 Ch. D. 630, not followed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

In 1884 certain stock was settled "upon trust for such person or persons, and for such purposes as H. R. Philips shall at any time or times, or from time to time, by writing under his hand (not being a will or codicil), or by will or codicil expressly referring to this power, appoint," and in default of appointment upon certain other trusts.

H. R. Phillips by his will made in 1879, and by divers codicils thereto, bequeathed all his personal property to trustees upon certain trusts, but with no express reference to the power of appointment or to the property settled. He died in 1886.

Section 27 of the Wills Act provides (inter alia) that a bequest of the personal estate of the testator, or any bequest of personal property described in a general manner, shall be construed to include any personal estate, or any personal estate to which such description shall extend (as the case may be), which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

The question raised in this case was whether the will operated as an exercise of the power, and this came on to be argued before Kekewich, J., on an originating summons, to which the trustees of H. R. Phillips' will were made defendants, the plaintiffs being persons interested in the stock in default of appointment. Kekewich, J., held that the will was not a good exercise of the power.

From this decision the defendant George Allen appealed.

Byrne, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the appellant.—This will is a good exercise of the power. The words "in any manner" in section 27 of the Wills Act refer to the objects to be benefited, not to the mode of exercising the power. Such a power as that here is, by virtue of that section, validly exercised by any will containing a general bequest of personal estate showing no contrary intention. The contrary intention must be shown by the will, not by the power itself, as here. If the respondent's contention is right, the object of section 27 can in every case be easily defeated by imposing a condition such as this on the exercise of the power.

They referred to In re Marsh, Mason v. Thorne, 37 W. R. 10, 38 Ch. D. 630; In re Phillips, Robinson v. Burke, 37 W. R. 504, 41 Ch. D. 417; Charles v. Burke, 60 L. T. N. S. 380, 37 W. R. Dig. 137; In re Tarrant's Settlement Trusts, W. N., 1889, p. 146; Airey v. Bower, 35 W. R. 657, 12 App. Cas. 263, at p. 267; In re Clarke's Estate, Maddick v. Marks, 28 W. R. 753, 14 Ch. D. 422; Boyes v. Cook, 28 W. R. 754, 14 Ch. D. 53; Hawthorn v. Shedden, 3 Sm. & G. 293, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 120; Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 306—7. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to In re Powell's Trusts, 18 W. R. 228. COTTON, L.J., referred to Pomfret v. Perring, 3 W. R. 81, 5 De G. M. & G. 775.]

Warmington, Q.C., and Warrington, for the respondents.—A man may reserve to himself a power fettered with any condition he pleases. The power here does not answer the description in section 27, If it is a testamentary power, as it is (though exercisable by deed as well), it comes within section 27. It must, however, be exercised by a will answering the description of the will mentioned in the power, though if the will mentioned in the power is required to be executed with certain formalities, the Act cuts those away by section 10. This will is admittedly not, without the aid of the statute, a will answering to the description in the power.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Even if the words "in any manner" are to be confined to the objects of the power, it does not satisfy the section. But there is no ground for so confining them. The statute is one dealing with wills only. No one ventures to contend that the section applies to powers to be exercised by deed alone.

Allen, in reply.—All that is required in order that the will may, under section 27, be a valid exercise of the power, is that it should be a good will within the Act. By that section the Legislature meant that every will should pass property over which the testator has a general power of appointment, unless a contrary intention should appear by the will itself—not by the instrument creating the power.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Kekewich, J., on a question on which contrary opinions have been expressed by different judges, but in the present case I think the decision appealed from is right. The question is whether the testator's will in this case is a good execution of a power contained in a settlement made by himself in June, 1884.

I quite agree that you cannot have a contrary intention within section 27 of the Wills Act, except one expressed on the face of the will itself.

But the question here is whether this will was a good execution of the power, which depends on whether the settlement gave the testator power to appoint in any manner he might think proper. A difficulty arises because the words of the section do not in terms refer only to powers exercisable by will. Taken literally they apply to any property which the testator may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, but it is conceded that where only a power to appoint by deed has been given, an appointment by will would not suffice, even though there is no limitation of the objects in favour of whom the power could be exercised. This is an Act dealing only with wills, and the object of section 27 is, not to enable persons to appoint by will who were not empowered to do so, but to make a general disposition by will operate as an exercise of a power to appoint by will without express reference to it. That is not enough to support the appellant's case.

Then, although a power to appoint by will is sufficient to bring the case within the section, when we wish to ascertain whether the will has exercised the power, we must see, first, whether there is any contrary intention expressed in the will, and, secondly, whether the will is such a will as is required by the power; and in my opinion, if any conditions or limitations are imposed by the settlement which creates the power, and to which the Act of Parliament does not prevent effect being given, we cannot treat them as nugatory.

The restriction imposed by the power in the present case was not contrary to any Act of Parliament. If any limitation is imposed merely as to the mode of execution, the 10th section deals with that, and does away with the restriction. Here the settlor says in effect that the settlement may be put an end to, and the property disposed of otherwise than as thereby provided, by a will "expressly referring to this power." Any other will is therefore not within the power. A will which does not comply with that condition cannot, in my opinion, by virtue of section 27, be considered a good execution of that power, and this will therefore does not operate as an exercise of that power. I think the decision of Kekewich, J., was right.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The scope of section 10 is totally distinct from that of section 27. Section 10 provides that a will executed in the manner required by the Act shall, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, be a valid execution of a power of appointment by will, though the formalities required by the instrument conferring the power have not been observed. But section 27 has nothing to do with forms of execution or other formalities. Here we have to construe the words in the second part of the section, which provide that a general bequest of personal estate shall include personal estate which the testator may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. Now the first thing that seems clear to me is that the words "which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper" are equivalent to "which he may have power to appoint by will in any manner he may think proper"; and, secondly, I think that those words extend and are equivalent to "which he may have power to appoint by the will in question in any manner he may think proper." The words "by the will in question" are to be read in from the context and from the scope of the Act, for the statute is one dealing only with wills. If that is the right construction of those words it is obvious that the will in this case does not answer to the description in the power of the sort of will which is necessary, and that is a fatal reason why the section does not apply. The statute does not attempt to cure the dissimilarity between wills and powers except so far as is provided by section 10—that is, as to formalities of execution and attestation merely. Here the dissimilarity goes far beyond mere form. It has been argued, but I cannot assent to the argument, that this view enables a man, by wording his power in a particular way, to evade the object of this section. But the section we have to construe is an enabling, and not a prohibitory section, and I cannot see any reason why the donor of a power may not so frame his settlement as to exclude from the operation of the section a particular class of wills, or why he may not impose as a condition on a will which is to amount to an execution of the power that it shall expressly name the source of the power. Suppose the settlement had said that, in order to exercise validly a power given by it, the will must refer nominatim to the deed of settlement and to the persons who were parties to it. He is at liberty, if he chooses, to impose a somewhat strange condition like that, and you could not escape from the obligation so imposed, under cover of this section, if you neglected to make the prescribed reference. I agree with the view of Cotton, L.J., and think that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The words we have to construe are practically the words of section 27, "Which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper." Does that mean, "Any power to appoint in any manner at all?" It cannot mean that, because it cannot mean to empower a person to appoint by will in cases in which he has only been given power to appoint "by deed." Does it mean "by any will"? In my opinion it cannot mean even as much as that, because if it did it might frustrate the intentions of the person who created the power. Suppose a father on the 1st of June gave his son power to appoint by will to any person and in any manner he chose, provided the will was executed after the 1st of January then next, and the son made a will and died before the prescribed date. According to the appellant's argument that would be a valid execution of the power, and the fetter which the father had a right to impose might be disregarded if the section means "by any will." Of course, if the Legislature had said so, we should have to yield to their expressed intention; but I do not think that was the meaning of the words here, and it is not for us to invent fetters upon powers of disposition of property.

I quite agree with Bowen, L.J., that this section was not intended to deal with any relation between the power and the instrument of its execution, but was intended to deal only with the exercise of the power by the will; and, to my mind, the provisions of the 10th section go far to show that, where that section does not apply, any fetter created by the donor of the power would still remain valid. I think, therefore, that the true meaning of these words is, "May have power, by the will in question, to appoint in any manner he may think proper." The appeal therefore fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Allen & Sons; Potter, Sandford, & Kilvington.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — Dec. 10—12, 18.

MACKENZIE v. CHILDERS. (a.)

Building estate—Deed poll—Covenant—Implied agreement—"Intended"—Interest in land—Limitation—Perpetuity—Jurisdiction to restrain vendors from selling without requiring restrictive covenants.

The plaintiffs had bought part of a building estate under conditions of sale which referred to stipulations contained in a "deed poll of mutual covenants which has been or is intended to be executed by the vendors, and shall be executed by each of the purchasers." The deed was executed by the vendors and the plaintiffs. It recited that "it is intended that the respective purchasers shall set and subscribe their respective names and seals to this deed," "and, whereas it was a part of the various contracts, and it is intended to be a part of all future contracts for sale of the said plots or parcels of land respectively, that the several purchasers respectively should execute this deed and should thereby be severally and respectively bound by all the stipulations hereinafter contained." The deed then witnessed that, "in consideration of the premises," the purchasers covenanted with each other, and with all persons entitled to the land, not to build except upon certain conditions. The deed contained no covenant by the vendors, who now proposed to sell some of the unsold lots upon conditions which were admittedly inconsistent with the original scheme, and without requiring that the purchasers should execute the deed poll.

Held, that the deed poll must be treated as made inter partes; that the intention of the vendors had been expressed in order to induce the plaintiffs to buy, and that they were not at liberty to alter that intention now; that, if not bound by covenant, they were bound by implied agreement; that the agreement was not void for vagueness; that it made no difference that there was no covenant by the proposed purchasers; and that the vendors must be restrained from authorising any purchaser to build contrary to the terms of the building scheme.

Motion for judgment.

The question in this case was whether the vendors of land laid out upon a building scheme had covenanted or agreed expressly or by implication with the plaintiffs, who were purchasers of part of the land under that scheme, not to authorize other purchasers to use the rest of the land in violation of the building scheme.

In 1867 the then trustees of the will of Sir Culling Eardley adopted a scheme for the laying out portions of the trust property called the Belvedere Estate for the purposes of building. The scheme was for the first time delineated and shown in its entirety on the plan annexed to certain particulars of sale prepared for the purpose of the sale by auction of the land shown on such plan and coloured green, which took place on the 3rd of June, 1867. At this sale only a few of the lots were sold.

The particulars stated that the property had been laid out with the greatest care; that no purchaser was to erect more than one single or two semi-detached villas on his or their lots, nor of a less value than £500 for single ones and £750 for a pair, with certain specified exceptions; that no public-house should be erected or opened on any part of the estate, with many other regulations intended to insure that the property should only be used for a superior class of villa residences. The twelfth condition ran thus:—"All the lots are sold subject to the general stipulations on the particulars and to certain covenants for regulating the building upon, fencing, and mode of using the land, the repair of roads, construction of cesspools, and for avoiding nuisances, contained in a deed poll of mutual covenants, which has been or is intended to be executed by the vendors and shall be executed by each of the purchasers. No objection or requisition shall be made to or in respect of such deed or anything therein contained. Copies of the said deed poll (without the plan and signatures and alterations) having been printed, it shall not be included in the abstract, but one of such copies shall be delivered to each purchaser, and in the meantime a copy thereof may be inspected on application to the auctioneers, the solicitors, or at the estate office, Belvedere. A short memorandum or notice of such deed, having been executed by the purchaser, shall be indorsed on the conveyance to each purchaser, and shall be signed by him or her at the time of the completion of his or her purchase."

The deed poll referred to was dated the 13th of February, 1868, and it was executed by the vendors and the plaintiffs and by sixty-six purchasers in all, at various times down to the year 1889.

The deed had upon it a plan which was practically identical with the plan on the particulars of sale. It recited that the vendors had laid out the property for building purposes, and divided it into building plots and formed roads. "And whereas the said vendors propose to sell the said building plots or parcels of land, and have already sold some of them, and it is intended that the respective purchasers shall set and subscribe their respective names and seals to this deed. And that the distinctive numbers of the building plots or parcels of land so purchased by such persons respectively, as numbered on the said plan, shall be set opposite the respective signatures and seals to this deed of such purchasers respectively after the said several plots or parcels so purchased by them respectively have, or shall have, been conveyed to them respectively in fee. And whereas it was a part of the various contracts, and it is intended to be a part of all future contracts, for sale of the said plots or parcels of land respectively that the several purchasers respectively should execute this deed, and should thereby be severally and respectively bound by all the stipulations hereinafter contained." The deed then witnessed that "in consideration of the premises" each purchaser for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as to his particular plot, covenanted and granted with and to each of the other purchasers, his heirs and assigns, and with and to the several other persons, including the vendors, who at the time of his executing should be entitled to any part of the land, their respective heirs and assigns, inter alia, not to build any house or other building except appurtenant offices the cost of which should not amount to the sum mentioned in the succeeding conditions, nor to do anything in breach or violation of, or contrary to, the fair meaning of such conditions. The sixth of these conditions was that, with certain exceptions not now material, no more than one single or two semi-detached houses should be erected on any one plot. This deed was executed by the vendors, and although in the form of, and called, a deed poll, it was admitted in argument that it must be treated as a deed inter partes. Many of the persons who had purchased, including the plaintiffs, had spent very large sums of money in building upon their land upon the faith of this building scheme, which had always been observed and acted upon down to the month of September, 1889. A change had taken place in the trustees of the will, and recently the trustees and their architect, finding that part of the land could not easily be disposed of on the terms of that scheme, but that it might be sold for the building of cottages for artizans, on the 4th of September, 1889, put up this part of the land for sale by auction in different lots, and under conditions which would be a breach of the original building scheme, by allowing the erection of more than one of such cottage dwellings upon each of the plots on the original building plan. Notice of the building scheme was given at that auction, and the contracts then made were in a form which would enable the vendors to rescind them if the objection now made should be maintained. This action was brought to restrain the trustees from authorizing the new purchasers to depart from that scheme. There were no pleadings, and, by consent, none of the purchasers at the recent auction were made parties.

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Millar, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker (Sir H. Davey, Q.C., with them), for the plaintiffs.—We have bought the land and spent our money on the faith of a representation by the vendors that all purchasers would enter into a similar contract. The vendors cannot change their mind now any more than they could have done if they had made a covenant in the words of the recital: Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12; Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 11 Ch. D. 866. The whole estate is subject to the deed poll, so we could get an injunction against the purchasers who executed that deed, and we submit that we are equally entitled to succeed against the vendors: Whatman v. Gibson, 9 Sim. 196; Keates v. Lyon, 17 W. R. 338, L. R. 4 Ch. 218, 223.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Onslow, for the vendors.—It is doubtful whether any of these sales were justified by the terms of the will, and whether, if they were, the present trustees are bound by the personal covenant of their predecessors. If there is an implied contract which binds the estate, it gives the purchasers an interest in land and is void for perpetuity: London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562; McLean v. McKay, 21 W. R. 798, L. R. 5 P. C. 327. But there is no covenant by the purchasers of the lots now in question as there was in Spicer v. Martin, and there is no authority for restraining us from selling without obtaining such a covenant. There is no covenant on our part to require restrictive covenants, and none can be implied. The recitals in the deed poll and the statements in the conditions of sale as to the intention of the parties only refer to their condition of mind at the moment; they could alter their intention at any time: Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 185; Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467; Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774; In re the Railway and Electric Appliances Co., 36 W. R. 730, 38 Ch. D. 597; Aspdin v. Austin, 5 Q. B. 671; Piggott v. Stratton, 8 W. R. 13, 1 De G. F. & J. 33; German v. Chapman, 25 W. R. 802, 7 Ch. D. 271; Child v. Douglas, 2 W. R. 701, 5 De G. M. & G. 739; Western v. Macdermott, 15 W. R. 265, L. R. 2 Ch. 72; Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778.

Millar, Q.C., in reply.—The sales were not breaches of trust, and if they were the vendors cannot raise the objection now, when they are contemplating further sales. The present trustees are bound by notice of the contract; they claim to maintain the position of their predecessors, one of whom has only retired since action brought. The doctrine of perpetuities does not apply. London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm was a case of executory limitation. Here there was an implied contract. Our rights are not affected by the circumstance that the new purchasers have made no covenant. Those purchasers would be restrained on the ground of notice. If they had not had notice they might have set up against us a title for valuable consideration without notice, but the court would not allow the vendors to give them such a title contrary to their agreement with us. Our right is the same as where an injunction is sought to restrain parting with bills of exchange or title deeds. The court will interfere to prevent them altering their condition of mind and derogating from their own grant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—KAY, J., stated the facts, and continued.—Now the first question is, What is the true intent and meaning of this deed? A building scheme had been carefully elaborated. It had been embodied in an estate plan to which all purchasers were referred by this deed. The deed recites that some purchasers had already bought lots according to this scheme, in respect of which they were bound to execute the deed. That was so. They had bought, under the conditions to which I have referred which expressly mention the deed, and this deed, executed under these circumstances by the vendors, states that "it is intended," not only that the actual purchasers should execute, but that it should "be a part of all future contracts for sale of the said plots or parcels of land respectively that the several purchasers should execute this deed, and should thereby be severally and respectively bound by all the stipulations hereinafter contained." Counsel for the trustees have argued that this only means that such was the intention of the trustees for the moment, but that they might alter it at pleasure. They did not enter into any covenant, it is said, because they did not wish to bind themselves in any way. And the phrase "it is intended" was adopted, no doubt, to induce persons to buy on the faith of the building scheme—that could not be denied; but to leave the trustees free to depart from it if they chose, at any rate as to land not actually sold. That, it is urged, is the meaning according to what is sometimes called "the good faith and honour" of this deed of contract. Now I will apply to that argument a very simple test. Suppose in a building scheme like this a purchaser of one or more lots was required to covenant that he would not build more than one house on each lot. And that, there being no such deed as this, he inquired by letter of the vendors whether all past and future purchasers would be bound by like covenants, and that the vendors answered in writing:—"It is intended that all past and future purchasers shall be bound by a like covenant." Would that be a mere expression of intention which the vendors might alter at any time, or would it be a binding contract not to use or authorize the use of the remaining land otherwise? I should think that no lawyer or man of business would hesitate for a moment to say that would be a binding contract. The question is not what the vendor might mean—not whether in his own mind he intended to reserve a power of departing from the bargain—but what the purchaser would understand by the words, what effect they were intended or calculated to produce upon him. If that would be the meaning of these words in such a letter, can they have any less or other meaning in such a deed as this? These recitals were inserted in the deed as one of the main inducements to purchasers to buy. It was obviously supposed that better prices could be obtained for the lots if each purchaser was assured that every other would be bound by like stipulations, and that the building scheme under which he was buying would be honourably carried out in respect of all the land coloured green on the plan. Another mode of testing the argument is this. If this was merely a statement of intention which the vendors were not bound to abide by they might change it at any time. If they sold half the estate at once to one or many purchasers who bought and built houses on the faith of this statement, they might then immediately break up the building scheme and sell the rest for a manufactory, for artizans' cottages, or for any purpose, however inconsistent with a scheme for a residential property. Nay, more, if it was merely an intention which they might alter they might change it as to any of the lots they had actually sold and absolve any one or more purchasers from the necessity of covenanting at all. The lapse of time before their change of intention is not in the least in their favour. For twenty years they have acted as though the expressed intention was binding upon them. If the deed be ambiguous that conduct shows what they themselves understood it to mean.

I am clearly of opinion that the recitals in this deed do not mean that the intention was one which the trustees were at liberty to change, but that the meaning is that the land coloured green, whether sold or unsold, should not be used in a manner contrary to the building scheme, or, to take the very point now in controversy, that none of the lots marked on the building plan should have more than one house built upon it. Then, if that is the meaning of this deed, what is its effect? It is a deed inter partes, the several parties being the vendors and the purchasers who execute. No formal words are necessary to make a covenant in such a deed. A statement of a binding intention on the part of the vendors who executed the deed, made, on the face of it, for the purpose of inducing the several purchasers to buy, is as good a covenant as could be made by the most formal words.

In my opinion the effect of this deed is, that the vendors thereby enter into a covenant not to authorize the use of the unsold land, coloured green on the plan, in a manner inconsistent with the conditions of the building scheme as therein expressed; and, in particular, with respect to the present dispute, not to authorize the building of more than one house upon each plot of the land coloured green on the estate plan annexed to the deed. But if the deed did not bind them by such a covenant, what would be the effect of the whole transaction? A more perfect example of a building scheme, on the faith of which persons have been induced to buy land and to expend money in building, there could hardly be.

In the leading case of Duke of Bedford v. The Trustees of the British Museum, 2 M. & K. 552, the covenant sought to be enforced specifically in equity against the defendants had been entered into in 1675 by their predecessor in title to build a mansion and offices, and no other buildings, on the land where the British Museum now stands, and the duke was held not entitled to equitable relief by injunction to prevent the defendants from building contrary to this covenant because of the use which had in the meantime been made of the adjoining land, which, at the date of the covenant, was occupied by another mansion or unbuilt on. Sir T. Plumer said:—"By the letter of the contract the duke is under no positive engagement to leave the northern boundary open; but the question is whether, according to good faith and the understanding of the parties at the time when this contract was entered into, the terms of the engagement had not reference to the property while it remained in its then state." Since that decision many cases have occurred in which, especially where land has been purchased on the faith of a building scheme, an agreement has been implied between the several purchasers, or between them and the vendor, not to depart from the scheme. In Renals v. Cowlishaw there was a statement of the general doctrine by the late Hall, V.C., which was approved by James, L.J., on appeal; and more recently by the Lords of Appeal in Spicer v. Martin. That statement, in effect, is that every purchaser of a plot of land under a building scheme is entitled to the benefit of a covenant with the vendor by another purchaser "where the court is satisfied that it was the intention" that he should be bound by a like covenant and should have such benefit. "This right exists, not only where the several parties execute a mutual deed of covenant, but wherever a mutual contract can be sufficiently established. A purchaser may also be entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant entered into with his vendor by another or others where his vendor has contracted with him that he shall be the assign of it—that is, have the benefit of the covenant. And such covenant need not be express, but may be collected from the transaction of sale and purchase." To apply that language I should, in this case, if there were no express covenant, "collect from the transaction of sale and purchase" an implied agreement by the vendors with every purchaser that none of the unsold lots should be built upon in a manner inconsistent with the building scheme, or, at least, that they would not authorize such a departure from the scheme.

In Spicer v. Martin, Spicer, by separate conveyances, had acquired the fee simple in seven houses in Cromwell-gardens, South Kensington. Each conveyance contained a covenant by him restricting his use of each house for anything but a private dwelling. He let one of these houses to Martin. He did not enter into any express covenant with Martin restricting the use of the other houses. But the lease to Martin had upon it a plan showing all the seven houses, and Martin was informed before taking his lease that the leases of Spicer's other houses contained this restrictive covenant, and that there was a like covenant by Spicer in the conveyances to him. Martin thereupon, in his lease, entered into a like covenant as to the house he hired. Afterwards Spicer and his vendors arranged to authorize one Brett to convert five of the other six houses into an hotel, three of the houses being bought directly from Spicer for this purpose. The Lords Justices restrained Spicer from "authorizing" this to be done. On appeal to the House of Lords this decision was confirmed. The House of Lords expressly disclaimed proceeding upon the doctrine of Piggott v. Stratton—viz., that there had been a representation to Martin that Spicer was bound by a restrictive covenant as to the use of the houses from which he could not depart. Lord Macnaghten, in a speech which had been read and was approved by Lord Fitzgerald and Lord Watson, says this: "As regards the appellant," that is Spicer, "the case I think is doubly clear. It seems to me that when Spicer put his houses in Cromwell-gardens on the market he invited the public to come in and take a portion of an estate which was bound by one general law—a law perfectly well understood, and one calculated and intended to add to the security of the lessees, and consequently to increase the price of the houses. The benefit of that increase, whatever it was, Mr. Spicer got. Can he or his representatives be permitted to destroy the value of the thing he sold by authorizing the use of part of the estate for a purpose inconsistent with the law by which he professed to bind the whole." That is, Spicer was bound to Martin by an implied contract—implied from the whole transaction—not to authorize a departure from the rule—restricting the use of those seven houses for anything but dwelling-houses. I borrow the very words of that judgment. The defendants in this case are attempting to authorize the use of part of the estate "for a purpose inconsistent with the law by which" they or their predecessors as trustees "professed to bind the whole." The only possible distinction between the act they propose to do and that of Spicer is that they are proposing to authorize the new purchasers to build without compelling them to enter into a covenant. Spicer was about to do the same as to three of the houses which Brett was to take, as to others he was going to release the covenants which former lessees from him had entered into. If there is any difference in this distinction I am not able to appreciate it. Therefore, if in the present case the trustees were not bound by a covenant, as I think they are, I should hold they were bound by an implied contract restricting their dealing with the land in question in violation of the building scheme. Purchasers with notice of such an agreement are as much bound as the parties to the agreement. Lord Cottenham in Tulk v. Moxhay says: "That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that if there was a mere agreement and no covenant, this court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it, for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased." The purchasers who bought in September last with notice of this contract are bound by it also.

Two other points were raised on behalf of the defendants which I must notice. Mr. Renshaw faintly, but his junior with much earnestness, argued that if there were any contract restricting the number of houses on the unsold plots it would be void for perpetuity. The argument was attempted in Coles v. Sims, 2 W. R. 151, 5 De G. M. & G. 1, and it was expressly decided that such a contract was not obnoxious to the rule. But the case which is most against this view is that upon which the argument was founded—London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm. In that case the Court of Appeal overruled two cases which had decided that a limitation of property was not obnoxious to the rule if the person to take under that limitation could release it. But it also decided that mere contracts, whether by deed or not, are not within the rule, which only applies to limitations of property. The judges expressed an opinion that a contract by A. to sell land to B. or his heirs at a fixed price upon notice in writing given by B. or his heirs created an interest in land, and that there was no real distinction in equity between such a contract and a limitation by which, upon such payment, the estate would vest in B. and his heirs. No doubt that doctrine is entirely novel. But there is nothing in the case which gives the smallest ground for the contention that a covenant by a vendor or purchaser restricting the use of land reserved or sold is within the rule against perpetuity. Another argument was this. The vendors, it was urged, were trustees, and though they had power to sell, a sale with restrictive covenants would not be a proper exercise of that power. Counsel admitted that the sales which were made in September last were just as bad in this respect, because they were made subject to conditions similar in kind though not the same. Under such circumstances the argument is rather surprising. I am of opinion that the building scheme was within the powers of the trustees. I have no doubt that it was the best and most lucrative mode of dealing with the estate, and that they have received much more under it than could have been made by sale of the land in any other way. I have no reason to suppose that the conditions imposed were depreciatory. I should infer just the contrary, even if the land now in question remained unsold. There must be an injunction against the defendants, restraining them from authorizing any purchaser from them of any of the plots of land comprised in the building scheme and coloured green upon the plan annexed to the so-called deed poll to build upon each plot more than one house contrary to such building scheme.

The defendants must pay the costs of the action.

Solicitors, Parish & Hickson; Frere, Forster, & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Stirling, J. } Nov. 29; Dec. 13, 22.

Postlethwaite v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Sale to new company for shares — Limit of time for exercise of option to take shares in new company—Companies Act, 1862, s. 161.

Where a company is being wound up, and its business and assets are to be transferred to a new company in consideration of shares in the new company, in pursuance of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, the scheme may fix a reasonable limit of time within which a shareholder in the old company must exercise his option to take up the shares in the new company to which, under the scheme, he is entitled.

The plaintiff was the holder of 1,978 shares in the Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the old company).

Early in 1889, the old company being in want of additional capital, a voluntary liquidation and reconstruction were deemed advisable. Accordingly, on January 28, 1889, a resolution was passed that the old company should be wound up voluntarily. This resolution was confirmed on February 18, and a liquidator appointed.

On April 2 the liquidator issued a circular calling an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders for April 12 for the purpose of passing certain resolutions there set out with or without modification.

The meeting was held in accordance with the circular, and the resolutions passed in a modified form. The resolutions as passed were (so far as it is material to set them out in full) as follows:—

"1. That the liquidator be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell and transfer to a new company to be incorporated . . . all the property of the company upon the following terms and conditions. . . . (b.) The consideration for the said sale and transfer shall be the payment of the sum of £20,000 by the allotment to the liquidator or to his nominees of 200,000 shares of 5s. each in the new company, credited with 2s. paid thereon, and leaving a liability of 3s. per share and no more, and the payment and satisfaction by the new company of any sums which may become payable to any shareholders of this company who have dissented under the Companies Act, 1862.

"2. That the liquidator be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure to be allotted to every member of the company requiring the same, or his nominee under the contract hereinafter mentioned, two shares in the new company with 2s. credited as paid thereon for and in respect of every share held by him in this company. Provided always that to entitle the members of this company to an allotment of such new shares application must be made for the same in writing in the form and manner prescribed by the liquidator, accompanied by a payment of 6d. per share on the number of shares applied for within ten days next after notice requiring him to apply for the same shall have been given in the manner in which notices are required to be given to members under the articles of association of this company."

(a.) Reported by L. S. Bristowe, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The resolutions also provided that the liquidator should dispose of so many of the 200,000 shares as should not be taken up, and that if the liquidator should obtain any premium for the shares to which members of the old company (other than dissentients) would have been entitled had they applied for the same, such premium, less the cost of realization, should be paid to such members by the liquidator.

These resolutions were confirmed at a meeting held on April 29.

On June 8 a company (hereinafter called the new company) was incorporated, in pursuance of the resolutions of April, under the name of the Port Philip Gold Co. (Limited), and a contract was entered into between the old company, the liquidator, and the new company, for the purpose of carrying the resolutions into effect.

On June 12 the liquidator issued a circular to the members of the old company of which the material parts were as follows:—

"I have now the pleasure to inform you that the new company called the Port Philip Gold Co. (Limited) has been incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, with a nominal capital of £50,000 in 200,000 shares of 5s. each, every shareholder in this (the old) company being entitled to apply for, and have allotted to him, two shares of the new company of 5s. each (credited with 2s. per share as paid thereon and leaving a liability of 3s. per share) in respect of each share held by him in the old company. I have also much pleasure in stating that in pursuance of the powers and instructions given me at the above-mentioned meetings, I have entered into an arrangement with the Gold Trust and Investment Co. (Limited), who for a payment of 3d. per share have guaranteed to find subscribers for the whole of the shares (if any) which may not be taken by the shareholders."

The circular went on to offer the shares in the new company in accordance with the resolutions, and stated:—

"If no application is received from you on or before the said 25th day of June inst., or so far as any application may not extend, you will be deemed to have refused an allotment of shares in the new company to which you are entitled under the said special resolutions and draft contract, and you will be excluded from an allotment accordingly. Any shares unapplied for will be disposed of by me, as liquidator, to such person or persons, and at such price, and on such terms and conditions (if any) as I may think fit."

This circular was accompanied by a form of application, and a further circular was subsequently issued containing instructions as to the mode of filling up the form of application.

The plaintiff did not attend any of the above-mentioned meetings of the company, but he did not dissent from the resolutions.

The notices of the meetings of April 12 and 29 and the circular of June 12 were duly sent by post to him at his registered address in accordance with the articles of association of the old company; but the plaintiff denied having received them. The evidence with regard to this appears from the judgment.

The plaintiff sent in no application for shares in the new company until August 24, 1889, when he filled up the form of application and returned it to the liquidator. The arrangement had, however, then been carried out, and the liquidator was unable to make an allotment to him.

The present action was then commenced by the plaintiff against the old company, the new company, and the liquidator. The writ claimed a declaration that the agreement between the old company and the new company was ultra vires the old company, and inoperative and void, and an injunction to restrain the old company and the liquidator from carrying into effect the said agreement, except upon allotting or causing to be allotted to the plaintiff shares in accordance with the scheme sanctioned by the resolutions of April. The plaintiff now moved for an interlocutory injunction. The notice of motion was originally for an injunction in accordance with the second of the above-mentioned claims, but was amended during the hearing of the case, and as amended it was for an injunction to restrain the old company and the liquidator from parting with the assets of the old company, and to restrain the new company from dealing with any such assets already transferred to them otherwise than in the ordinary course of business.

It was agreed that, so far as related to the points now decided, the motion should be treated as the hearing of the action.

Hastings, Q.C., and Farwell, for the applicant, contended that the liquidator had no right, under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, to impose on the shareholders a limit of time within which they were to apply for shares in the new company.

They cited Griffith v. Paget, 25 W. R. 523, 5 Ch. D. 894; Alexander v. Simpson, ante, p. 161; Clinch v. Financial Corporation, 17 W. R. 84, L. R. 4 Ch. 117.

Grosvenor Woods and Kerly, for the liquidator, cited Higgs' case, 13 W. R. 937, 2 H. & M. 657, and referred to various cases mentioned in Palmer's Company Precedents, 4th ed., p. 587, and Chadwick Healey on Companies, p. 377, in which in schemes of this kind a limit of time for application had been sanctioned. Zuccani v. Nacupai Gold Mining Co., 61 L. T. N. S. 176, showed that the option must be exercised within a reasonable time. If you arrive at this, that under section 161 a sale may be made for shares, there must be some time limited.

They also referred to Southall v. British Mutual Life Assurance Society, 19 W. R. 865, L. R. 6 Ch. 614, and In re European Assurance Society Arbitration, 18 S. J. 403.

Buckley, Q.C., and G. F. Hart, for the new company, argued that unless a time could be limited for applying for shares in the new company section 161 would be unworkable.—A shareholder might otherwise wait and take advantage of success at the same time standing to lose nothing. Such authority as there was was in favour of that view. In Weston v. New Guston Co., 60 L. T. 805, 37 W. R. Dig. 36, and, on appeal, Megone's Reports of Company Cases, 352, the judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeded on the view that a limit of time might be imposed. So also Zuccani v. Nacupai Gold Co.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply, cited Nicholl v. Eberhardt Co. (Limited), 61 L. T. 489.

Dec. 22.—Stirling, J.—The object of the present motion is to test the validity of an agreement for sale by the old company to the new company, purporting to have been entered into under the provisions of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862; and all parties are willing that I should deal with the case (so far as I can properly do so) as if this were the trial, instead of being merely an interlocutory application. [His lordship then stated the facts above set forth, and proceeded:—] The plaintiff is a stockbroker on the London Stock Exchange, and appears to have regularly attended to his business down to June 17. From June 17 to August 4 he was compelled to absent himself from business by domestic affliction. The plaintiff did not attend any of the meetings of the company to which I have referred, but he did not dissent from the resolutions passed at them. It is proved that the notices of the meetings of April 12 and 29 and the circular of June 12 were duly sent by post to the plaintiff at his registered address at the Stock Exchange in accordance with the provisions of the articles of association of the old company. In answer to this the plaintiff states that he has no recollection of having seen any of the circulars except a notice and forms of application, which are proved by the evidence to have been posted along with the circular of June 12, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief no other circular was ever received at his office. The plaintiff, however, admits that in June, 1889, and shortly before the 17th thereof, the liquidator called on him at the door of the Stock Exchange and asked him how many shares he would be willing to take up, and that he told him he intended to take up his proportion and no more.

Under these circumstances I think it must be assumed that the notices and circulars were duly received at the plaintiff's office, and that previously to the 17th of June he was, or with reasonable diligence might have been, aware of the obligation which lay on him under the special resolutions to send an application for shares by the 25th of June. He did not, in fact, send any application by that date; but on his return to business on the 24th of August he filled up the form of application and sent it to the liquidator. At this time, however, the liquidator had carried into effect the arrangements mentioned in the circular of the 12th of June, and consequently was unable to give him any shares. After some correspondence between the solicitors of the plaintiff and the liquidator this action was commenced on the 2nd of October by writ asking a declaration that the agreement entered into between the old company and the new company is ultrà vires the old company and inoperative and void, and an injunction to restrain the old company and the liquidator from carrying into effect the said agreement, except upon allotting or causing to be allotted to the plaintiff shares in accordance with the scheme sanctioned by the resolutions of April. Notice of motion framed in accordance with the second of these alternatives was given, but it has since been amended, and is now to the effect which I have stated. The new company have allotted all their capital, in accordance with the agreement with the old company, and have been put in possession of the property of the old company, though a legal conveyance has not actually been made. Two objections are urged against the plaintiff's title to relief —first, it is said that the resolutions and agreement are within the powers of the old company and are valid, and secondly, that even if they are not, the plaintiff is debarred from relief by delay and acquiescence. In support of the first of these objections it was urged that the shares to be received in compensation for the sale to the new company were not for the purpose of distribution among the members of the old company within the meaning of section 161.

It was not disputed before me, and it is shown by the case of In re City and County Investment Co., 28 W. R. 933, 13 Ch. D. 475, before the Court of Appeal, as well as by other cases, that a sale may be made for shares to which a liability attaches, and further, that in such a case the new shares may be given directly to the shareholders of the old company, and need not in the first instance go to the liquidator, the reason being, as is stated by the late Master of the Rolls, that "it is perfectly well known that the liquidator will not take shares which are not fully paid up." On the other hand, it was decided in Higgs' case that a shareholder, even although he has not expressed his dissent from the special resolution sanctioning the sale, cannot be compelled to accept the shares in the new company against his will. How, then, are shares to which a liability is attached, which the liquidator will not take, and the shareholders cannot be compelled to accept, to be distributed among them pursuant to section 161? The answer is, by giving to every shareholder who does not dissent what in substance amounts to an option to take shares in the new company; and if the scheme under consideration had been framed in this simple form, I conceive its validity would not (regard being had to the decisions to which I have referred) have been open to question. If the shareholder fails to exercise his option the result is that he loses all interest in the shares which he might have taken, but is bound by the resolutions which have been passed. This is laid down by Lord Hatherley in Higgs' case and also in Clinch v. Financial Corporation.

This being so, it is next to be considered within what time the option is to be exercised. It seems clear that it cannot remain open for ever. The distribution contemplated by section 161 must take place before the close of the winding up in the course of which the sale is made. It is said that the option ought to remain open until the liquidator has obtained, under section 138, the direction of the court as to any shares which a shareholder who has not dissented has abstained from accepting. The liquidator may, no doubt, if he sees fit, protect himself by an application to the court in reference to the distribution of the shares; but I see nothing which renders it obligatory on him to take such a course. All that seems incumbent on him to do is to take care that each shareholder has afforded to him reasonable opportunities of obtaining, if he is so minded, the shares intended for him; and if, having done this, the liquidator is able to wind up the affairs of the company and close the liquidation without recourse to the court, he appears to me to be entitled to do so. The question, however, affects not only the selling company, but also the purchasing company. Every company is interested in knowing who constitutes the body of its own shareholders, more particularly when a liability attaches to the shares. In the present case the company, having been formed to work a gold mine, was of a highly speculative character, and the liability attached to the shares was intended to furnish the means of obtaining the capital necessary for working the mine. Under these circumstances it was only reasonable for the purchasing company to stipulate, and for the liquidator and shareholders of the selling company to agree, that a limited time should be fixed within which alone the option should be exercisable; and I see nothing in section 161 (as interpreted by the decisions to which I have referred) to prevent this from being done. In my opinion, therefore, the scheme was not vitiated by the insertion of a limit of time within which the option was to be exercised, provided the limit was such as to leave the option available for a reasonable time.

I am confirmed in this conclusion by such authority as is to be found on the point. In the first place, schemes containing similar clauses are shown to have been repeatedly sanctioned by the court. It is true that in no case does the point appear to have been formally adjudicated upon; nevertheless, I cannot think that it entirely escaped observation, and it appears to me that some weight is due to the circumstance that such clauses were passed without objection by Sir G. Jessel and Hall, V.C. Next, I have said that if the scheme had been formed so as simply to give each shareholder an option without limiting any time for its exercise, it is difficult to see how objection could have been taken to it. Now, in the case of Zuccani v. Nampier Gold Mining Co. Fry, L.J., laid it down that, no time being limited by the scheme then under consideration for the exercise of the option, it must, as a matter of law, be exercised within a reasonable time. The reasoning which led the Lord Justice to that conclusion appears to me to be applicable to the present case, and to show that here also the option, if no time had been prescribed for the exercise of it, must have been exercised within a reasonable time. If this be so, it seems to me that the scheme cannot be vitiated merely by the circumstance that the scheme itself fixes that reasonable time. It was said, however, that in Nicholl v. Eberhardt Co. the Court of Appeal had expressed doubt as to the validity of such stipulations. In that case, however, the limit of time was left to be determined, not (as here) by the liquidator of the old company, but by the directors of the new company, and it was provided that all shares which should not be applied for within such time should be at the disposal of the new company, the latter being a different provision from that which is found in the present case. Even there, however, as I read the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal, no great weight appears to have been given to the objection which was raised to the limitation of time for the exercise of the option; the objection which was felt to be serious being that to the second of the provisions I have mentioned. In the present case it is not suggested, or, at all events, it is not proved, that the limit of time which was ultimately fixed by the liquidator was unreasonable, and, in my opinion, the first and second resolutions were not beyond the powers of the company.

Then, is the third resolution invalid? I think not. It appears to me, when carefully examined, to be really for the benefit of a shareholder who does not exercise the option given to him. Such a shareholder not exercising the option reserved to him would, according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Weston v. New Guston Co., lose all his interest in the shares of the purchasing company; but instead of this, a further chance of benefit is given to him by the provisions of the third resolution. This resolution, in effect, provided that the liquidator shall (without coming under any legal obligation so to do) be at liberty to make the most of the option on the shareholder's behalf, accounting to him for any premium he receives, less the costs and expenses of realization. No loss or liability is thrown on the old shareholder, for by clause 3 of the agreement any expenses incurred by the liquidator are to be borne by the new company, while any benefit which may result from the dealings of the liquidator comes to the shareholder. In my opinion the scheme is, in substance, one for the distribution among the shareholders (who do not dissent) of shares to which liability attaches, within the terms of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862. In coming to this conclusion I conceive that I am not departing from anything decided or laid down in Griffith v. Paget. In that case there was an attempt to distribute the shares which constituted the consideration for the sale in a different way from that in which a money consideration would have been divided, so that some of the shareholders would have been deprived of property to which they were entitled. That was held to be invalid. In this case there is not in the resolutions, as I read them, any such attempt. There is no interest conferred on assenting shareholders of which non-assenting shareholders are attempted to be deprived, on the contrary, the utmost appears to have been done for their benefit. I think it unnecessary to express an opinion on the second point beyond this, that I think it appears to be open to serious doubt whether a shareholder who previously to the 17th of June expressed his willingness to take up his proportion of shares, who on the 24th of August sent in an application for those shares, and who did not previously to the 2nd of October challenge the validity of the resolutions, is not precluded from claiming relief founded on their invalidity, in a case where those resolutions have been acted upon to the extent which here appears. The motion must be dismissed.

Solicitors, Snell, Son, & Greenip; Michael Abrahams, Son, & Co.; Kerly, Son, & Verden.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 16; Nov. 6, 23, 1889.
Stirling, J. }

In re Thompson.
Bedford v. Teal. (a.)

Charity—Legacy—Impure personalty—Bonds or debentures of corporation—9 Geo. 2, c. 36.

A testator bequeathed various sums of money to charities. The greater part of his estate consisted of bonds of the following corporations:—viz., Batley, Bradford, Keighley, Dewsbury, Wakefield, and Leeds.

Held, that all these bonds, with the exception of that of the Keighley Corporation, constituted interests in land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and therefore could not validly be bequeathed to charities.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the executors and trustees of the will of John Robert Thompson asking (inter alia) for the determination, under ord. 55, r. 3, of the question whether certain charitable legacies given by his will were to any and what extent or proportion void by reason of the personal estate of the testator consisting in part of corporation bonds or any other personal estate connected with land within the meaning of the Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36).

The testator, who died on the 1st of October, 1887, by his will, dated the 3rd of June, 1887, bequeathed numerous sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to £2,450, to charitable objects, with a direction that such legacies should be paid exclusively out of such part of his personal estate as might be legally bequeathed to charitable institutions. He then bequeathed the residue of his personal estate upon trust for his cousins as therein mentioned.

The greater part of the testator's estate consisted of money invested upon bonds issued by various corporations of the value of £4,968.

They were as follows:—

1. A mortgage of the Batley Corporation dated the 14th of October, 1880, for £500, and expressed to be made by virtue of the Batley Corporation Waterworks Acts, 1871 and 1878, and to be a mortgage of "such proportion of the works authorised by the said Acts, and of the rates, rents, profits, and other moneys arising or accruing, and in any way vested in the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses by virtue of the said Acts, from the public water rates and annual rents authorised by the said Acts to be levied and made, and also the borough rates and borough fund of the said borough."

2. A mortgage of the same corporation for a similar amount dated the 12th of January, 1882. This mortgage was expressed to be made by virtue of the Dewsbury and Batley Corporations Gas Act, 1873, and to be a mortgage of "the interest" of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Batley "in the gas rates, rents, and money to be received in respect of the gasworks of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses. And also as a collateral security the borough rates and the borough fund of the said borough."

By the above-mentioned Acts the corporation were empowered to borrow for the purposes of those Acts, and to charge the amounts so borrowed upon the rents and rates thereby authorized to be made and levied, and also upon the borough fund and borough rate.

It appeared from the affidavit of the town clerk of the borough that the borough fund was comprised (inter alia) of the tolls and stallages received from the public market, and rents received from surplus lands, some of which were originally acquired for market purposes and were sold subject to rent-charges.

(a.) Reported by W. Ivimey Cook, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3. A mortgage of the Bradford Corporation for £1,000, dated the 26th of April, 1870, and expressed to be made by virtue of the Public Health Act, 1848, the Bradford Corporation Act, 1850, the Local Government Act, 1858, the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act, 1861, and the Bradford Corporation Act, 1866, and to be a mortgage of the rates arising and accruing by virtue of the said Acts, or some or one of them, from the general district rates to be levied within the district of the said borough."

By section 57 of the Bradford Corporation Act, 1866, the corporation were authorized from time to time to borrow on mortgage any sums not exceeding in the whole £150,000 to be applied in making and providing market places and market houses, and the buildings, works, and conveniences connected therewith by the same Act authorized to be made and maintained.

By section 60, "The mortgagees under this Act may enforce payment of arrears of principal and interest due on their mortgages by the appointment of a receiver, and in order to authorize the appointment of a receiver the amount owing to the mortgagees by whom the application for a receiver is made shall not be less than £10,000 in the whole."

By section 69, "The principal sums from time to time borrowed by the corporation on mortgage under this Act for purposes other than the purposes of the waterworks, and the interest thereon, are by this Act charged upon the lands and property from time to time acquired by the corporation, whether by lease or by purchase under this Act, and the general district rate of the borough."

4. A mortgage of the same corporation for £400, dated the 1st of April, 1887, and expressed to be made under the Bradford Improvement Act, 1850, and in exercise of all other powers vested in the corporation or enabling them in that behalf, and to be a mortgage of "the borough fund of the said borough and the rates, rents, and profits and other moneys forming such borough fund or arising or accruing from the borough fund of the said borough."

The Bradford Improvement Act, 1850, was an Act for conferring upon the corporation of Bradford more extensive powers and authorities for the better paving, lighting, watching, and draining, and otherwise improving the borough, and for the better regulation thereof.

By an order of the Board of Trade entitled "The Bradford Corporation Tramways Order, 1880," and which order was confirmed by "The Tramways Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1880," the Bradford corporation were empowered to construct and maintain certain tramways in the borough of Bradford, and for that purpose to borrow on security of the local rate and the moneys coming to them out of the rents reserved under any lease made under the authority of that order, and the tolls, charges, and sums authorized to be taken or received by them under the provisions thereof, any sum or sums of money not exceeding £50,000.

By a further order entitled "The Bradford Corporation Tramways Order, 1883," and which order was confirmed by the Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Act, 1883, the Bradford Corporation were empowered to construct and maintain additional tramways in the borough, and for that purpose to borrow on the same security as set forth in the first-mentioned order any sum or sums not exceeding £45,000.

By an affidavit of the town clerk of Bradford it appeared that the money secured by the bond was borrowed by the corporation under the above orders or one of them and expended by them in the construction and maintenance of the tramways which by the orders they were empowered to construct and maintain. It also appeared that the borough fund consisted of the proceeds of the borough rate, the profits accruing from the various undertakings of the corporation, the allowances made by the Treasury for police and prosecutions, and the rents of certain surplus lands acquired by the corporation for an enlargement of the town hall and for street improvements.

Paragraph 10 was as follows: "The corporation have no land or buildings connected with the undertaking, the same being all provided by the lessees. The said corporation are, in addition to the possession by them of their said tramway, seised or possessed of and their corporate land includes the following real and leasehold property . . . the Town Hall of Bradford . . . and certain surplus land acquired by the said corporation for the purpose of effecting an enlargement of the town hall, and improvements of the streets in the said borough, but which have not yet been used for that purpose and in the meantime are let to several persons as tenants of the said corporation at yearly or other rents."

5. A mortgage of the Keighley Corporation for £500, dated the 24th of June, 1884, and expressed to be made by virtue of the Public Health Act, 1875, the Public Health Supplemental Act, 1855 (No. 2), and the Keighley Improvement Act, 1824, or some or one of such Acts, and of every other Act or power in anywise enabling them in this behalf, and to be a mortgage of "the rates and charges arising or accruing by virtue of the said Acts or any of the said Acts and of the general district rates of the corporation, and of their rents, rates, and charges (if any) as the corporation has power to grant, assign, or otherwise charge for this purpose."

By the Keighley Improvement Act, 1882, and the Public Health Supplemental Act, 1855 (No. 2), the local board of health were empowered to manufacture and supply gas and to recover rents for such supply by warrant of distraint from a justice of the peace.

By the Keighley Waterworks Extension and Improvement Act, 1869, they were authorized to borrow £10,000 for gaswork purposes on mortgage of their gas rents and other funds carried to the gas account with or without including the general district rate, and the mortgages from time to time granted were deemed to be granted in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act applicable to mortgages of the general district rate.

By two separate sanctions under the seal of the Local Government Board, dated respectively the 12th of October, 1874, and the 8th of February, 1875, the local board were authorized to borrow £49,997 for the purchase of land as a site for gasworks, for the erection of such gasworks, and for certain other works incidental thereto. The application for such sanctions was made under the Sanitary Acts, the said Public Health Supplemental Act, 1855 (No. 2), and the said Keighley Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1869, and the moneys were directed to be borrowed on the credit of the charges and rates which the local board were authorized to mortgage for the purpose of securing the repayment of the said moneys.

In 1882 a charter of incorporation was granted to the district of Keighley, which thereupon became a borough, and the powers, property, and authorities of the local board of health became vested in the corporation. The amount secured by the mortgage was, with other moneys borrowed by the local board of health under the aforesaid sanctions of the Local Government Board, for the purpose of purchasing land as a site for gasworks, for the erection of such gasworks, and for certain other works incidental thereto. The interest on the mortgage was paid exclusively out of the rents, charges, and other income arising from the gasworks. In the event of such income proving insufficient for payment of interest, the mortgage was to become a charge upon the general district rates levied under the sanitary Acts.

6. A mortgage of the Dewsbury Corporation for £500, dated the 7th of October, 1878, and expressed to be made under the Batley Corporation Waterworks Act, 1871, and the Dewsbury and Heckmondwike Waterworks Act, 1876, and to be mortgage of the share and interest of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in "the rates, rents, and money to be received in respect or by means of the waterworks of the Dewsbury and Heckmondwike Waterworks Board, and also, as a collateral security, the borough rates and a borough fund or general district rates and public water rate of the said borough."

Under the above-mentioned Acts the corporation had power to borrow upon the security of the borough rate, the general district rate, and the public water rate.

The town clerk, in his affidavit, deposed as follows:—"The corporation is seised or possessed of the following hereditaments and real estate (that is to say) (a) the town hall, now in course of construction upon freehold land acquired by the corporation for the purpose; also the borough offices of Dewsbury, held by the corporation for an unexpired term of years under a lease thereof granted to the said corporation. Some portions of the borough offices which are not required or constantly used by the corporation for their own use or that of their officers and servants, are sublet by the corporation to the School Board, the Waterworks Board, and the Chamber of Commerce of Dewsbury as yearly tenants thereof at certain rents, which rents are paid to the treasurer of the corporation, and are by him carried to the account of and form part of the borough fund."

7 and 8. Two mortgages of the Wakefield Corporation for £500 each, dated respectively the 10th of May, 1881, and the 9th of December, 1884, and respectively expressed to be made by virtue of the Wakefield Corporation Waterworks Act, 1880, and to be mortgages of the share and interest of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in the "revenues to be received in respect or by means of the waterworks authorized by the said Act, and also, as a collateral security, the general district rates and district fund of the said borough."

By section 58 of the above-mentioned Act "for securing repayment of moneys borrowed under the authority thereof, the said corporation may mortgage the water revenues and the district fund, or either of them."

By section 177 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "Any local authority may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, let for any term any lands which they may possess, as and when they can conveniently spare the same."

By section 207, "All expenses incurred or payable by an urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged on and defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate leviable by them under this Act," subject to certain exceptions.

By section 209, "In the district of every urban authority whose expenses under this Act are directed to be defrayed out of the district fund and general district rate there shall be continued or established a fund called the district fund; a separate account called 'the district fund account,' carried under this Act to the account of that fund, shall be kept by the treasurer of the urban authority in defraying such of the expenses chargeable thereon under this Act as they may think proper."

By section 210, "For the purpose of defraying any expenses chargeable on the district fund which that fund is insufficient to meet the urban authority shall from time to time, as occasion may require, make by writing under the common seal, and levy, in addition to any other rate leviable by them under this Act, a rate or rates to be called 'general district rates.'"

It appeared from paragraph 9 of an affidavit of the town clerk that the district fund consisted of "the income and profits accruing from the various undertakings of the corporation, the proceeds of the said general district rate, contributions from the county authority and from the Government in respect of the maintenance of main roads and the rent of a cottage, the site of which, with other surplus land, was acquired by the corporation under the Public Health Act, 1875, for the purposes of their sanitary department or undertaking."

9. A mortgage of the Leeds Corporation for £600, dated the 2nd of January, 1871, and expressed to be made by virtue of the Leeds Corporation Gas Act and the Acts incorporated therewith, and to be a mortgage of "the borough fund and borough rates of the said borough, and also the undertakings, works, and property of the Leeds Gas Light Co. and the Leeds New Gas Co. vested in the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses under the said first-mentioned Act and the said gas rents and other income to be derived under the same Act."

By the above-mentioned Act the corporation were empowered to borrow on mortgage upon the borough fund and borough rates and upon the security of the undertakings, works, and property vested in the corporation under the Act.

It appeared from the evidence of the town clerk that the borough fund consisted (inter alia) of certain rents received from the surplus lands and property acquired by the corporation for or in connection with their various undertakings and improvements and the rent received in respect of a reformatory school.

F. H. Colt, for the summons.

As to the Batley bonds,

Charles Brown, for the residuary legatees.—In In re Hatton, 32 S. J. 241, North, J., decided that these bonds were pure personalty.

Bardswell (Hastings, Q.C., with him), for the charities, admitted that the case was not distinguishable from In re Hatton.

Stirling, J., following In re Hatton, held that these bonds were impure personalty, and therefore could not be applied in payment of charitable legacies.

As to the Bradford bond for £1,000,

Charles Brown.—This bond also falls within In re Hatton.

Bardswell.—In order that the bond should create an interest in land, the land must be directly affected: In re Hatton; In re Christmas, Martin v. Lacon, 34 W. R. 8, 779, 33 Ch. D. 344, 30 Ch. D. 544; Attree v. Hawe, 26 W. R. 871, 9 Ch. D. 337; Holdsworth v. Davenport, 25 W. R. 20, 3 Ch. D. 185; Jervis v. Lawrence, 31 W. R. 267, 22 Ch. D. 202. Here the land is not directly affected.

Charles Brown, in reply, referred to 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 3; In re Harris, 29 W. R. 119, 15 Ch. D. 561; Public Health Act, 1875.

Stirling, J.—I will dispose of the matter as regards the Bradford bond for £1,000, which seems to me to be scarcely open to doubt. Section 3 of the statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 35, provides:—[His lordship read the section, and continued:—] The question I have to determine with reference to this bond is, does it create an estate or interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or is it a charge or incumbrance affecting or to affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments? That is the question I have to consider. Now, on the face of it, the bond is issued under the provisions of, among other Acts, the Bradford Corporation Act, 1866, and it is headed "No. 29 £1,000 on the general district rates (Markets Account)." I assume, therefore, that this money is borrowed for the purpose of erecting the markets in the borough of Bradford. Now the Act of 1866, under which it is borrowed, provides this:—[His lordship read section 69 of the Act, and continued:—] So that, in addition to the general district rate of the borough, the sum borrowed by the corporation on mortgage under the Act is, by the statute itself, made a charge upon the lands and property from time to time acquired by the corporation, whether by lease or purchase under that Act. It appears from the town clerk's affidavit that the corporation has among its property some markets which I assume to have been acquired and created under the provisions of the Act of 1866. Therefore the question—Does the bond create a charge upon lands, tenements, or hereditaments?—answers itself. The Act is express upon the point. Now the language of the Statute of Mortmain is peculiar. It not only includes charges or interests affecting any lands, but if any lands will by possibility be brought under the charge or incumbrance, it makes the gift void. In this case there are existing lands on which the principal sum is charged by virtue of the local Act. Therefore I decide this point without reference at all to any question as to the borough rate and the nature of it. I am of opinion that the £1,000 bond cannot be validly given to charity.

The cases as to the remaining bonds were then argued.

STIRLING, J., without giving any formal judgments, held that the gift of the Keighley bond was good and that of the Leeds bond was bad, and reserved judgment as to that of the Wakefield bond, and directed the case to stand over as to the Bradford bond for £400, and the Dewsbury bond for the production of further evidence.

Nov. 6.—Further evidence having been supplied, the case came on for further argument.

As to the Bradford bond.

Charles Brown, submitted that the property comprised in the bond was real estate, and, therefore, not applicable to the payment of the charitable legacies.

Hastings, Q.C., and Bardswell, contended that the case was governed by In re Hatton.

They also referred to Attree v. Hawe, and Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. 201.

Charles Brown, in reply, referred to In re David, Buckley v. Royal National Lifeboat Institution, ante, p. 162, 43 Ch. D. 27.

The case of the Dewsbury bond was then argued.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23.—STIRLING, J.—In this case I have to say whether certain bonds of the Corporations of Dewsbury, Bradford, and Wakefield, are pure or impure personalty.

The point which I have to consider came before North, J., in In re Hatton. In that case his lordship said this:—"Another question raised by the summons was whether certain debentures or mortgages of the Batley Corporation, to the amount of £7,500 in all, were pure or mixed personalty—that is to say, whether they gave the holder of the mortgages such an interest in land as to render them obnoxious to the Statute of Mortmain, and incapable of being bequeathed to charities. To take the words of one of the bonds (they were substantially in the same form), the Corporation of Leeds granted to 'the said Eliza Hatton,' for the purposes of the Act under which the charge was given, 'the interest of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in the gas rates, rents, and money to be received in respect of the gasworks of the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, and also, as a collateral security, the borough rates and borough funds of the said borough.'" Then his lordship continues:—"Now the borough fund itself in this case consists of, among other things, rents of surplus land, and although, no doubt, they are fee farm rents out of land that has been sold subject to this arrangement, yet they are not the less rents. There are many decisions which have held that a gift of an interest in the rents of the land is the gift of an interest in land, and is void under the statute. Under those circumstances—though if I could have decided the other way I am satisfied that the mischief aimed at by the statute would never have arisen, yet I feel bound by the many previous decisions of the court that a charge upon rents, or a gift of rents, or a legacy payable out of rents, is a charge, gift, or legacy of an interest in land, and so in this case a charge upon rents is, in my opinion, a charge on an interest in land, which I certainly am precluded by numerous decisions from holding can escape being void under the statute."

In that decision and in those words I concur, more particularly because, like the learned judge, I should like to decide the other way, being satisfied that the mischief aimed at by the statute would never arise. But I am bound by the numerous decisions to which North, J., refers. It is, therefore, in each case necessary to inquire whether a charge is constituted upon the rents of land. I take, first of all, the case of the Dewsbury mortgage. [His lordship referred to the terms of the bond, and continued:—] This is the same case exactly as occurred before North, J., because in that case, as in this, there was a charge in the first instance on the gas rates, and a collateral security, as here, upon the borough rates and borough fund. What, then, does that borough fund include? That is explained by an affidavit of the town clerk. [His lordship read the paragraph of his affidavit above set out, and continued:—] It is clear from that paragraph that the corporation possesses property producing rent, which rent forms part of the borough fund, and is consequently charged by the bond in question.

I next turn to the Bradford mortgage for £400. [His lordship referred to the terms of the mortgage, and continued:—] The words there are a little wider, and make the matter, if possible, more plain, because there is an express charge upon rents. What do we find as regards the borough fund in this case. [His lordship read paragraph 10 of the town clerk's affidavit above set out, and continued:—] Here, again, we find rents of real estate forming an essential part of the borough fund, and therefore open to the objection which has been pointed out by North, J.

There remains the case of the two bonds of the corporation of Wakefield for £500 each which are not charged on the borough fund, but on another fund—viz., the district fund under the Public Health Act, 1876. [His lordship then referred to the terms of the bond, and continued:—] Now, the district fund is constituted by section 209 of the Public Health Act, 1875, thus [his lordship read sections 209, 210, 207, 177.] I have searched through the Act for the purpose of finding any direction as to what is to become of the rent of the land let under section 177, and, curiously enough, there is no express direction as to it. There is a provision in section 175 as to the dealing with surplus lands, and as to the application of the proceeds of sale; but those are in the strict sense surplus lands—lands which which are not required for the purposes of their undertaking. But section 177 is wider; so that if land is required for the purposes of the board, and it can be conveniently let, there is authority for the local authority to let it with the consent of the Local Government Board, and that even although they could not sell it. I am unable to see to what other fund these rents can belong than to the district fund, and consequently the reasoning of North, J, applies, although there is no express provision here such as is to be found in the Municipal Corporations Act, directing the rents of the property to be paid into the fund in question. Then the question again arises here—to which fund, as a constituent of this district fund, do the rents belong? That is stated in an affidavit of the town clerk.

First of all, paragraph 4 points out that by section 58 of the Act "for securing repayment of moneys borrowed under the authority thereof, the said corporation may mortgage the water revenues, and the district fund, and general district rate, or either of them." That is the Wakefield Corporation Act, 1880. They have mortgaged the general district fund as well as the general district rate, and paragraph 9 says:—[his lordship read the paragraph.] That is acquired under the Public Health Act, but under the terms of that Act all the expenses chargeable under that Act are payable, of whatever kind, out of the district fund, and they have authority to charge that. It seems to me in this case that rent of land enters as an ingredient, and that the reasoning of North, J., in the case referred to must apply. I come, therefore, with the same expression of regret to the conclusion that all these are non-pure personalty. I ought to add that I have considered the argument of Mr. Graham Hastings that in each case these were undertakings similar to that which was the subject of decision in Attree v. Hawe and Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co.; but having regard to the terms of the Public Health Act and of the Municipal Corporations Act I cannot arrive at that conclusion, and I observe that in the case of In re David, Buckley v. National Lifeboat Institution the Court of Appeal gave no encouragement to that view.

The costs of all parties will be paid out of the general residuary estate.

Solicitors, Torr, Janeways, Gribble, & Oddie, for M. Cranswick, Leeds; Fowler, Perks, Hopkinson, & Co.; T. W. & T. B. Nelson.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) Dec. 11.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF BROMLEY. (a.)

Justices — Weights and scales — Post-office — Unjust weights or scales — Post-office weights supplied to tradesman who acts as postmaster—Right of inspector to seize same if unjust — Jurisdiction of justices— Prohibition— Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), ss. 25, 59.

Weights and scales supplied by the Post Office authorities are not within the operation of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, so that, if such weights or scales are supplied to a postmaster who, at the same time, is carrying on, in the same shop as the post-office, some other business requiring weights and scales, an inspector of weights has no right to seize such post-office weights or scales, even though they are unjust, and even though it be shown that the postmaster has in the shop no other suitable weights or scales for his ordinary business, provided it do not appear that he used such weights or scales in his business.

If, in such a case, an information is preferred against the postmaster under section 25 of the Act, for having in his possession unjust weights, the justices have no jurisdiction to entertain such a question, and a prohibition will go to prohibit them from entering on the inquiry.

Rule nisi calling on the Justices of Bromley and the inspector of weights and measures for the district of Bromley to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit the justices from hearing and determining an information against one Nicholls, charging him, under section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), with having a false and unjust scale for use in his trade.

Nicholls was the master of the post-office at Down, Kent, and he also carried on in the same shop in which the business of the post-office was conducted the business of a bakery, and by the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, he was bound to sell bread by weight, and to have in his shop proper weights and scales for that purpose.

The inspector of weights visited the shop and inspected the weights and scales used by Nicholls for his business and found them correct. These weights were small weights used for weighing small things, and were Nicholls' own property, but were not suitable for the weighing of bread. There were in the shop no other weights or scales suitable for weighing bread except the post-office weights and scales. The business of the post-office was carried on at the same counter as that at which the bakery business was conducted, and the post-office weights were on the counter used for weighing bread. The inspector tested the post-office scale, and found it to be false by about a quarter of an ounce. The postmaster stated that he never used the post-office weights or scales for weighing bread, or in any part of his business other than the post-office business, and both he and his wife, in their affidavits, made the same statement, and they said that they did not know that the scale was false. The scale in question was a post-office scale supplied by the authorities and belonged to the Crown.

There was no suggestion that Nicholls knew the scale was inaccurate, or that it was used by him for his trade.

A summons was thereupon taken out by the inspector against the postmaster, under section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, for being in possession of unjust scales.

Section 25 enacts: "Every person who uses or has in his possession for use for trade any weight, measure, scale . . . or weighing machine which is false and unjust shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5"; and section 59 enacts that "where any weight is found in possession of any person carrying on trade within the meaning of this Act, or on the premises of any person which are used for trade, such person shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, until the contrary is proved, to have such weight, &c., in his possession for use for trade."

Before the hearing came on before the magistrates a rule for a prohibition was obtained.

The inspector of weights being an officer of the County Council for the county of Kent, the county council appeared to show cause against the rule.

Poland, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the Kent County Council, showed cause.—This prohibition ought not to go if the subject-matter is within the jurisdiction of the justices. [Sir R. E. Webster, A.G.—I admit that the prohibition ought not to go if, on the affidavits, it had been found that these scales were used in the way of business; here they were found to be post-office weights and scales.] [MATHEW, J.—The Act contemplates the confiscation of the scales which are the property of the man who uses them; here you admit they cannot be confiscated.] Whether they were used for trade purposes is a question of fact to be dealt with by the justices. The authorities are clear that prohibition will not go if the matter to be inquired into is within the jurisdiction of the justices, and here they have jurisdiction to inquire into the subject. Though the justices have no power to order the scales to be forfeited, that is no reason for a prohibition if they have jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry. There is a question for the justices to try—whether these weights and scales were used for the purposes of trade, and if they go wrong they can be set right by prohibition, certiorari, or mandamus. There is no instance of a prohibition in a case of this kind: In re Appledore Tithe Commutation, L. R. 8 Q. B. 189. A prohibition may issue to a court exercising criminal jurisdiction: Reg. v. Herford, 8 W. R. 579.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Casserley, in support of the rule.—Post-office weights and scales are not within the Act at all. The Act was never intended to apply, and does not apply, to any scales belonging to the Government. The section says that they must be in the possession of a person for the purposes of trade; that shows that the Act only applies to weights and scales which can be forfeited, and these are the words "and may seize and retain" the same. It would require express words to enable one to seize Crown property.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I entirely admit that if there is jurisdiction to enter upon this inquiry, the prohibition ought not to go. It is and must be a condition precedent to entering on this inquiry that the inquiry itself should be within the scope of the justices' jurisdiction, and if it is not the prohibition will go.

In this case an information is laid under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and the only material sections to consider are the 25th and the 59th sections. It is sufficient to say that this Act is directed against abuses of unjust weights and measures, and very strong and sweeping terms are employed in sections 25 and 59, which are both directed to the same point, so that we cannot take section 25 and deal with it by itself, as if section 59 were not in the Act.

Then comes the question whether it was ever intended by Parliament that weights and measures supplied by the post-office should be within the contemplation of the Act, and under the jurisdiction of the inspector of weights and measures.

I am clearly of opinion that it was not so intended, and it is enough to say here that we are not now dealing with a case of any fraudulent use of weights by the postmaster. The question is whether the justices have jurisdiction to enter upon this inquiry, that is, whether the fact of a postmaster having such weights in his possession can give the justices jurisdiction. I think clearly not: I think it never could have been intended that the fact of a person having in his possession post-office weights and scales should give the justices jurisdiction; and the case therefore is not within the meaning of the Act.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me clear that Parliament never meant to treat weights and measures supplied by a public body as being within the Act. The public are, it seems to me, adequately protected. The consequences of holding that these weights were within the Act would be threefold, that the weights were used unfairly, that weights and measures may be removed from the post-office and the business of the post-office stopped, and that the property of the post-office may be confiscated.

For these reasons, and for the reasons given by my lord, I am clearly of opinion that this prohibition ought to go.

Rule absolute for prohibition.

Solicitors for the county council, Latter & Willett, Bromley.

Solicitor for the Postmaster-General, The Solicitor to the Post Office.

Q. B. Div. (Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J.) — Nov. 29.

USHER AND OTHERS (Appellants) v. LUXMORE (Respondent). (a.)

Justices—Jurisdiction—Malicious injury to property—Removing post placed in public footpath—Conviction for—"Fair and reasonable supposition of right"—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52.

The respondent, whose wife was the owner of the land at each side of a public footpath, and also of the land over which the footpath passed, erected two wooden posts in the middle of the footpath to prevent his cattle from straying down the path, one post being at the entrance to the footpath and the other some distance along the path. There was a space of two feet at each side of the posts through which foot passengers could pass. The appellants, with a number of others, inhabitants of the district, assembled and pulled up one of these posts and threw it over the fence; they were convicted, under section 52 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, of having committed wilful damage to the post.

Held, that the conviction was wrong, as the appellants, in pulling up the post, had acted, as it appeared from the facts, under a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to do what they did; that the case, therefore, came within the proviso of the section; and that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted.

Case stated by three justices of the peace for the county of Berks.

A complaint was preferred by the respondent against the three appellants, under the 52nd section of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, for having, on the 10th of April, 1889, at the parish of Cookham in the county of Berks, unlawfully and maliciously committed damage, injury, and spoil upon a certain wooden post the property of Maria Luxmore, the wife of the respondent, thereby doing injury to the said property to the extent of three shillings.

The appellants were convicted and fined in the sum of sixpence each, together with a sum of eight shillings for costs and a sum of eightpence for damage to the property.

The respondent's wife is the owner of the land on either side of a certain footpath, and is the owner of the land over which the footpath passes. The land on either side of the footpath is separated from the footpath by a fence and communicates therewith by gates.

The public have a right of way or passage on foot only along the footpath. The respondent's cattle on being driven from the land on one side of the footpath to the land on the other side of the path have occasionally bolted down the footpath, and to prevent the cattle so straying along the footpath the respondent placed two wooden posts in the middle of the footpath, one post at the point A. at the entrance to the footpath, the other at a point B. some distance along the footpath, at the place where the property of the respondent's wife ended. The post at the point B. was placed in the middle of the path between two iron standards which had formerly carried a gate which was formerly closed by the respondent once a year.

The space between the two standards was four and a half feet, and, as the post was about four inches square, there was a space of about two feet on either side of the post through which foot passengers could pass. On the 10th of April the appellants, with some thirty others, in the presence of the respondent and against his will, pulled up the post at the point B. and threw it over the fence on to the adjoining land.

The justices convicted the appellants, being of opinion that the respondent was in law justified in putting up the post, and that the right of passing along the footpath had not been in any way impaired by the acts of the respondent, and that the appellants, in removing the post, had not acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to do so.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Section 52 of the Malicious Injury to Property Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), enacts that "whoever shall wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to any real or personal property shall, on conviction before a justice, be subject to imprisonment or fine . . . . provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of."

Dale Hart, for the appellants.—There are two questions in the case—whether the respondent was or was not justified in placing the post in the highway; and, secondly, whether, even if the respondent was so justified, the jurisdiction of the justices was not ousted on the ground that the appellants acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to pull up the post. As to the first point, the public footpath was a public highway: Rex v. Inhabitants of the County of Salop, 13 East, at p. 97; Rex v. Severn and Wye Railway Co., 2 B. & Ald., at p. 648. Such an obstruction is a nuisance: Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 701; Reg. v. United Kingdom Telegraph Co., 10 W. R. 538; Reg. v. Towgood, 35 J. P. 791. As to the second point, the appellants had a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to do what they did, and so they come within the proviso of the section.

Rev. B. Coleridge, for the respondent, was heard as to the second point.—There was no evidence of obstruction, or that any persons had found it more difficult to pass after the post was erected. Where a right which is claimed cannot exist in law, that ousts the idea of a bonâ fide claim of right: Bagshaw v. Buxton Local Board of Health, 24 W. R. 231, 1 Ch. D. 220; Mussett v. Burch, 35 L. T. N. S. 486; White v. Feast, 20 W. R. 382, L. R. 7 Q. B. 353. The claim here put forward is that the public had a right to go over every part of the footpath, a claim which does not exist in law, and therefore there can be no fair or reasonable supposition of right in such a case.

FRY, L.J., after stating the facts, proceeded:—In that state of things three defendants are brought before the magistrates, and are charged with having wilfully or maliciously damaged the post.

I shall not express any opinion on the question whether this post was an obstruction of the footpath or not, but I shall assume, for the purposes of this case, that it was not an obstruction. Then comes the question whether the facts before us do not show that the defendants had a fair and reasonable supposition of right. The defendants proceeded to remove the post at the point B. but they did not interfere with the post at the point A., and it is clear that they thought they had a right to remove the post, as they appeared before the magistrates with a great cloud of witnesses to prove that there was a public footpath at the point in question. These witnesses were not called, as the right of way was admitted.

I think, under the circumstances, we are entitled to assume that the defendants had a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to do the act they did, and the case therefore comes within the proviso of the section, so that the conviction was wrong.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The jurisdiction of the magistrates is limited in cases of this kind by the very clear and precise language of the proviso. The first inquiry would be as to whether what was done was done under a fair and reasonable supposition of right. For the reasons given by the Lord Justice, I think it was, and that the jurisdiction of the magistrates was ousted. The defendants came with a body of witnesses to prove the right, but these witnesses were not called. The magistrates ought to have come to the conclusion that what was done was done under a fair and reasonable supposition of right, and the conviction therefore ought to be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellants, G. Thompson & Son.

Solicitors for the respondent, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Ford, Harris, & Ford, Exeter.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) } Nov. 25.

BADCOCK v. HUNT. (a.)

County court—Practice—Costs—Order for, on higher scale—Certificate signed on a subsequent day to order—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 8—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 119.

Ord. 50, r. 8, of the County Court Rules, 1889, provides that, "where a judge certifies under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the certificate shall be entered at the end of the minutes of the court of the day on which it is given, and shall be signed by the judge."

In an action brought in the City of London Court, the judge made an order for costs on the higher scale, but omitted to give the certificate required by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, on the same day. On a subsequent day he signed a certificate, which was entered at the end of the minutes of the court of the day on which he gave the order.

Held, that he was not prevented by the directions given in ord. 50, r. 8, from adopting this course.

Application for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the City of London Court prohibiting further proceedings being taken under an order made by him directing that the defendant's costs be taxed on the higher scale.

The plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment in the City of London Court on March 8, 1888, for £6 6s. and costs, the defendant having leave to appeal. The judgment was affirmed on appeal to the Divisional Court, but was subsequently reversed by the Court of Appeal (see 37 W. R. 205, where the facts upon which the action was brought are fully set out), and judgment was ordered to be entered for the defendant, with costs. The defendant thereupon, on the 8th of April, 1889, obtained an order from the judge of the City of London Court for costs on the higher scale, but no certificate was given, as required by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888. On the 23rd of July, 1889, the plaintiffs applied to the judge to rescind this order, and pointed out that he had not given the necessary certificate. The application was refused, and the judge thereupon signed a certificate which was entered at the end of the minutes of the court of the 8th of April. The plaintiffs then applied for a writ of prohibition to Pollock, B., at chambers, who referred the matter to the court.

E. Hume Williams, for the plaintiffs.—The Court of Appeal having dealt with the costs in their order, the judge of the City of London Court has no power to vary such order. Having dealt with the costs at the trial of the action he could not afterwards amend his order: Taylor v. Great Northern Railway Co., L. R. 1 C. P. 430, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 27. The judge did not give the certificate required by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, until too late: Howard v. Graves, 52 L. T.

(a.) Reported by G. K. PALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-L

N. S. 858, 33 W. R. Dig. 65. Ord. 50, r. 8, of the County Court Rules, 1889, requires that the order and certificate be made on the same day, and as he certificatet was not signed till July 23 the order is bad.

C. E. Jones, for the defendant.—The judge had discretion to make the order. Ord. 50, r. 8, does not prevent him from giving a certificate on a day subsequent to that on which he made the order.

E. Hume Williams replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This application must be dismissed. There is no doubt that the defendant is entitled to costs on the higher scale, and that the judge of the City of London Court intended, when he made the order of the 8th of April, 1888, that he should have them. Unless, therefore, we can find clear directions to the contrary, I am of opinion that he acted rightly in adopting the course he did. I can find nothing whatever, either in the County Courts Act, 1888, or in the rules, which prohibits such a course. If the attention of the judge had been drawn to ord. 50, r. 8, he would doubtless have made the proper entry of the certificate at the time, and as there is nothing in that rule to prevent a subsequent entry, he was justified in making one for the purpose of giving effect to his order.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Court of Appeal, when making their order as to costs, never intended to interfere with the discretion given to the judge by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888. With regard to the form of the certificate, it is clear that rule 8 of order 50 is intended to be merely directory, and I think that the learned judge was right in correcting the mistake which he had made in not having given a certificate at the time he made the order, and that a prohibition must be refused.

Application dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Arthur Harries.

Solicitors for the defendant, A. H. Hunt & Co.

C. C. R. Dec. 14.

REG. v. JAMES HALLIDAY. (a.)

Criminal law—Inflicting grievous bodily harm—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 20—Threats unaccompanied by physical acts.

The prosecutrix, being on reasonable grounds frightened by the prisoner's threats, climbed out of a window to escape, and was injured.

Held, that the prisoner was rightly convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm under section 20 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100.

Reg. v. Martin, 30 W. R. 106, 8 Q. B. D. 54, followed.

The prisoner had been tried at the Durham County Sessions on an indictment charging him with having wilfully and maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm on Mary Ann Halliday and (in a second count) with having assaulted her thereby occasioning her actual bodily harm.

It was proved that Mary Ann Halliday was prisoner's wife; that he had been frequently drunk during the twelve months preceding the day on which the offence was committed; that whilst drunk his language was very violent and abusive; that he had threatened her frequently; and that in consequence of his threats she had had to leave home and go to a neighbour's house about a week before the day in question; but he had never actually used violence towards her.

On the day in question, in consequence of a request made to her by Margaret Ann Halliday (the daughter of prosecutrix and of prisoner), the prosecutrix went home and found prisoner very drunk; the son of the prisoner and prosecutrix was also there, and whilst he remained prisoner was quiet, but the son left the house after a short interval, and then prisoner fastened the door and the windows and used threatening language towards the prosecutrix, also calling her bad names and ordering her and the daughter off to bed. Prosecutrix was in an inner room and prisoner shortly afterwards called out to her asking if she was in bed. Prosecutrix said she was not, whereupon prisoner exclaimed "I'll make you so that you can't go to bed," and whilst staggering towards the inner room he knocked himself against a closet in the outer room. Prosecutrix was afraid he would blame her for that, and ran to the window, took the hasp off it, and opened it in order to get out, and had got one leg out when their daughter caught hold of her and held her. Prisoner by this time had got into the room where prosecutrix was, and was within reach of her, and was calling out to let her go; whereupon the daughter left hold, and prosecutrix fell into the street and broke her leg. Both mother and daughter were very frightened. Whilst prosecutrix was lying on the flags beneath, prisoner jeered at her from the window, saying it served her right, and he made no attempt to help her.

On these facts the chairman directed the jury that if the prosecutrix's apprehension was well grounded taking into account the circumstances in which she was placed, and if getting out of the window was an act such as under the circumstances a woman might reasonably be led to take, they should find the prisoner guilty. The jury returned a general verdict of guilty on the whole indictment.

The question for this court was whether or not the prisoner was rightly convicted.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

J. Lawson Walton (Simey with him), for the prosecution.—The question is whether by threats alone, unaccompanied by physical acts as in the case of Reg. v. Martin, 30 W. R. 106, 8 Q. B. D. 54, the prisoner can be said to have "inflicted" bodily harm under section 20 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, although the act of the party injured was voluntary. Under section 18 of the same statute it has been held that bodily harm may be "caused" by such means, and at common law if death had resulted it is clear that the prisoner would have been guilty of manslaughter. It is submitted that the prisoner ought to be equally held responsible under section 18 in the present case.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this case is governed by the decision in Reg. v. Martin, where the acts done by the prisoner were not the direct physical cause of the injury inflicted, but led to a panic among the audience at the theatre whereby persons were injured. The prisoner was there taken to have intended the natural consequences of that which he did, and I think the same principle governs this case, and the prisoner was rightly convicted.

MATHEW, CAVE, DAY, and A. L. SMITH, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitors, Newlands, Newcastle.

---

a.) Reported by R. E. MELSHEIMER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (Ireland). July 22, 1889.

M'Cabe v. Bank of Ireland. (a.)

Practice—Staying second action for same matter—Costs unpaid.

Where a plaintiff, having failed in one action, commences a second action for substantially the same matter, the second action will be stayed until the costs of the first action have been paid.

Martin v. Earl Beauchamp, 32 W. R. 17, 25 Ch. D. 12, approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland.

The facts are given in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

C. F. M. Mundy, for the appellant.

Robertson, Q.C. (of the Irish Bar), for the respondents, was not heard.

Lord Herschell.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ireland affirming a judgment of the Chancery Division. The appellant alleges that a certain amount of stock which was then standing in the name of John Glynn was, in the year 1856, settled, in some way or other, upon the niece of John Glynn, who afterwards became the wife of the appellant. The wife died in the year 1866, and in March, 1887, an action was brought by the appellant in the Exchequer Division in Ireland to recover from the Bank of Ireland the amount of stock which had so stood in the name of John Glynn, and, as he alleged, had been settled upon his wife, on the allegation that he, as her representative, had then become entitled to it. That action was tried before Morris, C.J., and a special jury, and a verdict and judgment were given for the defendants. The costs were afterwards taxed at a sum of £32.

An action was subsequently commenced by the appellant in the month of April, 1887, in the Chancery Division of the same court. He alleges that the former action was dismissed because it had been commenced in the wrong division of the court, it being a matter for the Chancery Division, and that he was ill-advised in having brought it in the Exchequer Division. Upon that an application was made by him to be allowed to sue in formâ pauperis. A cross-notice was then given by the present respondents praying that the action might either be stayed as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the powers of the court, or that it might be stayed until the appellant had paid the costs of the first action. Upon those notices of motion coming on the Master of the Rolls ordered that the petition for leave to sue in formâ pauperis should be dismissed, and that the action should be stayed until the costs of the former action had been paid by the appellant. From that decision the case was taken to the Court of Appeal in Ireland, and the decision, after argument, was by that court affirmed.

I think that the judgment is really not open to objection of any sort. It was a matter within the discretion of the learned judge of the court below, the court of first instance (and the Court of Appeal in Ireland have deemed that that discretion was properly exercised), whether he would refuse or grant the permission to sue in formâ pauperis. He, in the exercise of that discretion, considered that it was not a case in which he ought to grant it. The Court of Appeal have concurred in that view, and I can see no reason to doubt that they acted with perfect propriety.

The only question remaining is whether the order was right in so far as it stayed the proceedings in the second action until the costs in the first action had been paid.

Now I find that it was laid down in a recent case in the Court of Appeal—Martin v. Earl Beauchamp, 32 W. R. 17, 25 Ch. D. 12—that "the rule is established that where a plaintiff having failed in one action commences a second action for the same matter, the second action must be stayed until the costs of the first action have been paid"; and there, even although the actions were not precisely between the same parties or in the same capacity, the case was held to be within the rule, inasmuch as the plaintiff there was "suing substantially by virtue of the same alleged title." It cannot be denied that in the present case the parties are the same, and that the plaintiff is "suing substantially by virtue of the same alleged title"; and, therefore, in accordance with that rule, which I apprehend is not in any respect confined to the courts in England, but applies as well to the courts in Ireland, it merely arising out of the inherent power which resides in the court to prevent a second suit being brought upon the same cause of action in the same court until the costs incurred in the first action have been paid, I think that the present case is really disposed of. It shows that it is impossible for us to interfere with that which the Court of Appeal have done, which has been entirely within their jurisdiction, and I can see no reason to doubt that it has been right.

I come with the less regret to this conclusion because, as far as I can see, if the appellant here were allowed to sue he would really not have given to him any right which would be of any advantage to him, for, from all that I have heard to-day, I have been unable to see that he would be likely to make out any sort of case against the present respondents, or to take any benefit from the litigation which he has commenced against them.

I move your lordships that the appeal be dismissed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I concur in everything which my noble and learned friend has stated, and I should only add, from my experience of the practice in Ireland, where I was for a long time upon the bench, that as long as I can recollect, it has been part of the inherent jurisdiction, and never doubted, of every court in Ireland to stay proceedings in an action before it, where a prior action has been brought substantially asserting the same rights against the same parties in the same or another court, until the costs of that prior action have been paid. It was quite a matter of course and a part of the jurisdiction of the court, and never quarrelled with. That is exactly what the Master of the Rolls has done, and that is what the Court of Appeal has affirmed.

I join with my noble and learned friend in saying that I concur in dismissing the appeal with the less reluctance because, having read carefully the whole of the various conflicting statements put forward by the appellant, the plaintiff in the court below, I cannot make out that he ever had the least shadow of claim as against the Bank of Ireland. If this stock was bound by a trust he may follow and assert that trust against the parties to whom that stock was transferred. It appears to have been transferred properly and regularly to the personal representatives of John Glynn, the survivor of Owen Glynn and John Glynn, in whose names the stock stood. He may have that right—upon that I express no opinion; but against the Bank of Ireland he never had the shadow of a claim.

Lord Macnaghten concurred.

Judgment appealed from affirmed and appeal dismissed.

The appellant in person.

Solicitors for the respondents, Freshfields & Williams, for Edward H. de Moleyns, Dublin.

(a.) Reported by Charles H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Dec. 10.

NIEMANN v. NIEMANN. (a.)

Partnership—Dissolution—Partner intrusted with the liquidation of the dissolved firm—Appointment of such partner as receiver—Debt due to the partnership—Scheme proposed by liquidating partner, in substitution of the debt, to take shares in a new company formed to work out the estate of the debtor—Whether court has jurisdiction to compel unwilling partner to assent to such scheme.

By a deed of dissolution of partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was agreed that the defendant should have the sole management of the liquidation of the partnership firm, should pay all existing debts of the firm, and indemnify the plaintiff against the same, and should account to the plaintiff for the share of any dividends which might be received in respect of any debts or claims, after payment of all creditors of the firm out of the assets of the firm. The firm had a claim for a large sum against a foreign merchant, in respect of which claim little or nothing was capable of being realized in the ordinary way. The defendant had proposed, with a view to obtaining something on this claim, to take shares in a company about to be formed, the object of which was to take over the property of the debtor in question, subject to an arrangement being come to with the creditors of the debtor to accept, in shares of the company, amounts equal to twenty-five per cent. of the value of their claims.

The plaintiff having brought an action to have the accounts of the partnership taken and to restrain the defendant from carrying out, in opposition to the wish of the plaintiff, such proposed arrangement, an order was made by Kekewich, J., appointing the defendant receiver, with liberty to compromise the claim in question upon terms to be approved by the judge in chambers.

Held, (1) that the deed of dissolution contained no power, either express or implied, authorizing the defendant to enter into any arrangement of the kind proposed; (2) that the appointment of the defendant as receiver did not give the court jurisdiction to clothe the defendant as receiver, contrary to the wish of the plaintiff, with authority not given by the agreement between the partners; and (3) that the order appointing the defendant receiver having been in fact made for the purpose of enabling the proposed arrangement to be carried into effect, should be discharged.

In re Land Credit Co. of Ireland, Weikersheim's case, 21 W. R. 612, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 831, explained.

Appeal from Kekewich, J., sitting for North, J.

The plaintiff and the defendant were two brothers who had carried on business in partnership; the partnership was dissolved by a deed dated the 3rd of June, 1887, and made between the two partners, whereby it was agreed that the defendant should have the sole superintendence and management of the liquidation of the firm, and should pay all debts of the firm and indemnify the plaintiff against the same. Clause 3 of the deed provided that "Neither of the said partners will make any claim upon the other of them, but the said H. W. E. Niemann (i.e., the defendant) shall pay all the existing debts of the firm and indemnify the said Karl Niemann (i.e., the plaintiff) against the same, and shall also pay and account to him for the share of any dividends which may be received in respect of any debts or claims after all the creditors of the firm shall have been paid out of the existing assets of the firm." Among the assets of the firm was a large sum claimed to be due from a firm of merchants in Java, as to which sum or claim it was, until recently, believed that nothing would be paid, the property of the Javan firm being subject to a mortgage in favour of certain bankers in Amsterdam. It appeared from the evidence that a limited company had been, or was about to be, formed in Amsterdam for the purpose of taking over the estate of the Javan firm, subject to an arrangement being come to with the creditors of that firm by which such creditors were to accept in shares in the company amounts equal to twenty-five per cent. of the value of their claims.

By his writ in this action the plaintiff claimed (1) to have the accounts taken of the partnership lately existing between him and the defendant, and the affairs wound up under the direction of the court; and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant compromising, settling, or abandoning the claim of the partnership firm against the Javan firm in opposition to the plaintiff's instructions and without his consent.

On the 9th of December, 1889, Kekewich, J., sitting for North, J., made an order that, "upon payment of £2,000 into court by the defendant as security for the eventual share of the plaintiff under the deed of dissolution, the defendant be appointed receiver, with liberty to compromise the claim in question upon terms to be approved by the judge in chambers, the defendant to give, forthwith, copies of the documents relating to the compromise, and to prepare a memorandum stating the details thereof in order that the plaintiff might have an opportunity of considering them."

From this order the plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C. (Christopher James with him), for the appellant.—The court has no jurisdiction to compel an unwilling partner to accept shares in a company in satisfaction of a debt due to the partnership; the court has no power to force such a compromise on adults.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the respondent.—The terms of the deed of dissolution give the defendant power to effect the proposed arrangement. The defendant is willing to take the allotment of shares in his own name and to indemnify the plaintiff. A partner carrying out the liquidation of a firm has implied authority to receive satisfaction for a debt due to the firm in "meal or in malt." Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 141, citing In re Land Credit Co. of Ireland, Weikersheim's case, 21 W. R. 612, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 831. This is really the case of the appointment of a receiver of the assets of this partnership, and as the court has power to authorise the receiver to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction of a debt for a larger amount, so also has it power to authorise the receiver to accept "meal or malt" in satisfaction of a debt due, for the meal or malt may be converted into money next day. In West of England and New South Wales District Bank v. Murch, 31 W. R. 467, 23 Ch. D. 138, Fry, J., held that an executor had power to sell partnership property, not for cash, but for other property, consisting in part, of shares and debentures. No compromise has been in fact as yet sanctioned by the court.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—In In re Crawshay, Dennis v. Crawshay, 33 S. J., 126, North, J., held that he had no jurisdiction to sanction an agreement for the sale of the testator's share in a mining business to a limited company, the purchase-money to be paid in shares of the company, and the trusts of the will not expressly authorizing the investment of the trust property in the shares of the limited company. In the winding up of a company the court has no jurisdiction to compel the liquidator to accept a compromise: East of England Banking Co., Pearson's case, 20 W. R. 394, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 309.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., directing the winding up of the partnership affairs in this case. The action was brought to have the partnership accounts taken and for the appointment of a receiver. The plaintiff and the defendant are brothers, who carried on business in partnership, which was dissolved by agreement a few years ago. Kekewich, J., made an order appointing a receiver with liberty to come before him, in order, as has been suggested, to discuss the terms of a proposed arrangement to be entered into. What is stated in the affidavit of the defendant, as a sketch of the proposed arrangement—is this, that there is a large debt due to the partnership by a firm in Java, and that there is no chance of getting any payment in respect of that debt except by entering into an arrangement for the formation of a limited company to take over the property of the Javan firm, and for the handing over of shares in such company to the different creditors of the Javan firm. That is all the affidavit states. But on the hearing of this appeal we have learned some further details as to this company. It is to be a limited company, not in England but in Holland, whatever a limited company in Holland may be.

This is strongly objected to by the plaintiff, and he says that Kekewich, J., had no right or power to compel him to assent to a compromise of the debt being entered into by the defendant on these terms. I do not enter into the question whether this is properly a compromise or not, but I hold that the learned judge had no power to authorize the defendant to enter into such an arrangement. How does the defendant justify it? The defendant could not, after the institution of this action, exercise the powers given to him by the deed of dissolution made between him and the plaintiff, except by the leave of the court; but the court, in my opinion, could not give him any extra powers beyond the authority which he had under the deed as liquidating partner. The action was really a limit on his powers under the deed, as it prevented him exercising those powers without the sanction of the court. Could the court, then, sanction the agreement which the defendant proposes to enter into? Is there anything in the deed of dissolution which enables that to be done? I do not think it can be contended (subject to the case cited by Mr. Ingle Joyce) that one partner, though he be the partner carrying out the winding up of the affairs of the partnership, can enter into such an arrangement as is proposed, unless some power to do so was expressly given him by the other partner; and in this deed I cannot see anything which gives the defendant any special power to enter into any special arrangement like this. The deed makes the defendant the person to wind up the concern; he is to pay all the debts, and I think (though that question has not been much argued) it prevents the plaintiff from interfering, except by instituting an action, with the exercise of the powers given to the defendant by the deed. The defendant is to take upon himself the whole burthen of the liquidation of the partnership firm and the payment of the creditors, and is to indemnify the plaintiff against the claims of the said creditors. It runs thus: "Neither of the said partners will make any claim upon the other of them, but the said H. W. F. Niemann (that is, the defendant) shall pay all the existing debts of the firm, and indemnify the said Karl Niemann (that is, the plaintiff) against the same, and shall also pay and account to him for the share of any dividends which may be received in respect of any debts or claims after all the creditors of the firm shall have been paid out of the existing assets of the firm."

Now that does not give the defendant any special power as regards dealing with the assets, it only limits the burthen which he undertakes; and so far, therefore, as there are any indications there, it shows that he would not have any authority to take shares in a new company, because the deed supposes primâ facie that what will be received by him in respect of the assets of the firm would be divisible as dividends between himself and his partner. I think that is valuable as showing that it contemplates the winding up of the firm, and that the assets of the partnership should be wound up in the ordinary way, which would be to realize and get payment of whatever could be got—payment in full, if possible, if not, payment of such sum as could be obtained.

The question then arises, has the court any power given to it by the appointment of a receiver? That question was the one most pressed on us, and most relied upon, by the respondent.

It is very true that the receiver is appointed on behalf of both the parties to the action, but in my opinion it is only for the purpose of carrying into effect on behalf of both, the powers that are given by the contract between the parties. It does not enable the court to authorize the receiver to make a new contract between the parties, or to assume to himself a power which, by the contract, has not been given him by the other party. In my opinion, therefore, it would be wrong to hold that the court can, by appointing a receiver, enable the receiver to do that which the court cannot authorize one partner to do without the consent and against the will of the other partner.

I do not enter into the question as to whether it is, or is not, correct to say that this proposed scheme will give the most profitable result to the two partners if they like to accept it. The only question we have to deal with is whether the plaintiff, as one of the partners, is or is not right in saying to the defendant, "You have no power to do this; the court was wrong in purporting to give you authority to do it." In my opinion this is not merely payment of a debt nor any compromise of a payment of a debt, but it is sanctioning the defendant entering, on behalf of himself and of the plaintiff, his partner, into a speculation to work out the estate of a debtor to the firm in such a way as to probably produce a profitable result. In my opinion the court has no power either to authorize a receiver, or the defendant, without the appointment of a receiver, to do that, when the contract between the parties does not authorize it.

Now the order made by Kekewich, J., only purports to be the appointment of a receiver, and it was pressed upon us that the appointment of a receiver in consequence of difficulties between partners is almost a matter of course, and that there can be no valid objection to that.

I do not think, however, the order can be regarded quite in that view. The appointment of a receiver under this order was simply made for the purpose of enabling the proposed scheme to be carried into effect; that was the sole reason and object of this order; the appointment of the defendant as receiver was simply machinery for the purpose of enabling that to be carried out in a way that the court might have control over it.

I think Kekewich, J., was acting in the way he thought most advisable for the interests of both parties, but in my opinion the judge had no power to authorize such a scheme to be carried into effect under the guise of compromising a claim against a debtor to the firm.

I think that the best course for us to adopt is to discharge the order altogether, without prejudice to any other application for the appointment of a receiver, and the appellant must have the costs of the appeal.

As to Weikersheim's case, which was cited to us as an authority for what was done in the present case, I refer to it merely because it was so quoted as sanctioned by the opinion of Lindley, L.J., in his book on Partnership. In that case one member of a firm of bankers took as security, and brought into the names of the partners, shares in a company, which involved liability; and it is said that that is an authority in favour of the receiver here doing what he is proposing to do.

But what James and Mellish, L.JJ., decided in that case was, that in the business of bankers it was so ordinary to take shares in companies as a security for a debt that that was part of the defined contract between them, and James, L.J., points out that in fact all the partners assented to this being done.

I rather think that the statement of Lindley, L.J., has been a little misunderstood. He says, "One partner has implied authority to accept, in the ordinary course of business, security for a debt due to his firm"—I do not think there is any doubt about that. Then he goes on—"And where one member of a firm of bankers accepted as security, for money due to the bank, shares in a company, and caused them to be registered in the name of the bank, it was held that he had implied authority so to do, although the consequence was that he thereby rendered himself and his co-partners liable as contributories." The first part of the sentence does look as if it were a general statement of the law that there would be an implied authority in partners generally—not merely in the partners in that particular case—to accept shares under the circumstances. But when one examines the case to which he refers (Weikersheim's case), one sees that that was not the meaning of that case, and I cannot think that he intended to lay down, relying on that case, a general proposition of law that what was done in Weikersheim's case could be done in every case of partnership. I thought it right to refer to this, because, from the way in which it was presented to us, that statement in Lindley, L.J.'s book might mislead others who did not look at the authority cited for the statement, which I always like to do, even in the case of a book like Lindley, L.J.'s.

In my opinion, the contention of the appellant is the right one.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case there is no power under the deed to do what is desired to be done. It seems to me, for the reasons given by the Lord Justice, that the court has no power to clothe a receiver with authority wholly transcending the conventual powers of the parties.

It does not seem to me necessary to decide that in no case can anything except cash be taken by way of compromise; one can imagine that that would depend on the circumstances of the particular case. But in this case there is really no compromise at all; it is the mere substitution, for the payment of a debt, of a speculation to take shares in a new and unformed company in Amsterdam, the object of which is, by the employment of the debtor's assets, to recoup the creditors. That is something far more than a compromise, and therefore I think it is not what the court can impose on an unwilling partner.

I entirely agree with what Cotton, L.J., has said about Weikersheim's case. The whole ratio decidendi there turned on what was the ordinary scope and authority of a partner in a banking business. Both James and Mellish, L.JJ., base their decision on the broad foundation of what is, in their opinion, the ordinary commercial business of a banker; and James, L.J., assumes, as a reason for his decision in that particular case, that the authority there was not only implied, or rather capable of being implied, from the scope of business of the partnership, but was actually an express authority conferred by the knowledge and assent of the other partners.

That shows that that case is not an authority for the proposition for which it was cited, and that the passage in Lindley, L.J.'s book, if it did imply that (and perhaps it does not), would be per incuriam.

FRY, L.J.—If I were not differing from the decision of the learned judge below I should probably say nothing, but as it is, I will shortly state the reasons why I concur with my learned brethren. The arrangement contemplated in this case is of this kind. The claim which the partnership had against the Javan firm is to be given up to a new company which is intended to be formed, and the partners in the dissolved firm are to become shareholders in a concern which is to be carried on with the property of the Javan firm; in other words, instead of remaining creditors of the Javan firm they are to become partners by way of a limited company in the affairs of the business of their debtor. That is the nature and scope of the arrangement proposed. Now it appears to me that such an arrangement as that, is not within the ordinary powers of a partner who is charged with the liquidation of a dissolved partnership. It is not necessary to say if he is bound to receive all the property which he collects in the form of cash, or whether under the circumstances he might have proceeded in another form. That point does not require decision. But that he has power to enter into a company or partnership to carry on the business of the debtor to the firm which he is winding up is, in my opinion, not the case. I think, therefore, that, looked upon from a general point of view, the contention cannot be successfully urged.

Then it was said that the deed of the 3rd of June, 1887, makes a difference, and that it shows that the defendant was to be made so completely dominus of the winding up that he has power to do this.

I find nothing in the deed to support that contention. It appears to me only to contemplate an ordinary liquidation of the partnership affairs, with this exception, that the plaintiff is not to interfere in matters of discretion arising in that winding up. It does not clothe the defendant with any larger power, or any power of doing anything otherwise than a liquidating partner might do; and, as has been already observed by Cotton, L.J., the third clause of the deed, referring to the defendant accounting to the plaintiff for his share of any dividend received, looks as though the intention of the parties was that these outstanding claims were to be got in by way of receipt of dividends on the claims, and not by way of any such arrangement as is now proposed.

In my opinion the appointment of the defendant as receiver would not enlarge his powers, because, whilst the court, by appointing the defendant receiver, protects his operations and gives him power of having recourse to the court for assistance and advice, it does not enable him to do that as against the plaintiff which the existing convention or agreement between the parties does not justify.

I repudiate the notion that the court has a general discretion to do what it thinks best for the parties in the winding up of their affairs, which is the subject of agreement and obligation between them; and it appears to me that the argument that the court can do what it thinks best, cannot hold.

There appears to me to be no real authority cited in support of the contention which has been urged on us. I will say nothing more about Weikersheim's case, except that I entirely agree in the comments made upon it by Lord Justice Cotton. With regard to the case pressed upon us, and perhaps especially upon myself—viz., West of England and New South Wales District Bank v. Murch—I will only say that it has nothing to do with the present case, and whether rightly or wrongly decided seems immaterial. The conclusions I arrived at there were, in substance, that there was a compromise by the executrix with the bank of her deceased husband's copartner, and that (whether rightly or wrongly concluded seems to me immaterial) such compromise came under Lord Cranworth's Act. It has nothing to do with the power of a receiver appointed in a suit the object of which is the winding up of the affairs of a dissolved partnership.

I think, therefore, that the order must be discharged, and that the order suggested by Cotton, L.J., is the right one.

Appeal allowed, with costs here and below.

Solicitors for the appellant, Druces & Attlee.

Solicitors for the respondent, Hollams, Son, Coward, & Hawksley.

From Q. B. Div. Nov. 4; Dec. 19.

SWAINE v. WILSON. (a.)

Friendly society—Illegality of rules—Restraint of trade —Trades Union Acts (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31, s. 23; 39 & 40 Vict. c. 22, s. 16).

Where the objects of a friendly society are themselves legal, but some of the rules are illegal, being in restraint of trade, the society may nevertheless sue and be sued upon such of its rules as are not tainted with this vice.

Collins v. Locke, 28 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 674, discussed.

Appeal from the decision of Denman, J.

The action was brought by a member of the Bradford Power-Loom Overlookers' Friendly Society against the officers of the society to recover a benefit of £50 to which he claimed to be entitled under rule 51 of the rules of the society. The defendants alleged that as the society, which was not registered either under the Trades Union Acts or under the Friendly Society Acts, was one the object of which was in restraint of trade, it was therefore illegal, and as such could not sue or be sued in a court of law.

Denman, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the appellants.—If the society is legal the plaintiff is entitled to recover. But the object of the society, as shown by the rules, being in restraint of trade, it is, in fact, illegal.

They referred to Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 66, 3 W. R. Dig. 176; Hornby v. Close, 15 W. R. 336, L. R. 2 Q. B. 153; Rigby v. Connol, 28 W. R. 650, 14 Ch. D. 482; Wolfe v. Matthews, 30 W. R. 838, 21 Ch. D. 194; Strick v. Swansea Tin Plate Co., 35 W. R. 831, 36 Ch. D. 558; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 31, ss. 3, 4; 39 & 40 Vict. c. 22, s. 16.

Waddy, Q.C., and Waugh, for the respondent.—The object of these rules is purely beneficial and to protect the funds of the society. Although a particular rule may be in restraint of trade, that will not make the society itself illegal.

They cited Farrer v. Close, 17 W. R. 1129, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following rules of the society were referred to in the course of the argument:—

"2. The objects of this society are the raising of funds by entrance fees, subscriptions, fines, donations, levies, accumulated capital, and interest arising therefrom for the following purposes—namely: The rendering of assistance to members when out of employment, the superannuation of aged members, the insuring sums of money to members in case of accident, and to defray the expenses of the burial of deceased members and of members' deceased wives; and all moneys received on account of subscriptions, fines, donations, or otherwise shall be applied towards carrying out the objects of the society according to the rules thereof."

"41. Should any member be thrown out of employment, or having received notice to that effect, he shall inform the president, who may be in possession of such information as will procure him another situation. Should such member claim pecuniary benefit, the president shall lay such claim before the committee at its first meeting after such claim is made, and, if the circumstances are satisfactory to the committee as being in accordance with the rules, such member shall be entitled to receive the sum of 10s. per week for fourteen weeks, and 5s. per week for twelve weeks, provided he has not been thrown out of employment by his own misconduct or neglect. Any member having received the above amounts shall be in a regular situation as overlooker, manager, piece taker-in, or designer for six months before he be entitled to receive pay again. Any member having received any portion of the above pay, who may obtain a situation and lose it again within six months shall commence where he left off his pay, so that he shall not receive more than £10 unless he be in a situation for six months without receiving any benefit. Should any member be discharged from his employment and receive wages in lieu of notice, he shall not receive the benefit of this rule until the time for which he received wages shall have expired."

"42. Should any disagreeable circumstance arise between any member and his employer or manager which would justify such member in giving notice to leave his situation, he shall inform the president of the circumstances of the case, who shall bring the matter before the committee at once, and, if they consider it advisable so to do, shall give such member consent to leave his situation and claim the benefits under rule 41. Should any member leave his situation without such consent he shall not be entitled to benefit."

"47. Any member knowing of a situation being vacant, and acquainting anyone not belonging to this society of the same when there are members out of employment or wishing to change, shall be fined not less than 10s., and not more than £2, as the committee may decide. The committee shall also have the power to suspend such member until the fine is paid."

"48. Should any member apply for a situation where there is any member of this society working, he shall first inquire of one of the said members if there be, or is about to be, a vacancy before he applies for work; and should he apply after being informed by the said member that they are not in want of a man, he shall be fined for the first offence 5s., and if he again offends, 10s."

"49. Should any member be requested to teach a person the trade of a power-loom overlooker, and not be inclined so to do, he shall inform the president of the same, who shall bring the case before the committee at once, and, if they consider it advisable, shall give such member permission to decline to teach such person; and if he should lose his situation through such refusal, he shall be entitled to the same amount as the wages he was receiving when he was discharged until he again find employment."

"51. Any free member not twelve weeks in arrears who may, by losing a limb or having one disabled by accident or otherwise, or through blindness, be rendered permanently unable to follow his employment in any of the branches of trade mentioned in rule 41, provided such was not the result of intemperance or other improper conduct, shall receive the sum of £50 on the production to the committee of satisfactory medical and other testimony. . . ."

"64. No member shall receive any benefit during any turn out or strike, and if the weavers under the care of any member should turn out for wages or against any of the rules of the place made by the employer, and should such member so far interfere as to lose his situation, he shall receive no benefit from this society till he has been in work at some other place for the space of two months."

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"66. Should any member of the society who is in a situation apply for any situation which shall be advertised, and to which the parties who advertise do not attach their name or address of the firm, he shall be fined 5s. Should any member lose his situation through applying for a situation so advertised, he shall be suspended the benefits of the society for six months."

Dec. 19.—The following judgments were delivered :—

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, a member of this society, sues its officers for a payment which he alleges to be due to him under the rules of the society. It is not denied that the claim is within the rules, but it is contended that, although the plaintiff has fulfilled all the requirements of the rules, the society is an illegal society, and that, therefore, he is not entitled to sue. The defence is a mean defence, but, nevertheless, if the law is in favour of the society the court must declare it accordingly. If the objects of the society are illegal, and there are stipulations arising from a member carry-out such illegal objects, I have no doubt that the court would not enforce any stipulations in favour of the member. If, for instance, the object of the society were the furtherance of crime, and there were stipulations in favour of a member assisting in carrying out its objects, the court would not aid him to enforce those stipulations. So, if the object of the society was to do something illegal, and in restraint of trade, I should be of opinion that such a society would be so illegal that the court would not assist any of its members to enforce any stipulations in their favour. The question here is whether the object of this society is to establish a monopoly which would be illegal and in restraint of trade. It is clear to me that it has no such object. It is a friendly society, whose object is to assist its members in case of sickness or old age. It is, however, said that there are some rules which, although the general object of the society may not be illegal, will, if carried out, be in restraint of trade, and that therefore the society is illegal. I think that even if some of the rules are in restraint of trade, as long as the general object of the society is not illegal the only effect will be that those particular rules cannot be enforced, and that the existence of those rules which cannot be enforced does not prevent the enforcement of a rule which is not tainted with that vice. The rule in question, upon which the plaintiff sues, is not a rule in restraint of trade, and therefore, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

This appears to me to be the view laid down by the Privy Council in Collins v. Locke, 28 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 674. Nor do I think that the rules of this society which have been alleged to be in restraint of trade were so intended. They were intended to prevent any extravagant outlay by the society on any of its members, and they do not exceed that object, even though they may, if carried out, to a certain extent restrain trade. They are, therefore, legal. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The ground of this appeal is that the object of this society is in restraint of trade, and that, therefore, the society being illegal, the plaintiff cannot recover. The defence so raised is not a creditable defence, but the court must consider it, and, if well founded in point of law, must give effect to it. The first point is the bearing of the Trades Union Acts (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31, s. 23, as amended by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 22, s. 16) upon societies of this description. The definition in the first Act as modified by the subsequent Act is that the term "trade union" means such combination, whether temporary or permanent (1) for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or (2) for imposing restrictive conditions, on the conduct of any trade or business, whether such combination would or would not, if the principal Act had not been passed, have been deemed to have been an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade. The importance of that definition is that in section 3 of the first Act it is declared that the purposes of a trade union being in restraint of trade do not make the trade union unlawful nor avoid any agreement or trust. But that section is followed by section 4, the result of which is that notwithstanding trades unions are made legal by section 3, yet certain specified agreements mentioned in section 4 cannot be enforced; but even those specified agreements are not unlawful by reason of the inability to enforce them. The practical results of this enactment when applied to this particular society are as follows: (1) the society is a trade union within the definition clause; (2) it is legal by virtue of section 3; (3) the action brought by the plaintiff is an action brought by a member of the society for the payment to him out of its funds of a sum due to him as a member under and by virtue of the rules of the society. Such an action is brought with the object of directly enforcing an agreement for the application of the funds of the society to provide benefit to members, and the action is in fact "a legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for an agreement" of the kind mentioned in section 4. Notwithstanding section 3 of the Act this action, therefore, cannot be maintained unless it can be maintained independently of that section. The cases which have already been decided on the Act are all consistent with this view. They are Rigby v. Connol, where the plaintiff sought relief against expulsion; Wolfe v. Matthews, where an injunction was granted not directly to enforce an agreement but to restrain a misapplication of funds; and Strick v. The Swansea Tin Plate Co., where, after a winding-up order had been made, the assets were held distributable according to such rules as were legal, including those made legal by section 3. The above observations, however, do not exhaust the case; for although the plaintiff cannot avail himself of section 3 of the Trades Union Act, 1871, he will be entitled to relief if the society is a legal society apart from that section.

Is, then, the society a legal society? Illegality is not to be presumed; it must be established by those who rely upon it. The defendants rely on certain rules of this society, and contend (1) that they are illegal, being in restraint of trade; and (2) that, being illegal, the society itself is an illegal society, and cannot, therefore, be sued by one of its own members for money payable to him under its rules. Before dealing with this argument it is to be observed that the particular rule sought to be enforced is not even alleged to be illegal, and that the illegality relied upon is the illegality of other rules and of the objects of the society. The primary and avowed objects of the society are set out in rule 2 and are perfectly legal; but it is said that there are subordinate objects which are illegal and which render the society itself illegal. These objects are to be found in, and are sought to be attained by, rules 42, 47, 48, 49, and 66, and it becomes necessary to examine each of them in turn. These rules, or some of them, impose fines; but they in no way tend to excite or encourage ill-treatment, violence, or crime; and, before examining them in detail, it is desirable to ascertain the principles which render rules illegal simply by reason of their being in restraint of trade. The general proposition that every society which has rules in restraint of trade is unlawful —i.e., criminal—and that its members are punishable at common law was denied by the court in Reg. v. Stainer, 18 W. R. 439, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 230, and cannot be supported: see also Hilton v. Eckersley, Hornby v. Close, and per Patteson, J., in Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 353. Such societies are not necessarily indictable as nuisances or as conspiracies, and their rules, although in restraint of trade, are not necessarily unlawful in any criminal sense. Whether such rules can be enforced by civil legal proceedings is quite another matter, and depends mainly on the reasonableness of the rules. But even if some rules of a society cannot be enforced, it by no means follows that other rules of the same society cannot. Collins v. Locke is a clear authority to this effect, if authority be wanted for so reasonable a proposition. No doubt if the real object of this society were unduly to fetter trade, its rules might all be tainted by the vice of the object, and none of the rules might be enforceable: see Hornby v. Close and Farrer v. Close, where the court was equally divided, and where Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., relied on evidence which, in their opinion, showed that the rules were used to support strikes. But it is quite impossible in this case to hold that the avowed objects of this society, as set out in rule 2, are not the real objects of the society. There is no evidence here that the rules are in fact used for the purpose of supporting strikes or for any illegal purpose. We have nothing but the rules before us. If the objects of the society are themselves legal, the introduction of some objectionable rules will at most only have the effect of rendering those particular rules invalid. The other rules will not be affected by them: Collins v. Locke.

I might stop here, for enough has been said to show that illegality fails to be a defence to this action; but having regard to the importance of the case I pass to the consideration of each of the rules alleged to be invalid. The test of validity in a case like this is reasonableness with reference to the real and legitimate objects of the society: Collins v. Locke. One of the main objects of this society is to provide a fund for the payment of members when out of work. Rules made for the bonâ fide purpose of protecting the funds of the society from claims which can be avoided by reasonable care and management will not be invalid on the ground that they are in restraint of trade, provided the rules are not unduly oppressive or obviously detrimental to the public. To render rules for the above purposes invalid, it must be clearly shown that they go beyond what is necessary for those purposes: see Tallis v. Tallis, 1 W. R. 114, 1 E. & B. 391. These observations apply to rules made bonâ fide for the purpose of protecting the funds of the society from the claims of members who are out of work by their own fault; and to rules made bonâ fide for the purpose of protecting the funds from claims which will be made if one member in work seeks to displace another who is himself in work; and to rules made bonâ fide for the purpose of enabling members out of work and on the funds to obtain work and relieve the funds. Tried by these principles, rule 42 is clearly valid. It merely prevents a member from obtaining relief from the society if he leaves his situation when the committee think a reasonable man might properly retain it. Rule 47 is also valid, for although it imposes a fine varying from 10s. to 40s. its object is to relieve the funds of the society by assisting a member out of work to get a situation known to another member to be vacant. There is noting in the rule which affects non-members except that when there is a member out of work or wishing to change, non-members are not to be informed by a member of the fact that there is a vacancy. This is not unreasonable, nor are the consequences to members who disobey the rule unduly oppressive. Rule 48 presents more difficulty. Its object is to prevent a member in work from being displaced by another member. But the rule is so worded as to make no distinction between cases where the funds of the society are affected and cases where they are not. If two members are in work, and one is displaced by the other, a burden is thrown on the funds. But the funds of the society are not affected if one member out of work and on the funds supplants another member in work and off the funds. There is a change of claimants on the funds, but no extra burden thrown on them. The rule applies to both classes of cases. But there is always the chance that a member who applies for a situation filled by another may create a vacancy, and yet not obtain it himself; in which case there will be two claimants on the funds instead of one. Moreover, there is something mean in one member trying to supplant another when there is no vacancy, and, the rule being confined to cases where there is no vacancy, it is not unreasonable, and cannot be held invalid.

Rule 49 is unobjectionable; it merely says that a member who declines to teach a person his trade, and who is supported by the committee in his refusal, shall be supported by the society if he loses his place. The member is at liberty to exercise his own judgment in the first instance; if he elects to teach, the rule does not apply; if he refuses, without consulting the committee or contrary to their decision, and he loses his place, it will be his own fault, and he will have no claim on the funds of the society: see rule 41. The rule really protects the society from claims by persons who, in the opinion of the committee, unreasonably refuse to teach, and is in this respect similar to rule 42. Rule 66 is also reasonable, when understood. It applies only to members in employment who apply for other situations, anonymously advertised, and which may or may not be vacant. Persons answering such advertisements run serious risk of dismissal, without obtaining any other situation. The rule is both a warning to members against tricky advertisements and also a protection against claims on the funds by members who unnecessarily lose their places. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. If the general object of this society were to fetter the course of trade, all the rules would be tainted with illegality. But this society has no such object. It is clear from the case of Collins v. Locke that some of the rules may be enforced, although other rules may be in restraint of trade. The rule under which the plaintiff has brought this action is not in restraint of trade, and he is therefore entitled to recover. In my opinion the rules in general are not in restraint of trade; they are only calculated to afford fair protection to the interests of the parties in whose favour they were made, and do not interfere with the general interests of the public.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Elliott & Ash, for Robinson & Robinson, Keighley.

Solicitors for the defendants, Jaques & Co., for George Curry, Cleckheaton.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kay, J. } Dec. 4.

In re Frost.
Frost v. Frost. (a.)

Perpetuity—Legal contingent remainder—Possibility on a possibility—Rule against perpetuities.

A testator devised successive life estates in freehold lands to his daughter A., and to any husband whom she might thereafter marry, with contingent remainders over of the legal estate in the lands, to children who might be living at the death of the survivor of A. and such husband.

Held, that the contingent remainders over, though limitations of the legal estate, were void, as obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities.

The application of the rule against perpetuities to legal contingent remainders discussed.

Cole v. Sewell, 4 Dr. & War. 1, 2 H. L. Cas. 186, explained and distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

Thomas Frost by his will, dated the 19th of March, 1870, made the following devise:—"I give to my sons John Frost, Edwin Frost, and Albert Frost all those my closes of land and hereditaments situate in the parish of South Brent which are described," &c. . . . "to hold the same unto and to the use of my said sons and their heirs during the life of my daughter Emma Frost without impeachment of waste, upon trust so long as she shall continue unmarried to permit her to receive the rents and profits thereof to her own use, but in case she shall hereafter marry, then upon trust to receive the rents and profits thereof and pay the same to my said daughter Emma Frost for her separate use, . . . and after her decease, then to the use of any husband whom she may hereafter marry and his assigns during his life without impeachment of waste, and from and after the decease of the survivor of them, the said Emma Frost, and such husband, to the use of all and every or such one or more of the children of my said daughter Emma Frost, for such estate or interest, and subject to such charges and in such manner, without prejudice to the executory devise over hereinafter contained, as my said daughter Emma Frost shall by deed or will, notwithstanding coverture, appoint, and in default of appointment, and so far as no such appointment shall extend, to the use of all and every the children or child of my said daughter Emma Frost, who shall be living at the time of the death of the survivor of them, the said Emma Frost and such husband of the said Emma Frost, or shall have previously died leaving issue then living, their, his, or her heirs and assigns, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common; but in case no child of the said Emma Frost shall be living at the time of the death of the survivor of them, the said Emma Frost and such husband, or shall have previously died leaving issue then living, then to the use of such of my sons and of my other daughters as shall be then living, or shall have previously died leaving issue then living, their, his, or her heirs and assigns, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common"

The testator also devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate to his said three sons in trust for sale and to divide the proceeds, after payment of debts, &c., between his eight children, naming them, in equal shares as tenants in common.

The testator died in the year 1870. Emma Frost was a spinster at her father's death.

In 1872 she married Robert Tyley, but died in the same year without having had any children. Robert Tyley died in 1888.

This summons was taken out after the death of Robert Tyley to determine the question whether the limitations of the South Brent Estate after the death of Robert Tyley were void for remoteness.

Badcock, for the summons.—The gift over after the death of Robert Tyley in default of appointment by Mrs. Tyley, if an executory devise, is void for remoteness: In re Harvey, Peek v. Savory, 39 Ch. D. 289, 37 W. R. Dig. 203. In this case the husband might not have been born at the testator's death. No doubt Cole v. Sewell, 4 Dr. & War. 1, 2 H. L. Cas. 186, will be relied upon as establishing that the rule against perpetuities does not apply to legal remainders. But in that case there was a previous estate tail, the barring of which at any time would have destroyed the subsequent estate. There is no estate tail here. Cole v. Sewell has never been extended to a case in which there was no estate tail.

He also cited Cattlin v. Brown, 1 W. R. 533, 11 Hare, 372, and London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 620, 20 Ch. D. 562.*

Rowden, for persons in the same interest.

W. J. Lee, for persons entitled under the gift over.—The limitation to the testator's sons and other daughters was a good alternative contingent remainder, and was ready to vest on the death of Robert Tyley: Butler's Note to Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., p. 565; Williams on Real Property, 13th ed., p. 271. [Kay, J., referred to In re Finch, Abbiss v. Burney, 28 W. R. 903, 29 W. R. 449, 17 Ch. D. 211.] There the limitations were all equitable, and the decision in that case has never been extended to legal remainders. [Kay, J.—Is not the limitation a possibility on a possibility? Whitby v. Mitchell, ante, p. 5, 42 Ch. D. 494.] That doctrine only forbids a limitation to an unborn person for life, with remainder to the issue of such unborn person, and that is what is meant in the authorities cited against me by the rule against perpetuities as applied to a contingent remainder.

Badcock, in reply.—From the remarks in Sugden's Law of Property, p. 120, it seems that Lord St. Leonards in Cole v. Sewell was relying on the previous estate tail, and Lord Cottenham's judgment in the House of Lords was entirely based on the fact that the contingent remainder was always barrable. Fearne, 10th ed., p. 502, expresses the view that contingent remainders which tend to a perpetuity are void. [Kay, J., referred to Mainwaring v. Baxter, 5 Ves. 458, and Beard v. Westcott, 5 Taunt. 393]. Cole v. Sewell is discussed in Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 258; vol. 2, appendix, p. 845.

He also referred to Humberston v. Humberston, 1 P. W. 332.

Kay, J.—[His lordship read the limitations above set out, and continued:—] The estate to the trustees is specially limited to the life of Emma Frost. The limitations, therefore, to the use of any husband Emma Frost may afterwards marry, and after the death of the survivor of herself and such husband to the use of her children as she shall appoint, "without prejudice to the executory devise over hereinafter contained," and the limitations to the use of the children of Emma Frost living at the time of the death of the survivor of herself and such husband, together with the gift over in default to other persons, are limitations of the legal estate in the lands. The question is, whether these

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Christie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* See also Dunn v. Flood (North, J.), 25 Ch. D. 629.

